more work was done than was so necessary, then they should find for the defendant. The second is that, unless they believe beyond reasonable doubt, from the evidence, that the work done was not the work of necessity or charity, then they should find for the defendant; and No. 5 is that the object of the law regulating work on Sunday is to obtain a day of rest for the citizens of the state, and is not grounded on any religious tenet or belief. The question of the burden of proof is not touched in any of said instructions. In State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 24 W. Va. 783, 49 Am. Rep. 290, it is held that the court properly instructed the jury "that the burden of proof is on the state to satisfy the jury that the locomotive and train of cars were not run as a work of necessity or charity." In State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 362, 36 Am. Rep. 803, it is held: "In an indictment against a railroad company for being found laboring at its trade and calling on a certain Sabbath day, it is proper and necessary to allege that such labor was not in household work, or other work of necessity or charity," and, being a necessary allegation, it must be proved, and the burden of proof is with the state to sustain all its allegations. The law requires the allegation to be full. Every fact which is an element in a prima facie case of guilt must be stated. Otherwise there will be at least one thing the accused person is entitled to know, whereof he is not informed. And that he may be certain what each thing is, each must be charged expressly, and nothing left to intendment. All that is to be proved must be alleged. 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 519. The offense charged in the indictment in the case at bar is a statutory offense, and, if the labor as charged was a household or other work of necessity or charity, no offense was committed; hence the necessity to negative the fact in the allegation, and to prove the same. In Davis v. Webb, 46 W. Va. 6, 33 S. E. 97, it is held: "Whenever a correct instruction is refused, the judgment will be reversed, unless the appellate court can see from the whole record that, even under correct instructions, a different verdict could not have been rightly found, or unless it is able to perceive that the erroneous ruling of the court could not have influenced the jury." Dansville Bank v. Waddil, 27 Gratt. 448. And it is further held in Davis v. Webb: "It is the plain duty of a trial court, when asked to do so by either party, to instruct the jury on questions of law involved in the case, when it can thereby aid them in reaching a right conclusion and proper verdict." State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. 792 (syl., point 3). The court erred in modifying the defendant's instruction by striking out the last clause, which instructed the jury "that the burden of proof is on the state to prove that such pumping or operating was not a work of necessity or charity."

It is insisted that the court erred in refusing the motion of defendant to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence. The evidence is conflicting as to whether or not the work done was a work of necessity, for the preservation of the oil wells operated. Many cases are cited where the courts have held that work done on Sunday or the Sabbath day, where it is shown to be necessary to the preservation of property, is not a violation of the law. As in Flagg v. Milbury, 4 Cush. 243, a work of necessity is defined to be "not meant a physical and absolute necessity; but any labor, business, or work which is morally fit and proper to be done on that day, under the circumstances of the particular case, is a work of necessity, within the statute." And in Com. v. Nesbit, 34 Pa. 398, it is held: "The law does not condemn those employments which society regards as necessary, even when they encroach on the Lord's day, if, according to the ordinary skill of the business, it be necessary to do so. And then, the business being recognized as necessary, it may be performed by means of the services of others, and by all the ordinary means of the business, so far as it is necessary." Wilkinson v. State, 59 Ind. 416, 26 Am. Rep. 84; Edgerton v. State, 67 Ind. 588, 33 Am. Rep. 110; McGatrick v. Wason, 4 Ohio, 566; Hennersdorf v. State, 25 Tex. App. 597, 8 S. W. 926. Defendant cites the case of Com. v. Gillespie (decided by the court of quarter sessions) 21 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 213, which I am unable to find in the library, from which defendant's counsel quotes: "Pumping of oil wells on Sunday, it appearing that, if they were not pumped, loss results to the owners, by reason of salt water getting in the wells, is a work of necessity, within the act." If it is shown to the satisfaction of the jury that permanent loss and injury come to the owner of an oil well by reason of not pumping on Sunday, such work would be deemed a work of necessity; but if there is no permanent loss of property, and he is only delayed for the time being in procuring the oil from his well, I see no reason why he should be permitted to pump the oil on Sunday, any more than the farmer should be permitted to clear his land or plow his fields on that day. All work, under the statute, is supposed to come to a standstill on Sunday, or the Sabbath day, and it is only in case of actual loss or injury by reason of such delays that it becomes a work of necessity to save the property. In the case at bar there was evidence tending to show that there was no damage or loss by shutting down the well on Sunday, while, on the other hand, there was evidence tending to show that such shutting down would not only result in loss of production of oil, but permanent injury to the well. The question was purely a question for the jury. It was their province to weigh the testimony, and say whether the work complained of was a work of necessity.

For the reasons stated, the judgment will have to be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial granted.

(16 C. C. A. 305, 37 U. S. App. 378, 69 Fed. 546.)

1. The prevention of a multiplicity of suits is sufficient ground for an injunction against the certifying, by a board of tax appraisers, of assessments against corporations to the officers of a large number of counties, if the assessments are illegal.
2. A Federal court should render judgment depending on the construction of a state Constitution, in accordance with a previous decision by the highest state court on the subject, although, before such state decision was rendered, the Federal court had rendered an opinion to the contrary.
3. The fact that a case argued and duly considered in a state court was a friendly one will not prevent the decision therein on the construction of the state Constitution from being conclusive in Federal courts.

4. Notice of the time and place at which tax assessors will meet in sessions which are not secret, with the right of the taxpayer to appear and be heard, is sufficient to constitute due process in the assessment.
5. The use of property in the business of interstate commerce does not exempt it from liability to taxation like other property within the jurisdiction in which it is situated.
6. Valuing the property of an interstate express company as a unit profit-producing plant for the purpose of determining the taxable value of that portion of the property which is within a state does not amount to a taxation of property outside the state.
7. Regarding the capital stock of a corporation as a factor in arriving at the value of its whole property considered as a unit plant, although it is situated in different states, may be authorized by state statute, where it is done for the purpose of determining the true value of that portion of the property which is within the state.
8. Taking the relative value of the tangible property of a corporation within a state, as compared with the total value of all its tangible property in different states, where it is done under a statute which does not require this to be done, but requires the true value of the property within the state to be taken as the basis of assessment, considered with reference to the value of all

I. Scope of note.

This note is confined to cases in which the validity of taxes assessed against corporations was disputed upon the ground that their imposition conflicted with art. 1, § 8, subd. 3, of the Constitution of the United States, declaring that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes, commonly called the commerce clause.

II. Introduction.

The principal cases belong in a group wherein was contested, in the state and Federal courts, the constitutionality of statutes of Indiana, Ohio, and Kentucky, all couched in similar language, providing for the taxation of corporations and quasi corporations of both domestic and foreign origin, doing business within these states, and all engaged in interstate commerce.

the property of the corporation, including a consideration of the value of its capital stock as a factor, does not, even if it is inequitable and unjust as a matter of fact, constitute such an illegal assessment that the courts can grant an injunction against it.

APPPEALS by complainants from decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio (Eastern Division) dismissing bills filed to enjoin defendants from assessing taxes against complainants under the Nichols law. Affirmed.

*This decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States February 1, 1897 (165 U. S. 194, 41 L. ed. 683), and rehearing denied March 15, 1897 (166 U. S. 185, 41 L. ed. 865).

There were attributed to these statutes several constitutional infirmities, but in the main it was alleged that, under their operation, there was subjected to taxation property beyond the dominion of the respective taxing states, notably, franchises granted by other governments; that the companies were denied the equal protection of the laws in that they were subjected to an undue share of the burden of taxation in violation, at once, of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and of the rule of uniformity and equality of taxation imbedded in the several state Constitutions; and finally, that the taxation provided for in these laws was an interference with, and burden upon, interstate commerce, which belonged exclusively to Congress, and which was beyond the power of any state. Each of the contestants in this group of cases was finally defeated at every point, and the several tax laws were ultimately sustained. The theory which prevailed after much conflict of opinion was that nothing but property,—albeit in great part intangible and elusive property,—within the respective states, was subjected to taxation in virtue of the challenged statutes.

The questions relating to the taxation of the property of the complaining companies in these cases, especially their franchises and other intangible assets asserted to be beyond the jurisdiction of these states, have already been exhaustively discussed in the notes in this series on the Taxation of corporate franchises in the United States (Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 57 L. R. A. 33), and on the Taxation of capital stock of corporations in the United States (State Bd. of Equalization v. People (Ill.), 58 L. R. A. 513). The questions which arise under the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and the state constitutional provisions respecting equal and uniform taxation, have been fully treated in the note on Constitutional equality in the United States in relation to corporate taxation. Bacon v. Board of State Tax Commrs. (Mich.) 60 L. R. A. 321.

The questions, so far as the commerce clause in the cases was concerned, are now to be considered.

The group referred to followed in order of time, and was related to the Indiana railroad tax cases, viz.: Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus*, 154 U. S. 439, 60 L. R. A.

Statement by Lurton, Circuit Judge:

These suits were brought to enjoin the assessment of taxes against the Adams Express Company for the years 1893 and 1894, and the American Express Company and the United States Express Company for the year 1894. The defendants are Ebenezer W. Poe, auditor of the state of Ohio, John K. Richards, attorney general of the state of Ohio, and William T. Cope, treasurer of the state of Ohio, and compose a board of tax appraisers for the assessment of telegraph, telephone, and express companies, under an act of the Ohio legislature passed April 27, 1893, and known as the "Nichols law." To the several bills demurrers were filed, which, on full argument, were finally sustained, and the bills dismissed. The complainants have severally perfected appeals and assigned errors. The ground upon which the suits

III. What is commerce.

Just what is or is not embraced within the meaning of the word "commerce," in the clause of the Constitution of the Union investing Congress with power to regulate it when carried on with foreign nations or Indian tribes and between the states, has never been judicially catalogued.

Time and time again, by one or another court, in one or another case, it has been decided that a given transaction or subject was either within or without the terms of the commerce clause, so that by a gradual process of inclusion and exclusion it can now be told with tolerable certainty what is or is not enfolded in the word "commerce" as used in the commerce clause. It will aid the reader in his investigation of the subject to set forth these decisions at the outset.

The first and leading case on the construction of the commercial clause of the Constitution, to use the words of Mr. Justice Field in a later one (Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238), is that of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23, and the definition of "commerce" in that clause framed in that case by Chief Justice Marshall still stands. The all proceed is, in substance, that the assessments complained of, and the scheme of taxation embodied in the Nichols law, under which the assessments were made, are void as in contravention: First, of the Constitution of Ohio, which provides that all property shall be taxed according to its true value in money by a uniform rule, and that the property of corporations shall be taxed "the same as the property of individuals" (Ohio Const. art. 12, § 2, and art. 13, § 4); second, "of the Constitution of the United States, because the effect of the rule of valuation prescribed by the statute and adopted in these particular assessments is, not to confine the tax to the property of the companies within the state of Ohio, but to tax something else which is not within the state of Ohio, and, therefore, to take the property of the companies without due process of law, and that the scheme, as a special one applied to these special agencies of interstate commerce, imposes an illegal burden upon that commerce;" third, complainants also contend that, if the Ohio statute be valid under both the Constitution of Ohio and of the United States, the assessments are nevertheless void, because the assessments made were arbitrary and illegal, in that the assessors did not follow the statute or pursue any definite mode of valuation. Upon a first hearing before Circuit Judge Taft, the demurrers of the defendants were overruled, and defendants required to answer. The grounds upon which Judge Taft proceeded were: First, jurisdiction in equity was predicated upon the ground that a multiplicity of suits would result unless the defendants should be restrained from certifying their assessments to the auditors of meaning is not limited, he said, to traffic,—to buying and selling or the interchange of commodities. "Commerce undoubtedly is traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse. The mind can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of the one nation into the ports of the other, and be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals in the actual employment of buying and selling, or of barter."

The power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate navigation as connected with the commerce with foreign nations and among the states. It does not stop at the mere boundary line of a state; nor is it confined to acts done on the water or in the necessary course of the navigation thereof. It extends to such acts done on land which interfere with, obstruct, or prevent the due exercise of the power to regulate commerce and the navigation with foreign nations and among the states. United States v. Coombs, 12 Pet. 72, 9 L. ed. 1004.

Commerce among the states is trade, traffic, intercourse, and dealing in articles of commerce between states by citizens and others, and carried on in more than one state. Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet. 449, 10 L. ed. 800.

The power conferred by the commerce clause is without limitation. It extends to all subjects of commerce, and to all persons engaged in it. It embraces traffic, navigation, and intercourse. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450, 17 L. ed. 805.

Commerce includes navigation. The power to regulate commerce comprehends the control for that purpose, and to the extent necessary, of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from a state other than that in which they lie. Commerce among the states does not stop at a state line. Coming from abroad, it penetrates wherever it can find navigable waters reaching from without into the interior, and may follow them up as far as navigation is practicable. Wherever commerce among the states goes the power of the nation as represented in the Supreme Court goes with it to protect and enforce its rights. Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. 713, 18 L. ed. 96.

Under the commerce clause, Congress has power to legislate over navigation as well as trade,—over intercourse as well as traffic; and to prescribe what shall constitute American vessels and the national character of the seamen who shall navigate them, and rules and regulations for the intercourse and navigation of such vessels between the different states. King v. American Transp. Co. 1 Flipp. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 7,787.

The law before us, said the United States Supreme Court in another case, professes to regulate traffic and intercourse with the Indian tribes. It manifestly does both. It relates to buying and selling and exchanging commodities which is the essence of all commerce; and it regulates the intercourse between the citizens of the United States and those tribes which is another branch of commerce, and a very important one. United States v. Holliday, 3 Wall. 407, 18 L. ed. 182.

Transportation for others as an independent business is commerce irrespective of any purpose of the owner of goods carried to sell or retain them after delivery. Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 187 U. S. 617, 47 L. ed.—, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214.

Transportation is essential to commerce, or rather it is commerce itself; and every obstacle to it, or burden laid upon it, by legislative authority is regulation. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527.

By the term "commerce" is meant not traffic only, but every species of commercial intercourse, every communication by land or by water, foreign and domestic, external and internal. State v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 30 N. J. L. 473.

Transportation is as much a part of commerce as are the goods transported. If there can be no commerce between states without goods, so there can be none without the transportation of the goods. The two must be united to constitute interstate commerce. A duty on one of these two elements in commerce must in the nature of things operate as a tax upon the other. As commerce the two things are indissoluble; they are not divisible for the purposes of taxation. Erie R. Co. v. State, 31 N. J. L. 531, 86 Am. Dec. 226.

The word "commerce" is a term of broad significance. It embraces considerably more than the mere bargain and sale of goods and merchandise and other property between individuals. It includes all the instruments by which it may be conducted. It embraces transportation by railroads, ferries, etc., and all common carriers. It may be carried on between individuals in the same state, or over railroads lying in the same state. It is then internal commerce, and is under the control of state legislation. Or it may be conducted and engaged in eighty-seven counties, within each of which the defendants had property; second, that the Nichols law, under which the assessments had been made, was void as in conflict with the Constitution of the state of Ohio. The opinion of the court upon these questions is reported in 61 Fed. 449. Before answers were filed, a suit involving the constitutionality of this legislation was decided by the supreme court of Ohio, and the validity of the law under the Ohio Constitution sustained. State ex rel. Poe v. Jones, 51 Ohio St. 492, 37 N. E. 945. Upon the filing of this opinion by the Ohio court, Judge Taft granted a rehearing, and sustained the demurrers of defendants, upon the ground that the decision of the supreme court of Ohio as to the construction of the Nichols law and its validity under the Constitution of Ohio was conclusive upon the courts of the United States. A very convincing opinion upon this aspect of the question was filed, and is reported in 64 Fed. 9. A further argument was heard before Judge Taft upon the question as to whether the state board of assessors had enforced the Nichols law according to the construction placed thereon by the supreme court of Ohio. Upon the latter hearing it was agreed that the bills of the several complainants should be treated as amended by the incorporation therein of the facts which had been made to appear by the two affidavits of the defendant Poe as to the manner in which the amount of the several assessments had been reached. The learned circuit judge, upon the bills as thus amended, was of opinion that the board of assessors had kept "well within the law" as construed by the Ohio court. He therefore sustained the demurrers and dismissed the several bills.

between individuals living in different states or transported over railroads lying in and running through different states. It is then interstate commerce, and its regulation belongs to Congress. Sternberger v. Cape Fear & Y. Valley R. Co. 29 S. C. 510, 2 L. R. A. 105, 7 S. E. 836.

Commerce with foreign nations and among the states, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; United States v. Cassidy, 67 Fed. 698; United States v. Coal Dealers' Assn. 85 Fed. 252.

The word "commerce" as used in the grant of power in the Federal Constitution to Congress to regulate foreign, interstate, and Indian tribal commerce, is not limited to the mere buying and selling of merchandise and other commodities, but comprehends the entire commercial intercourse with foreign nations and among the several states. It includes navigation as well as traffic in its ordinary signification, and embraces ships and vessels as the instruments of intercourse and trade as well as the officers and seamen to navigate and control them. The power of regulation vested in Congress extends to all these subjects. People v. Brooks, 4 Denio, 469.

Commerce is the interchange or mutual change of goods, productions, or property of any kind between nations or individuals. Transportation is the means by which commerce is carried on. Without transportation there could be no commerce between nations or among the states. Any regulation of the transportation of interstate commerce, whether it be upon the high seas, the lakes, the rivers, or upon railroads or other artificial channels of communication affecting commerce, is a regulation of commerce itself. Council Bluffs v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 338, 24 Am. Rep. 773.

A shipment of live stock on a through rate across state lines is interstate commerce, even where the liability of each carrier is limited to its own line. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Williams (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 556.

But if property be shipped under a contract binding the receiving carrier no further than its own line, which terminates within the state, and without charging a through rate, it is not interstate commerce, although the shipment is 60 L. R. A.

under a through bill, and to a place outside of the state. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Davis, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 24, 31 S. W. 308.

And yet a shipment of cattle from one point to another in the same state consigned to a consignee in an adjoining territory to be carried to destination by a continuous trip is interstate commerce, although the initial carrier only contracted to carry the stock to its terminal within the state. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Savage (Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 663; Houston Direct Nav. Co. v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 89 Tex. 1, 30 L. R. A. 713, 32 S. W. 889; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Avery (Tex. Civ. App.) 33 S. W. 704.

The shipping of goods to a point just over the state line, where they are unloaded, reloaded and rebilled to proceed further to an ultimate destination in view from the start, is interstate commerce. State v. Southern Kansas R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 49 S. W. 252.

A corporation organized under a general railroad act, owning a grain elevator, freight house, several lines of railroad tracks appurtenant thereto, and the land they are built upon, at a harbor wholly within its home state; which owns neither railroad rolling stock nor boats; whose entire business consists in loading, unloading, and storing grain and other freight in transit from or to places outside of such state, — is not engaged in interstate commerce so as to be immune from excise taxes laid by its own state upon its franchise or business. People ex rel. Connecting Terminal R. Co. v. Miller, 82 N. Y. Supp. 562.

Commerce embraces intercourse of persons as well as importations of merchandise; and a state tax upon incoming passengers is a regulation in conflict with the commerce clause. Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283, 12 L. ed. 702.

The term "commerce," as employed in clause 3, § 1, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, is not to be construed as limited to an exchange of commodities only, but as including, as well, intercourse with foreign nations or the citizens of other states; and intercourse includes passenger transportation. People v. Raymond, 34 Cal. 492.

That all transportation of freights and persons from points without to points within the state, or from points within to points without the state, is commerce between the states, is abundantly settled, both upon principle and authority. Vermont & C. B. Co. v. Vermont C. R. Co. 63 Vt. 1, 10 L. R. A. 562, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 488, 21 Atl. 262, 731.

The business of landing and receiving passengers and freight at wharves on opposite sides

Argued before Lurton, Circuit Judge, and Severens and Hammond, District Judges. Messrs. Ramsey, Maxwell & Ramsey for appellants.

Mr. J. R. Richards, Attorney General, for appellees:

This court will sustain Judge Taft in following the supreme court of Ohio upon a purely Ohio question, and in conclusions in which that court is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Indiana cases. Judge Taft did right in following the decision of the supreme court of Ohio.

The property of an express company constitutes a plant for transportation purposes. The assessment of the Ohio property did not exceed a fair proportion of the value of this plant, taking into consideration the value of the capital stock and other facts, whatever basis of apportionment may be taken. In fact, no rule of appraisal aside from that laid down in the Nichols law was adopted; the result presents the best judgment of the board, in the light of the law and all the facts before it. If the assessment is erroneous, it is in consequence of a mistake of judgment, which a court will of a navigable river separating two states, for transportation across the stream from one state to another by ferriboats, however short the distance traversed, or frequent the trips made, is interstate commerce. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826.

Boats engaged in lightering goods to and from sea-going vessels, and in towing such vessels between the ocean and the wharves of a seaport; and which are enrolled and licensed in the coasting trade,—are engaged in external commerce, and are beyond the reach of state regulation. Foster v. Davenport, 22 How. 244, 16 L. ed. 248.

A bridge over waters dividing two states is a vehicle of interstate commerce,—as much so as is a ferryboat,—and traffic across it is interstate commerce. While the bridge company is not itself a common carrier, it affords a highway for such carriage, and a toll upon such bridge is as much a tax upon commerce as a toll upon a turnpike is a tax upon the traffic of such turnpike, or the charges upon a ferry a tax upon the commerce across the river. A tax laid upon those who do the business of common carriers upon a certain bridge is as much a tax upon the commerce of that bridge as if the owner of the bridge were himself a common carrier. Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 205, 38 L. ed. 962, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 649, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1092.

The legislation of Congress under the grant of power to regulate commerce has uniformly proceeded on the idea that the vehicles of commerce were but agents of trade, and that the right to regulate them was included in the right to regulate the end for which they were used. The only plain and intelligible rule would seem to be that the power of Congress to regulate commerce extends to all the immediate agents and vehicles of commerce; and, as it extends to these vehicles for some purposes, it must for all. Mitchell v. Steelman, 8 Cal. 363.

Empty railroad cars on their way to a point of lading outside of the state are not, however, engaged in interstate commerce so as to be beyond state control. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Com. 93 Va. 749, 34 L. R. A. 105, 24 S. E. 837.

The telegraph is an instrument of commerce, and telegraph companies are subject to the regulative power of Congress in respect of their foreign and interstate business. Pensacola Teleph. Co. v. Western U. Teleph. Co. 90 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708; Western U. Teleph. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 26 L. ed. 1067.

A telegraph company occupies the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages that a railroad company does as a carrier of goods. Both companies are instruments of commerce, and their business is commerce itself. They do their transportation in different ways, and their liabilities are in some respects different; but they are both indispensable to those engaged to any considerable extent in commercial pursuits. Western U. Teleph. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 26 L. ed. 1067.

Intercourse by telegraph between states is interstate commerce. Western U. Teleph. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 347, 30 L. ed. 1187, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 306, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1126.

Communication by telegraph is commerce, and, when carried on between different states, it is directly within the power of Congress to regulate, and is free from the control of state regulations save those of a strictly police character. Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 840, 32 L. ed. 311, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380.

The transmission of telegraph messages is commerce, and when they are transmitted between places in different states, or to and from foreign countries, they are beyond the reach of state taxation. Western U. Teleph. Co. v. State Bd. of Assessment, 132 U. S. 472, sub nom. Western U. Teleph. Co. v. Seay, 33 L. ed. 409, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 726, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 161, Reversing 80 Ala. 273, 60 Am. Rep. 99.

Telegraphy is commerce. Western U. Teleph. Co. v. Atlantic & P. State Teleph. Co. 5 Nev. 109.

And messages over telephones between two states are interstate commerce, and the sending of them cannot be prohibited or interfered with by injunction from a state court, because taxes assessed against those in the business of transmitting them are unpaid. Re Pennsylvania Teleph. Co. 48 N. J. Eq. 91, 20 Atl. 846.

In the light of all the foregoing authorities, the decision of the supreme court of Ohio in Western U. Teleph. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 521, so far as it holds that commerce between the states relates to trade in articles of property, and that telegrams between citizens of different states, although connected with commercial transactions, are not commerce, but only instruments to aid or facilitate commerce, and, even if indispensable to a successful prosecution of trade, are, as such instruments, subject to state taxation,—must be pronounced unsound.

But the issuing of a policy of insurance is not a commercial transaction, nor is the doing of an insurance business commerce. Policies of insurance are simple contracts of indemnity, not neither review nor correct.

The property of an express company constitutes a plant, taking into consideration the value of its capital stock and its earnings.

articles or instrumentalities of commerce. They have neither existence nor value extrinsic of the parties to them. They are not commodities to be shipped from one place to another and offered for sale. The taking out of policies of insurance is not an interstate transaction of commerce, although insured and insurer are domiciled in different states. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357; Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972; Liverpool & L. Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 10 Wall. 566, *sub nom. Liverpool L. Life & F. Ins. We cannot, said the court in this case, regard the questions presented by this record as open. They are all decisively settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357.

A state tax upon a domestic insurance company, measured by the amount of business done within the state, in so far as it affects premiums received for insuring imported goods while they remain in the original packages in bonded warehouses, does not conflict with the commerce clause, since the contract of insurance is one of indemnity only, and the tax thereon neither touches the goods nor the right to sell them. People v. National F. Ins. Co. 27 Hun, 188, Reversing 61 How. Pr. 334.

It has been judicially determined, time and time again, by the highest judicial authority in the land, that issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce. This must now be regarded as the law of the land. State v. Phipps, 50 Kan. 600, 18 L. R. A. 657, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 299, 31 Pac. 1097.

Whether or not commerce flowing in a continuous stream from one place to another in the same state and between parties subject to the jurisdiction thereof is to be regarded as purely internal and domestic, or as interstate, when part of the passage from one terminal to the other is across the soil of another state, has been a mooted question in the past. In the one case it would be subject to state regulation; in the other, to regulation exclusively by Congress.

Navigation upon the high seas, although between ports in the same state and confined entirely to voyages along the coast of that state alone, without entering or passing a single port of another state or country, is not internal domestic commerce, but commerce national in its

The Nichols law is based upon the essential differences existing between the property of telegraph, telephone, and express companies and other property. The property of these companies is in nature and use a unit, and, to be justly valued, so that the companies may bear their fair share of the public burdens, must be treated for assessment purposes as a unit.

character, and within the exclusive power of Congress to regulate. Lord v. Goodall, N. & P. S. Co. 102 U. S. 541, 26 L. ed. 221.

And yet a state tax may be levied and collected upon the gross earnings of a domestic railroad corporation for the continuous transportation of freight and passengers between points within its territory over a line which runs out of, and then back into, the state between such points. Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 36 L. ed. 672, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 87, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 806.

In deference to that decision, several cases in the state courts have held commerce of this sort to be internal and domestic.

A state has the power to regulate the charges for the carriage of goods by a single railroad from one place to another in the same state, notwithstanding nearly one half of the journey is over the soil of an adjoining state. Campbell v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 86 Iowa, 587, 17 L. R. A. 443, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 203, 53 N. W. 351.

It has such power, although nearly all of the journey is outside of the state. Seawell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 119 Mo. 222, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 262, 24 S. W. 1002.

A state may fix the rate upon telegraph messages between different points within it, passing between persons resident therein, in spite of the fact that on their way they leave and return to the state. State ex rel. Railroad Comrs. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 113 N. C. 213, 22 L. R. A. 570, 18 S. E. 389.

Neither is transportation of the same character. Dillon v. Erie R. Co. 19 Misc. 116, 43 N. Y. Supp. 320.

But the transportation of property from a consignor in one part of a state to a consignee in another part of the same state, over several railroads of which one is entirely in another state, although the journey from place to place is not interrupted, is interstate commerce, and the state in which the terminals are has no power to regulate the charges for carrying it on. Sternberger v. Cape Fear & Y. Valley R. Co. 29 S. C. 510, 2 L. R. A. 105, 7 S. E. 836.

The rule, however, which has now become established in respect of state regulation of this class of commerce, is that formulated by Mr. Justice Field, viz.: "To bring the transportation within the control of the state as part of its domestic commerce, the subject transported must be within the entire voyage under the exclusive jurisdiction of the state. Pacific Coast

Because of the inherent and essential differences referred to, it is not only proper, but wise, for the state to classify the property of these companies for taxation.

Wagoner v. Loomis, 37 Ohio St. 571.

The method of valuing the property of a telegraph company provided in the Nichols law, and distributing such valuation among the taxing districts according to mileage, is a just and fair mode of assessment, and has been sustained in numerous decisions. Rep. 808) by saying that in that case the tax was determined in respect of receipts for the proportion of the transportation within the state, and that a tax so proportioned is valid even in the case of commerce admitted to be interstate (citing Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163); whereas, when a freight rate is established it is as a whole.

IV. Congressional inaction means freedom.

It was at the outset much debated whether the power given by the Constitution of the Union to regulate commerce between the states and with foreign nations was the same as that conferred upon it to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcy, namely, a power exclusive as well as supreme when exercised, but one that did not prevent the states from enacting valid laws upon the subject so long as Congress remained silent and idle.

In the first great case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23, the question was whether the commercial power was not concurrent in the nation and the states. And it was decided that when, as in that case, Congress had enacted laws regulating commerce, state laws upon the same branch of the subject became nullities. The decision left it an open question whether the states had power, pending affirmative action by Congress, to regulate external commerce, although Mr. Justice Johnson, who concurred, was of the opinion that the grant of the commercial power to Congress carried the whole subject-matter, and left nothing to the states at all; so that any state legislation respecting external commerce would necessarily be unconstitutional ab initio.

The debate continued through many years. In Grove v. Slaughter, 15 Pet. 449, 10 L. ed. 800, the view just mentioned as that of Mr. Justice Johnson was taken by McLean and Baldwin, JJ., and the opposite one was held, but not argued, by Chief Justice Taney. Mr. Justice McLean argued that the necessity of a uniform commercial regulation, more than any other consideration, led to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and, unless the power conferred in that respect was not only paramount, but exclusive, the Constitution must fall of attaining one of the principal objects of its formation. Of the contention that a state might exercise a commercial power if the same had not been exercised by Congress, and that this state power ceased when the Federal authority was extended over the same subject-matter, he said that it rested upon the supposition that a state may exercise a power which is expressly given to the Federal government if that government does not exert such power in all the modes, and over all the subjects, in and to which it can be applied. He insisted that, if such a rule of construction was generally adopted and practically enforced, it would be as fatal to the spirit of the Constitution as it was opposed to its letter. And he asserted that a power might well remain dormant, although the expediency of exercising it had been fully considered; that it was "often wiser and more politic to forbear than to exercise a power." These remarks called forth an opinion by the chief justice when he had intended not to express one. He referred to the subject as a question brought into discussion as to whether the grant of power to the general government to regulate commerce did not carry with it an implied prohibition to the states to make any regulations upon the subject, and he declined to express any opinion upon that question, because, he insisted, it was outside of the case, and nothing required from the members of the court a voluntary declaration of opinion. He admitted that, if a state makes any regulation of commerce inconsistent with those made by Congress, or in any

There is no denial of the equal protection of the law. The Federal cases recognize the right of a state to classify property for taxation, and use such methods of valuation as, in the judgment of the legislature, will result in an equality of burdens.

Due process of law is provided by the wise interfering with them, it must yield. No one, he said, doubts the controlling power of Congress in this respect, nor its right to abrogate and annul any and every state commercial regulation. But the point upon which opinion differed was as to the validity of a state regulation of commerce pending congressional action, and not in conflict or inconsistent with such action. No case had yet arisen which made it necessary, in the judgment of the court, to decide that question.

That case was decided in 1841, and the learned chief justice shows how little was then foreseen of the future controversies over questions arising under the commerce clause, when he added: Nor am I aware that there is any reason for supposing that any such case is likely to arise, for the states have very little temptation to make a regulation of commerce when they know it may be immediately annulled by an act of Congress, even if it does not, at the time it is made, conflict with any law of the general government. The point in dispute, therefore, would seem to be but little more than an abstract question which the court may never be called upon to decide, and perhaps, like other abstract questions, is destined, on that very account, to be more frequently and earnestly discussed. But, until some case shall bring it here for decision, and until some practical purpose is to be answered by deciding it, I do not propose to engage in the discussion, nor to express an opinion. Baldwin, J., thought the question was outside of the case then before the court, but, as some of his colleagues had expressed themselves upon it, he would not remain silent. He thought the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states was exclusive of any interference by the states, and that this proposition had been conclusively established by the decisions in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23, and Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678. If these decisions, he said, are not to be taken as the established construction of this clause of the Constitution, I know of none which are not yet open to doubt; nor can there be any adjudication of this court which must be considered as authoritative upon any question if these are not to be so on this.

In the License Cases, 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256, a state statute passed to discourage the consumption of ardent spirits by prohibiting their sale within the state without a license from the selectmen of the town where the vendor resided was held valid, and not repugnant to the commerce clause, although applied to the case of the sale of a cask of liquor imported from another state, and sold by the importer in the condition imported; because Congress had not then passed any law regulating commerce between the states. The case of Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678, was distinguished by saying that, in the case at bar, the cask of gin was imported from another state, while in the cited case the package of dry goods was imported from a foreign country; and that Congress had passed a customs duty or tariff act, but no law regulating commerce among the several states. Taney, Ch. J., expressed the opinion that, by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, the states were not absolutely prohibited from legislating in regulation of interstate and foreign commerce in the absence of all action by Congress, but only after Congress had exercised its constitutional power, and in conflict therewith. And Catron, Nelson, and Woodbury, JJ., were of the same opinion.

Then came the Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283, 12 L. ed. 702, and again Mr. Justice McLean declared that the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states is, by the Constitution of the United States, vested exclusively in Congress, and that the states cannot exercise it at all, whether Congress has or has not acted. Wayne, J., agreed to this, but deemed it unnecessary to say so, while one of the conclusions announced by Grier, J., at the end of his opinion was that Congress had regulated commerce and intercourse with foreign nations and between the states by willing that it should be free.

In 1850 the supreme court of Maine was content to say that, without intimating any opinion upon the controverted question whether Congress has the exclusive power to regulate commerce to the extent of its grant, its exclusive power to do so will be admitted for the consideration of this case. Moor v. Veazie, 32 Me. 343, 52 Am. Dec. 655.

Whenever Congress exercises its power to regulate commerce among the states or with foreign nations all conflicting state laws must give way, declared the United States Supreme Court in a later case. But, if it be held that a state can impose a tax in the exercise of a concurrent right of regulating commerce until some regulation on the subject has been made by Congress, yet, if a state imposes a discriminating tax levied exclusively upon the products of her sister states, then, looking to the consequences which the exercise of this power, if it be once conceded, entails,—amounting to a total abolition of all commercial intercourse between the states, under the cloak of the taxing power,—the supposed right cannot be admitted, even Nichols law, both in itself, and when taken in connection with other statutes of Ohio. There are provisions for notice, for statements, for hearing, for review and correction of errors and overvaluations, for contesting assessments.

In the absence of an allegation of fraud, the action of the board in fixing the valuation is treated as conclusive, and the court will not revise its judgment to determine whether its valuation is or is not excessive. Courts do not resolve themselves into assessing authorities to determine the value of property for taxation.

when Congress has failed to act on the subject in any manner whatever. Hinson v. Lott, 8 Wall. 148, 19 L. ed. 387.

In 1875 the United States Supreme Court decisively announced that, Congress not having seen fit to prescribe any specific rules to govern interstate commerce, its inaction on that subject, when considered with reference to its legislation respecting foreign commerce, is equivalent to a declaration that interstate commerce shall be free and untrammelled. Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347.

There can be no doubt but that exclusive power has been conferred upon Congress in respect to the regulation of commerce among the several states. The difficulty has never been as to the existence of this power, but as to what is to be deemed an encroachment upon it. Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547.

And yet in 1880 Mr. Justice Field, in writing for the court, stated, without dissent: There have been, it is true, expressions of opinion by individual judges of this court, going to the length that the mere grant of the commercial power anterior to any action of Congress under it is exclusive of all state authority; but there has been no adjudication of the court to that effect. Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238.

It was not so very long afterwards that the court declared: We have so often held that the power given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several states, and with the Indian tribes is exclusive in all matters which require, or only admit of, general and uniform rules, and especially as regards any impediment or restriction upon such commerce, that we deem it necessary merely to refer to our previous decisions upon the subject. We have also repeatedly held that, so long as Congress does not pass any law to regulate commerce among the several states, it thereby indicates its will that such commerce shall be free and untrammelled, and that any regulation of the subject by the state, except in matters of local concern only, is repugnant to such freedom. Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446, 29 L. ed. 691, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454.

And in Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 567, 30 L. ed. 244, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 31, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4, the dissenting justices take pains to concede that any taxes, duties, or impositions upon interstate commerce (that is, upon commerce itself), carried on over the railroads of a state, would interfere with the freedom of such commerce, and would be repugnant to the presumed intention of Congress.

If Congress has not made any express regulations with regard to interstate commerce, its inaction is equivalent to a declaration that it shall be free in all cases where its power is exclusive, and its power is exclusive, necessarily, whenever the subject-matter is national in its character, and properly admits of only one uniform system. Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118.

The Constitution does not provide that commerce shall be free; but, by the grant of the power to regulate it, exclusive when the subjects are national in their nature, it was left free except as Congress might impose restraint; therefore it has been determined that the failure of Congress to exercise this exclusive power in any case is an expression of its will that the subject shall be free from restrictions or impositions upon it by the several states. Re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, sub nom. Wilkerson v. Rahrer, 35 L. ed. 572, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865.

Non-action by Congress with respect of commerce between the states is equivalent to a declaration that it shall be free. State v. Duckworth (Idaho) 39 L. R. A. 365, 51 Pac. 456.

V. State powers.

a. None to tax external commerce.

The states have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operation of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the general government. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579.

It cannot be doubted that a tax which so seriously affects the interchange of commodities between the states as essentially to impede or seriously to interfere with it is a regulation of commerce. And it is also true that Congress has the same right to regulate commerce among the states that it has to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Hinson v. Lott, 8 Wall. 148, 19 L. ed. 387.

The rule is general that, whenever taxation by a state is forbidden, or would interfere with the full exercise of a power vested in the government of the United States over the same subject, it cannot be imposed. Low v. Austin, 13 Wall. 29, 20 L. ed. 517.

States cannot, by legislation, place burdens upon commerce with foreign nations or among the several states. The decisions go to that extent, and their soundness is not questioned.

Stanley v. Albany County, 121 U. S. 541, 549, 30 L. ed. 1000, 1003, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1234; Williams v. Albany County, 122 U. S. 154, 30 L. ed. 1088, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1244; Albuquerque Nat. Bank v. Perea, 147 U. S. 87, 37 L. ed. 91, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 194.

The resort to the court is premature. No injunction will lie against this board ascertaining the valuation and certifying it to the county auditors. Non constat but that prior to the levy the valuation may, if excessive, be corrected.

Ohio Rev. Stat. §§ 5848, 167; Jones v. Davis, 36 Ohio St. 478.

In an action to enjoin the levy or collection of taxes, the amount known or admitted to be due must first be paid or tendered.

U. S. 87, 90, 37 L. ed. 91, 92, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 194; Frazer v. Siebern, 16 Ohio St. 624.

The tax is not one on the interstate business carried on by the companies, but upon the property of the companies, owned and used in Ohio and having a situs here, for purposes of taxation. There is, therefore, no violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States.

Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851; State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, 294, 295, 296, *sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. In all cases the legislation condemned operated directly upon commerce, either by way of tax upon its business, license upon its pursuit in the particular channels, or conditions for carrying it on. Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. ed. 819.

It may safely be said that state legislation which seeks to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce, or to interfere directly with its freedom, encroaches upon the exclusive power of Congress. Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547.

A state cannot tax the business of ferrying freight and passengers across a navigable river flowing between it and another state. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826.

Taxing is one of the principal forms of regulating commerce. Taxing the transportation, either by its tonnage, or its distance, or by the number of trips performed, or in any other way, would certainly be a regulation of the commerce,—a restriction upon it; a burden upon it. Clearly this could not be done by the state without interfering with the power of Congress. Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118.

No state has the right to lay a tax on interstate commerce in any form, whether by way of duties laid on the transportation of the subjects of that commerce, or the receipts derived from that transportation, or on the occupation or business of carrying it on; and the reason is that such taxation is a burden on that commerce, and amounts to a regulation of it which belongs solely to Congress. Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 311, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380; Lyng v. Michigan, 135 U. S. 161, 34 L. ed. 150, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 143, 10 Sup. Ct. We have repeatedly decided that a state law is unconstitutional and void which requires a party to take out a license for carrying on interstate commerce, no matter how specious the pretext may be for imposing it. Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851.

Whether a charge made by a state be viewed as a tax, a license, or a fee, if its exaction violates the commerce clause, it is void, whatever 60 L. R. A.

may be the technical character given it. Ashley v. Ryan, 153 U. S. 436, 38 L. ed. 773, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 664, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865.

All agree that interstate commerce is not the subject of state regulation, and the cases are uniform in holding that a tax upon such commerce is a regulation within the inhibition of the Federal Constitution. Vermont & C. R. Co. v. Vermont C. R. Co. 63 Vt. 1, 10 L. R. A. 562, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 498, 21 Atl. 262, 731.

No more fruitful subject of controversy has been presented than the proper construction of the commerce clause in the Federal Constitution as connected with the right of the states to impose taxation upon interstate commerce, or, rather, on the question when a tax is to be regarded as a tax on such commerce, because the bald proposition that a state may tax interstate commerce has probably never been asserted by any of the courts of the states. People ex rel. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Wemple, 138 N. Y. 1, 19 L. R. A. 694, 33 N. E. 720.

When commerce is of a national character so as to require a uniform system of regulation there is no constitutional or legal power in a state to interrupt, impede, or regulate it. State v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 30 N. J. L. 473.

And it may be laid down as a general rule, universally applicable to all cases arising under the commerce clause, that, whenever the taxation of a commodity would amount to a regulation of commerce, so will the taxation of an inseparable incident or necessary concomitant of such commodity. Erie R. Co. v. State, 31 N. J. L. 531, 86 Am. Dec. 226.

That the commerce clause of the Constitution exempts from the burden of state taxation those who confine themselves to interstate commerce is a truth of which at this day knowledge must be imputed to the law-making power; and, in the absence of language that clearly connects such an intent with that power, it should not be held that there was a purpose to ignore such truth or violate its principles. Osborne v. State, 33 Fla. 162, 25 L. R. A. 120, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 731, 14 So. 588. Affirmed in 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

If the assessments complained of be illegal, for any reason, the jurisdiction of a court of equity to enjoin the defendants from certifying them to the several county auditors of the state seems to be clear, upon the ground that a multiplicity of suits would result unless the assessment be enjoined be-

been acknowledged by this court; but that there is such a line is clear, and the court can best discharge its duty by determining in each case on which side the tax complained of is. It is as important to leave the rightful powers of the state in respect of taxation unimpaired as to maintain the powers of the Federal government in their integrity. Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. 479, 21 L. ed. 470.

Every tax upon personal property, or upon occupations, business, or franchises, affects, more or less, the subjects and the operations of commerce. Yet, it is not everything that affects commerce that amounts to a regulation of it, within the meaning of the Constitution. State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164; Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 888; Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. 479, 21 L. ed. 470; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77.

Legislation in a great variety of ways may affect commerce and persons engaged in it without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution. Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 90, 23 L. ed. 819; Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6.

For instance, a state may require a railroad annually to fix its rates for fares and freights, and to post and keep them posted throughout the year by a printed copy thereof in all its stations, under penalties for default and for charging more than the posted rates, without thereby infringing upon the exclusive power of Congress to regulate commerce, provided the company is left entirely free to fix any rates it chooses. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 17 Wall. 560, 21 L. ed. 710.

The constitutional grant of power to Congress, conferred by the commerce clause, does not give authority to extend its legislation throughout the entire sphere of legislation in the several states. Each state has exclusive control over all matters pertaining to its own internal police. It can establish and regulate ferries across its rivers, control the moving of vessels in its own harbors, and enact health and inspection laws, which, by quarantine or otherwise, may operate on persons coming within its jurisdiction in the course of commerce. King v. American Transp. Co. 1 Flipp. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 7,787.

fore the assessors shall certify to each county auditor the proportion of the gross assessments collectible by each county auditor under the scheme of apportionment among the counties provided by the act. To require the complainants to pay each of the numerous county auditors, and then sue to recover, or to enjoin each, would be most oppressive. We think, therefore, that the jurisdiction asserted in the bill, of avoiding a multiplicity of suits, was a sufficient ground to support the original bill, as well as the bills subsequently filed to enjoin the tax of 1894, assessed after the jurisdiction in the original case had attached. Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153-157, 25 L. ed. 903-905; State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575-618, sub nom. Taylor v. Secor, 23 L. ed. 663-675; Pacific Exp. Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. The power to regulate commerce covers a wide field, and embraces a great variety of subjects. Some of these subjects call for uniform rules and national legislation. Others can best be regulated by rules and provisions suggested by the varying circumstances of different localities, and limited in their operation to such localities respectively. To this extent the power to regulate commerce may be exercised by the states. Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. 713, 18 L. ed. 96.

In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce, it was never intended to cut the states off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 90, 23 L. ed. 819.

The principle established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States is that, in regard to the powers conferred by the commerce clause of the Constitution of the Union, there are some which, by their essential nature, are exclusive in Congress, and which the states can exercise under no circumstances; while there are others which, from their nature, may be exercised by the states until Congress shall see proper to cover the same ground by such legislation as that body may deem appropriate to the subject. Pound v. Turck, 95 U. S. 450, 24 L. ed. 525.

Not every state law which in effect regulates burdens or restricts commerce is repugnant to the Federal Constitution. When the regulations are distinctly local in character they are free of objection. Such are regulations regarding the speed of trains in or near cities and towns, precautions required in approaching bridges, tunnels, crossings, entering deep cuts, and rounding curves; and, generally, regulations respecting operations which may endanger the safety of the people. Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851.

Where commerce is not national in its character, so as to require a uniform system of regulation, the states may do many things to regulate it, and some that more or less affect commercial intercourse, without any violation of the Constitution. State v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 30 N. J. L. 473.

The question as to the constitutionality of the Nichols law under the Ohio Constitution must be regarded as conclusively settled for this court by the opinion of the highest court of the state of Ohio, as announced in the case of State ex rel. Poe v. Jones, 51 Ohio St. 492, 37 N. E. 945, heretofore cited. The objection that this court ought not to feel precluded by the opinion of the Ohio court, by reason of the made-up character of the suit in which that opinion was announced, is not satisfactory. It is true that the circuit court of the United States first obtained jurisdiction of the question as to the validity of the Nichols law under the Constitution of Ohio, and that that court, in a very vigorous and persuasive opinion, concluded that the Nichols law contravened the Constitution of Ohio, and was therefore invalid. The courts of Ohio had not theretofore passed upon the question, and the circuit court could not escape the duty of determining for itself the true meaning and construction of the Constitution of Ohio, so far as involved by the mode of assessment provided by the Nichols law. Before a final decree had been rendered, the supreme court of Ohio, in a case involving the validity of the same law, announced a contrary opinion, and held the Nichols law, as construed by the same court, an entirely valid law, so far as it was supposed to be affected by the state Constitution. Under the circumstances of this case, we think the duty of the circuit court was to accept the opinion of the Ohio court as conclusive, and to render judgment accordingly. The case

a. Corporate property.

1. Generally.

The fact that a corporation is engaged in foreign or interstate commerce even exclusively confers upon it no immunity from state taxes upon its property within the state imposing them, whether that property be tangible or intangible. Such property may be assessed specifically and in detail, or as an entirety in the aggregate. The property and assets within the taxing district may be inventoried or estimated according to any fair and equitable rule of proportion.

It was conceded in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 28 L. ed. 1067, and again in Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 311, 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 134, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380, that, although a telegraph company has accepted the restrictions and obligations of the act of Congress of July 24, 1866 (Rev. Stat. title 65, §§ 5263-5266, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 3579-3582), and is engaged in foreign and interstate commerce, yet, its property in a state is subject therein to taxation the same as any other property. And it was so decided in State ex rel. Gottlieb v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 165 Mo. 502, 65 S. W. 775, Affirmed in 190 U. S. 412, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 731.

A tax imposed by a state nominally upon the capital stock of a foreign telegraph company so accepting and thus engaged, but in effect on account of property owned and used by it within such state, the value of which is determined by the proportion of the length of its lines in such state to the entire length thereof everywhere, is not repugnant to the commerce clause. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961.

This decision, and a subsequent one between the same parties (141 U. S. 40, 35 L. ed. 628, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 889), established, as it was afterwards said, in reviewing one of the principal cases, that a statute of a state requiring a telegraph company to pay a tax upon its property within such state, valued at such a proportion of the whole value of its capital stock as the length of its lines in such state bears to the length of all its lines everywhere, deducting a 60 L. R. A.

sum equal to the value of its real estate and machinery subject to local taxation within the state, is constitutional. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart, 183 U. S. 1, 41 L. ed. 49, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1034.

The statutes of Massachusetts and Indiana, involved in these three cases, were said in the last to be indistinguishable in any material respect.

The validity of similar taxation under the statutes of Tennessee was affirmed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State, 9 Baxt. 509, 40 Am. Rep. 9.

Although a state statute provides that certain corporations shall, in addition to other taxes imposed by law, pay annually taxes upon their franchisees, both state and local, yet, when such provision is coupled with others requiring such corporations, both domestic and foreign, to furnish information to enable an assessing board to value their capital stocks, including their entire tangible and intangible property, wherever located, and requiring such board, after deducting the values of all tangible property everywhere assessed, to assess the tax imposed by such statute upon the balance, and, if the corporation assessed be a railroad, telegraph, express, etc., company operating a line extending beyond the state, then the proportion of the capital stock which the mileage in the state bears to the whole length must be taken as the value of the corporate franchise taxable,—the act does not lay a tax upon the occupation, nor a franchise tax, nor a tax upon business, but only one upon property claimed to be within the taxing jurisdiction; and, therefore, it is not in conflict with the commerce clause. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 13.

The state taxation of the track and rolling stock of a railroad owning and operating an interstate line in proportion to the trackage within such state to that of the whole line is not an interference with, or regulation of, commerce between the states, so as to conflict with the Federal Constitution. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 33 N. E. 421.

Property taxation rests solely on the value of the property taxed, never upon what it earns, nor upon the privilege of using it; but, as such value results from such use, and from the profit gained or expected from such use, and both the use and the profit, actual or anticipated, vary, the cash value of property for taxation often involves something created by the use to which it is put, and it is impossible so to segregate the value of any given property as to determine what part thereof results from any particular before it involved no rights or contracts between individuals which had been entered into upon the faith of earlier and conflicting decisions of either the courts of the United States or of the state, and therefore presented no question such as arose in Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 32, 27 L. ed. 364, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10, or Carroll County v. Smith, 111 U. S. 556, 28 L. ed. 517, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, or Douglass v. Pike Co. 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968, and Rowan v. Runnels, 5 How. 134, 12 L. ed. 85. Where the construction or validity of a state statute does not involve rights acquired upon the faith of earlier and conflicting decisions, it is the clear duty of Federal courts to accept and adopt the decisions of the highest court of a state in respect to the construction and conformity of state laws to the Constitution of the state. The decision of such questions properly belongs to the highest courts of the state. We entirely concur with the opinion of the circuit judge upon this question, who said:

"Here is not involved the validity or construction of a law on the faith of which individuals have made contracts, advanced money, or incurred liability. We have here simply a tax law fixing the obligation of artificial persons of a certain class to contribute to the support of the state. In respect of such a law, it would be anomalous and absurd to have a diversity of rulings between the state and Federal courts. The intolerable result of such a diversity would be that companies who could invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal court would not pay the tax, while all those who could not invoke that jurisdiction would be compelled to pay it. There is nothing in the decisions use and what does not; hence, the fact that railroad property, for instance, is used in general for commerce, a part of which is interstate and foreign, that has contributed and does contribute materially to the value of the property, does not relieve the value so created from taxation as property. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 439, 38 L. ed. 1041, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122.

A tax on transportation companies running sleeping cars over other lines partly within and partly out of the state, upon the mileage proportion basis, applying alike to both foreign and domestic corporations, does not burden interstate commerce. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Board of Assessors, 55 Fed. 206.

A state tax of a specified percentage on the value of a railroad, its rights, franchises, and property in the state, is a tax upon property as such located and used within the state, and, therefore, not repugnant to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. State v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 60 Conn. 326, 22 Atl. 765.

A tax imposed equally upon the capital of all corporations doing business within the state, both domestic and foreign ones, and whether engaged in external commerce or not, and laid on account of property within the state, is, in substance and effect, a tax upon the corporate property, and, when imposed upon a corporation engaged in interstate commerce, is not obnoxious to the Federal Constitution. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876.

The opinion was expressed in a decision made in 1902 by the supreme court of Minnesota, that a section of a statute of that state (An Act Providing for the Taxation of Freight Line and Equipment Companies, Laws 1897, chap. 160, § 5), exacting annually from each corporation of the kind designated that did business or owned cars operated in the state "a sum in the nature of an excise tax or license," to be computed by taking 2 per cent of the sum fixed by a state board of appraisers as the value of the proportion of the capital stock of such corporation owned and used in the state, less the value of the real estate assessed and taxed locally in such state, was not conflicting with the commerce clause. This conclusion was reached by reasoning that the state had power to tax property employed in interstate commerce, and none to tax the privilege of carrying on such commerce; and, as the legislature must be presumed to have intended to enact a constitutional law, therefore, the statute must be construed as one imposing a tax upon property, and not an excise 60 L. R. A.

upon privilege. The court, however, proceeded to decide that the statute was unconstitutional and void for violating the rule of uniformity and equality of taxation in the state Constitution, because it imposed an arbitrary specific property tax upon one class of corporations instead of subjecting such property to the general rate ad valorem. State v. Canda Cattle Car Co. 85 Minn. 457, 89 N. W. 66.

Under a statute for the taxation of domestic corporations upon their capital stock which is to be assessed at its actual value, the subject of taxation is at all times where the corporation is in law and in fact, although a portion of the capital is invested in sea-going ships carrying on commerce in remote parts of the world. People ex rel. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. New York City & County Tax Comrs. 1 Hun, 143, Affirmed in 58 N. Y. 243.

A state tax upon the capital stock of a foreign transportation company doing business in the taxing state, apportioned by the mileage method, does not violate the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. Com. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. 40.

A domestic corporation owning and operating exclusively an interstate bridge may be taxed, in spite of the commerce clause in the state in which it originated, upon its entire property and assets in such state, both tangible and intangible. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 953, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532.

A state may tax an interstate express company upon its property within such state, estimated as an entirety upon the mileage proportion basis, and assessed after deducting the value of all its tangible property within the state, without thereby violating the commerce clause. Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 171, 41 L. ed. 960, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527.

A statute for the assessment and taxation of the property within the enacting state of an interstate express company through the action of a state board of equalization, although the valuation is four times as high as the value of the furniture, fixtures, and realty reported by the corporation, and made by taking into consideration contracts with railroads and gross earnings, is not, by such action, rendered invalid as a burden upon interstate commerce. State ex rel. American Exp. Co. v. State Board, 8 S. D. 338, 53 N. W. 192.

2. Vehicles of commerce.

Property employed exclusively in commerce with foreign nations or among the several states, such as ships, railroad cars, telegraph poles and of the Supreme Court of the United States which gives the slightest warrant for supposing that, in the case of a state tax law, it would not follow the decision of the supreme court, whenever rendered, and however divergent from its own views the conclusion, provided no Federal question was involved. In the State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 617, 618, sub nom. Taylor v. Secor, 23 L. ed. 663, 674, the circuit court of the United States held that a tax law of Illinois was invalid because in violation of the state Constitution. Before the cases reached the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal, the supreme court of the state decided that the law was valid. The circuit court decree was accordingly reversed. It is true that in that case the Supreme Court of the United States concurred with the state court on the merits, but Justice Miller used this language: 'But if, for no other reason, we should reverse the decrees of the circuit court in these cases because the same questions involving the considerations urged upon us here have been decided by the supreme court of the state of Illinois in a manner which leads to the reversal of these. . . . As the whole matter, then, concerns the validity of a state law as affected by the Constitution of the state, that question and the other one of the true construction of that statute belong to the class of questions in regard to which this court still holds, with some few exceptions, that the decisions of the state courts are to be accepted as the rule of decisions for the Federal courts. It is, nevertheless, a satisfaction that our judgment concurs with that of the state court, and leads us to the same conclusions.' In Bauserman v. Blunt, 147 wires, and other vehicles, mobile or stationary, plainly constitutes a special class. The owners of such property have strenuously contended for its exemption from state taxes by reason of such exclusive use. This contention has uniformly and regularly been overruled.

It is well settled that there is nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States which prevents a state from taxing personal property employed in interstate or foreign commerce like other personal property within its jurisdiction. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876.

Vessels engaged in commerce, foreign or between the states, are taxable by the states wherein they have a situs, as property, ad valorem, and like any other property of their owners; but they cannot be taxed as instruments of commerce. State Tonnage Tax Cases, 12 Wall. 213, sub nom. Cox v. Lott, 20 L. ed. 370.

A steamboat engaged in interstate commerce is not exempt from taxation as a piece of property. Linehan R. Transfer Co. v. Pendergrass, 16 C. C. A. 585, 36 U. S. App. 48, 70 Fed. 1.

A tax on ships does not violate the Federal Constitution. If they are property within the jurisdiction of the taxing state the right to tax them is obvious. State ex rel. Ravenel v. Charleston, 4 Rich. L. 286.

A tax on money invested in shipping is no more a tax on, or regulation of, commerce than is a tax on stock in trade or money at interest. Each affects income, but does not increase or diminish the facilities by which commerce is conducted. Ibid.

The interest owned by a resident of the state in ships or vessels, whether in or out of port, is taxable ad valorem as other property belonging to him, notwithstanding they are employed in foreign or interstate commerce. Howell v. State, 3 Gill, 14.

And by the local authorities where he resides, particularly when he lives in the seaport where such vessels are registered. Gunther v. Baltimore, 55 Md. 457.

A state may lawfully levy a tax on steamboats and other vessels plying exclusively in its own waters and owned by its own citizens, although enrolled and licensed as coasting vessels under the laws of the United States. Lott v. Mobile Trade Co. 43 Ala. 578.

It may tax such steamboats although they are used in interstate commerce. Such a tax is in no sense a burden upon, an interference with or a regulation of, commerce between the states 60 L. R. A.

Perry v. Torrence, 8 Ohio, 522, 32 Am. Dec. 725.

Steamboats engaged in interstate commerce, and belonging to a domestic corporation, may be taxed as property ad valorem with all other property in the same jurisdiction at their home port, where they are enrolled, and where the officers of their corporate owner reside. Wheeling, P. & C. Transp. Co. v. Wheeling, 9 W. Va. 170, 27 Am. Rep. 552, Affirmed in 99 U. S. 273, 25 L. ed. 412.

The proposition just stated is supported by the decisions in Hays v. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. 17 How. 596, 15 L. ed. 254, and Morgan v. Parham, 16 Wall. 476, 21 L. ed. 304.

Tugs and barges belonging to a domestic corporation are taxable as property in the state which created their owner, although they are used in transporting coal mined in such state to another state in the course of interstate commerce, and notwithstanding they are registered in a foreign port, which, however, they never enter, and where they are not taxed. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Board of Public Works, 97 Va. 23, 32 S. E. 779.

A state may tax, as it taxes other property ad valorem, ships and vessels within its jurisdiction engaged in external commerce; but it must levy these taxes at the port of registry, and must not discriminate adversely to them, nor lay a duty of tonnage. Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 75, 28 L. ed. 655, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 38.

It cannot tax such vessels employed in its own waters when they belong to a foreign corporation and are registered at its domicile. Johnson v. DeBary-Haya Merchants' Line, 37 Fla. 499, 37 L. R. A. 518, 19 So. 640.

The mere physical presence of a vessel engaged in coasting trade within a given state does not entitle such state to tax it as property; neither does the fact that it is engaged in interstate commerce exempt it from such taxation. Its taxability as personal property depends upon its situs, and this is determined by its registry and the residence of its owner. Morgan v. Parham, 16 Wall. 471, 21 L. ed. 303.

A ferryboat plying daily between a city and another place, where its owner is domiciled, and where it is moored every night, and whence it begins in the morning its daily trips, although enrolled and registered at the port of such city, because the owner resides in the same collection district, has not such a situs within such city as to be taxable there as property. Mobile v. Baldwin, 57 Ala. 61, 29 Am. Rep. 712.

Boats registered and enrolled under the laws of the United States at a particular port are U. S. 647, 37 L. ed. 316, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466; Moore v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 104 U. S. 625, 26 L. ed. 870, and Green v. Neal, 6 Pet. 291, 8 L. ed. 402, the Supreme Court reversed the ruling of the circuit court as to the effect of a state statute of limitation solely because, after the decision by the circuit court, the supreme court of the state had given the statute a different construction. In Stutsman County v. Wallace, 142 U. S. 293, 35 L. ed. 1018, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 227, a case involving the construction of the tax laws of the territory of Dakota, the supreme court of the territory took one view. The case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States for review. Meantime the territory had become a state, and the state supreme court reversed the ruling of the territorial court. The Federal Supreme Court thereupon reversed the judgment of the territorial court in deference to the decision of the state court. See also Suydam v. Williamson, 24 How. 427, 13 L. ed. 742, and Fairfield v. Gallatin County, 100 U. S. 47, 25 L. ed. 544."

The suggestion that the opinion of the Ohio court should not be followed, because the suit in which it was announced had many features of a moot-court case, cannot be seriously entertained. The facts do show that a case was made up for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of that court in as summary a way as possible, and that it was intended as a test case. The facts now relied upon to destroy the effect of the decision were also made known to the Ohio court. The conclusion that court reached was that the case was one fairly under its jurisdiction, and that the validity of the Nichols law under the Ohio Constitution was pre-taxable there, although they belong to a foreign corporation, when their owner has its principal office in that port. St. Louis v. Consolidated Coal Co. 113 Mo. 83, 20 S. W. 699.

Unregistered vessels employed in interstate commerce, although without the state of their owner's domicile, are none the less taxable there,—at least, until it is proved that they are so permanently located beyond its jurisdiction as to have acquired a taxable situs elsewhere. Com. v. American Dredging Co. 122 Pa. 386, 1 L. R. A. 237, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 221, 15 Atl. 443.

Dredges without self-moving power, not enrolled or registered, or used in the carrying trade, nor designed so to be, although vessels within admiralty jurisdiction, are not instruments of commerce, and, hence, are taxable wherever they are found employed for a more or less definite period of time, whether such be the domicile of their owner or not. McRae v. Bowers Dredging Co. 90 Fed. 360.

This is said to be so, even when such boats come into the taxing jurisdiction to perform work for the National government. National Dredging Co. v. State, 99 Ala. 462, 12 So. 720.

A familiar mode of taxing commerce is by imposing on its vehicles a tonnage tax,—a duty on tonnage as the Constitution calls it. A grievous burden would be laid upon trade by a tax upon the vehicle in which it is carried on; as grievous as by regulations applying to the trade itself, or by taxes on the articles which are the subjects of trade; hence, the prohibition against a state's laying any duty of tonnage,—a prohibition in general terms, and not confined to any kind or kinds of commerce, or any class of vessels. Johnson v. Drummond, 20 Gratt. 416.

Railroad rolling stock is not exempt from taxation as property, by a state in which it is located, because it is used in interstate commerce. Reinhart v. McDonald, 76 Fed. 403.

And when it belongs to a domestic railroad corporation it is assessable at the principal office of the company, unless otherwise directed by statute. Appeal Tax Court v. Western Maryland R. Co. 50 Md. 274; Appeal Tax Court v. Northern C. R. Co. 50 Md. 417.

But it does not follow that the terminal of a railroad that extends into three states is to be regarded as its domicile, so as to authorize local officials to levy taxes upon its rolling stock in virtue of a general property-tax act. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Appeal Tax Court, 50 Md. 397.

Under statutes for taxing railroad rolling stock exclusively used in railroading by domestic corporations, a state may tax sleeping cars 60 L. R. A.

used by one of its own companies, although they are owned by a foreign corporation, and are employed in interstate commerce. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Church, 17 Colo. 1, 28 Pac. 468.

Railroad cars engaged in interstate commerce, although owned and used by a foreign corporation, may be taxed as property in a state where they are in use. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Hayward, 141 U. S. 36, 35 L. ed. 621, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 883.

While ships or vessels engaged in interstate or foreign commerce upon the high seas or other waters, which are a common highway, and having a home port where they are registered under Federal laws at the domicile of their owners, are not taxable in another state at whose ports they incidentally and temporarily touch to deliver or receive passengers and freight, it is because, unlike railroad cars, they are not in any proper sense abiding within the limits of such state, and have no continuous presence or actual situs within its jurisdiction, and, hence, are only taxable at their legal situs, the home port and owner's domicile, and not because they are instruments of commerce. Ibid.

The three dissenting justices in these cases (Bradley, Field, and Harlan, JJ.) did not deny that railroad cars and ships were taxable as property, even when employed in interstate and foreign commerce; but they insisted that there was no essential difference between the two; that one was no more taxable than the other; that both were taxable at the domicile of their owner; and that neither was taxable in another state, where they were transiently present in the transactions of commerce. Ibid.

A state may lawfully tax railroad cars belonging to a foreign corporation that has no place of business within it, and which are in use by a domestic corporation employing them in interstate commerce, although such cars are constantly in transit to and fro across the state. And it may lay such tax according to the average number of such cars in use. American Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Hall, 174 U. S. 70, 43 L. ed. 899, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 599, Affirming 24 Colo. 291, 56 L. R. A. 89, 51 Pac. 421; Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Lynch, 177 U. S. 149, 44 L. ed. 708, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631, Affirming 18 Utah, 378, 48 L. R. A. 790, 55 Pac. 639; Dubuque v. Illinois C. R. Co. 39 Iowa, 56; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Twombly, 29 Fed. 658; Orleans v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 8 C. C. A. 490, 23 U. S. App. 180, 60 Fed. 37.

A state has the right to tax sleeping cars engaged solely in business between two of its sented in a way to give jurisdiction and demand decision. That it was in reality a friendly suit does not detract from the weight of the court's opinion as an opinion. The case was argued and duly considered. Opportunity was given the present able counsel, then and now representing the complainants, to appear and argue the case. We think that due respect for the high tribunal who heard and decided the case requires that we shall accept its judgment that the case was not a moot case, but was one entitled to be heard and decided. This was the conclusion of the circuit court, and meets our approval.

Being of opinion that the decision of the supreme court of the state removes from this case all questions of conflict between the act and the Constitution of the state, there remains for consideration the question as to whether there is in the act, as construed by the state court, or as administered, any violation of rights secured by the Federal Constitution to the complainants. The law under which the assessments complained of were made is entitled: "An Act to Amend and Supplement Sections 2777, 2778, 2778a and 2780 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio." Section 2778a is the only one which needs to be set out, and is as follows:

"Sec. 2778a. Every express, telegraph, and telephone company embraced in § 2777, whether chartered by the laws of this state or by any other state or country, doing business in this state, shall, annually, between the 1st and 10th day of May, return to the auditor of state under the oath of its treasurer, the amount of its capital stock, its place of business, the par value and market value (or if there be no market value, then own cities; and, so far as Federal authority is concerned, the power of such taxation is plenary. Gibson County v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 42 Fed. 572.

Two cases, however, hold that the rolling stock of a foreign railroad corporation, although more or less in use within another state in the course of interstate commerce, have no situs for taxation outside of the state of their owner's domicile. Appeal Tax Court v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 50 Md. 452; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Allen, 22 Fed. 376.

A foreign railroad corporation which in another state leases and operates a railroad line, is taxable upon the rolling stock used and remaining permanently in such state, but not upon the rolling stock passing through such state in the course of interstate commerce. Bain v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 105 N. C. 363, 8 L. R. A. 209, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 149, 11 S. E. 311. The court rested its conclusion upon the ground that the state could not tax the vehicles of interstate commerce, and, while these were employed therein by a nonresident owner, they had no taxable situs in the state; but it was otherwise as to property kept all the time within the state.

Refrigerator cars belonging to a corporation, chartered in one state and doing business in another, used exclusively to carry its own products to markets for sale, and running upon railroads in a third state either entirely through it or to different places within it, are instruments of interstate commerce, and beyond the reach of taxation in such third state. State ex rel. Armour Packing Co. v. Stephens, 146 Mo. 662, 48 S. W. 929.

Bridges spanning waters between two states, and belonging to corporations chartered by both, are taxable as property in each in proportion to the quantity of structure lying within either boundary. State, Delaware & E. Bridge Co., Prosecutor, v. Metz, 29 N. J. L. 122; State, Easton Bridge, Prosecutor, v. Metz, 31 N. J. L. 378; State, Easton Delaware Bridge Co., Prosecutor, v. Metz, 32 N. J. L. 199; St. Louis Bridge Co. v. East St. Louis, 121 Ill. 238, 12 N. E. 723; St. Louis Bridge Co. v. People, 125 Ill. 226, 17 N. E. 468; State ex rel. Glenn v. Mississippi River Bridge Co. 109 Mo. 253, 19 S. W. 421; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Nebraska City, 53 Neb. 453, 73 N. W. 952.

But such a bridge may escape municipal taxation by reason of being not technically within the municipal limits. Louisville Bridge Co. v. Louisville, 81 Ky. 189, 60 L. R. A.

If, however, it is so placed that the city police power extends over it, and it enjoys the benefits of the city government and public improvements, it is subject to local taxation. Covington v. Bridge Co. 7 Ky. L. Rep. 683.

Such a bridge, too, in Kentucky, is taxable to the low-water mark on the Indiana shore of the Ohio river. Louisville Bridge Co. v. Louisville, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 703, 58 S. W. 598.

The poles and wires used by telegraph and telephone companies in the transmission of messages have been subjected to taxation chiefly by municipalities in which they are situated, and in virtue of the police power. As has been shown above, such transmission is commerce, and the business carried on over such poles and wires is to a greater or less extent interstate and foreign commerce, while the poles and wires are as much instrumentalities of commerce as are ships and railroad cars, differing only in mobility.

Municipal ordinances imposing annual charges upon each telegraph pole and mile of wire within the municipality, in the exercise of a police power of regulation and inspection when operating against a foreign corporation carrying on an interstate and foreign telegraph business, are not in conflict with the commerce clause in the United States' Constitution. Philadelphia v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 67 Hun, 21, 21 N. Y. Supp. 536.

But a state statute making it the duty of every telegraph company working or controlling a line within the state to report upon oath of its executive officer, on or before a named date, annually, to the state auditor a full statement of each line and of the whole number of miles worked or managed in the state, and to pay yearly into the state treasury a tax equal to $100 per mile of poles, and a single wire thereon, with 50 cents a mile for each additional wire, is, when applied to a foreign corporation engaged in transmitting messages between several states, void for conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Com. v. Smith, 92 Ky. 38, 17 S. W. 187.

A city has a right, by municipal ordinance, to impose a reasonable charge for the use of the streets upon each telegraph and telephone pole set up therein, notwithstanding the commerce clause and the act of Congress giving telegraph companies post-road privileges. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Baltimore, 79 Md. 502, 24 L. R. A. 161, 29 Atl. 819.

A municipality is not prevented by the commerce clause from ordering the removal of telephone poles which have become so decayed and so heavily laden with wires as to be no longer safe, the actual value) of its shares at the time of said return. The return shall also contain a statement in detail of the entire real and personal property of said company, and where located, and the value thereof as assessed for taxation; the telegraph and telephone companies shall, in addition thereto, return the whole length of their lines, and the length of so much of their lines as is without and as is within the state of Ohio, which lines shall include what said telegraph and telephone companies control and use under lease or otherwise; and said board of appraisers and assessors shall, in the determining the value of the property of said companies in this state, to be taxed within the state and assessed as herein provided, be guided by the value of said property as determined by the value of the entire capital stock of said company, and such other evidence and rules as will enable said board to arrive at the true value in money of the entire property of said companies within the state of Ohio, in the proportion which the same bears to the entire property of said company, as determined by the value of the capital stock thereof, and the other evidence and rules as aforesaid. Express companies shall, in making said returns, include therein, as a part thereof a statement of their entire gross receipts for the year ending the 1st day of May, of the business done within the state of Ohio, giving the receipts of each office in said state, and the location thereof for said year."

By § 2780b, the assessors are required to deduct from the total value of the property of said companies, as ascertained and determined by § 2778, the valuation of any and all real estate, as assessed for taxation, situate even if it be granted that telephonic communication between different states is interstate commerce. Michigan Teleph. Co. v. Charlotte, 93 Fed. 11.

A municipal ordinance requiring every telegraph, telephone, and electric-light pole in the city to be inspected by the police department, and to be licensed, and imposing upon each corporation maintaining such poles a yearly license tax of $1 for each pole it maintains, is a reasonable exercise of the police power; and, when applied to a foreign telegraph company carrying on its business all over the Union, is not repugnant to the commerce clause. Allentown v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 Pa. 117, 23 Atl. 1070; Chester v. Philadelphia, R. & P. Teleg. Co. 148 Pa. 120, 23 Atl. 1070; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 22 W. N. C. 39, 12 Atl. 144.

A municipality has a right to impose a license tax upon telegraph poles and wires within its limits, although they are employed for transmitting messages between states. Philadelphia v. American U. Teleg. Co. 167 Pa. 406, 31 Atl. 628.

When a municipality has no authority to tax telegraph companies for revenue, but only a police power to regulate and charge license fees, an ordinance imposing upon such a corporation license charges for occupying the city streets with its poles and wires, that amount in the aggregate to $16,000 annually, while the cost of supervision and control, and of protecting persons and property on account thereof, has been for several years, and still is, but $3,500 yearly, is unreasonable and void,—an attempt to tax for revenue, and not a police regulation. Philadelphia v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 728, 40 Fed. 615.

In the later litigation between the same parties, 81 Fed. 948, 82 Fed. 797, Reversed for error in excluding testimony offered, in 32 C. C. A. 246, 60 U. S. App. 398, 89 Fed. 454, the controversy was waged over the question of the reasonableness of a charge of $1 per pole and $2.50 additional per mile of overhead wires avowedly for inspection and regulation. It was conceded that state taxes could be laid upon the property of foreign corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and that reasonable municipal license taxes might be imposed with respect of poles and wires as police regulations.

In the litigation of the same company with St. Louis, Missouri, it was at first held that a municipal ordinance requiring all telegraph and telephone companies, not taxed for city purposes on their gross incomes from and after a named date, to pay the city a specific sum annually for the occupation of the streets with poles and wires for each pole erected or used, was void for conflict with the commerce clause. St. Louis I. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Fed. 59.

But this decision was reversed by the Supreme Court, and that tribunal held that the exaction was not a tax, either upon property or privilege, but rather a charge for compensation for use of streets, like a rental; also, that a charge of $5 per pole could not be said to be so unreasonable as to be void upon its face. Id. 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485.

Upon the new trial in the court below, the ordinance was held void upon the double ground that it violated contract rights and imposed unreasonable charges. Id. 63 Fed. 68.

A license fee charged by a borough for each telegraph pole set up, and each mile of telegraph wire strung within its limits, and exacted from a corporation engaged in using such poles and wires for foreign and interstate commerce, not being a tax upon the corporate property, or on the transmission of messages, or on the receipts from messages, or upon the business or occupation of telegraphing, but a charge for local governmental supervision, is not, when reasonable in amount, obnoxious to the commerce clause. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New Hope, 187 U. S. 419, 47 L. ed. 240, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 204.

A municipal license charge upon each pole and mile of wire of an interstate telegraph corporation is prima facie reasonable, and the reasonableness of the regulations prescribed in respect thereto in the exercise of the police power is a question for the court,—but, whether a money-license charge is reasonable or unreasonable must be left to the determination of the jury. And what is reasonable in one municipality may be oppressive in another. Atlantic & P. Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817.

b. Freight carried by interstate carriers.

The statute enacted August 25, 1864, by the legislature of Pennsylvania, to provide additional revenue for the commonwealth's use, provided, in substance, that, in addition to taxes already imposed by law, every railroad, steamboat, canal, slackwater navigation, or other transportation company doing business in that state, should make quarterly returns of the number of tons of freight carried or moved by it during the previous three months, and should pay taxes per ton at the rates of, first, 2 cents on products of mines, second, 3 cents on farm and forest products and animal and vegetable in the state, and on which said companies pay taxes.

All of the complainant companies are corporations of states other than Ohio, and each has its principal office in another state. The questions presented by each separate bill are, in substance, the same. For purposes of convenience, we shall consider the averments in the bill of the Adams Express Company as presenting substantially the ground for relief made by each of the other complainants. That bill avers that much the greater part of its business done in Ohio is in the transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise from points within the state to points in other states, and from points without the state to points within; that it owns no line of railroad in the state of Ohio, but conducts its business under contracts with the owners of such railroads; that it owns no real estate in the state, except such as is used for stabling horses used by them in the collection and distribution of goods, wares, and merchandise, and that the personal property within the state consists entirely of office furniture and tools, horses, and wagons; that the actual cash value of its personal property in the state of Ohio in 1893 did not exceed the sum of $53,500, and that the total value of its real estate within the state does not exceed $25,170, and that all taxes on this real property have been paid; that the assessment for 1893 made against the said company was $460,033.38; that the whole number of shares in the said company is 120,000, and that the market value of the shares ranged during the year preceding from $1.40 to $1.50 upon the dollar, a price which the bill avers is greatly in excess of the actual value of all the property foods, and, third, 5 cents on merchandise, manufactures, and all other articles. The tax was laid without discrimination, equally upon carriers whose lines extended beyond the state and those whose lines were wholly within it, and it applied as well to freight brought into and carried out of the state as to that taken up and set down within it. The Dauphin county common pleas, in Com. v. Erie R. Co. 1 Pearson (Pa.) 345, and in Com. v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 1 Pearson (Pa.) 379, held this act unconstitutional for violation of the commerce clause.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania was of the opposite opinion, and reversed these decisions in the Tonnage Tax Cases. Com. v. Erie R. Co. 62 Pa. 286, 1 Am. Rep. 399. According to the view of that tribunal the statute imposed, not so much a tax, as an imposition in the nature of a charge for facilities granted, or as compensation for the use of public works, or for acquisitions under the power of eminent domain, or a royalty for a franchise or privilege granted; and, therefore, it held that, even in the case of freight brought into, carried through, or shipped out of, the state, there was no burden on, regulation of, or interference with, interstate commerce.

In deference to this ruling, the Dauphin county common pleas afterwards sustained a tonnage tax under this act, in Com. v. Monongahela Nav. Co. 2 Pearson (Pa.) 372, although of the opinion that the tax was void by the Federal Constitution. The court did not doubt the power of the state to tax freight taken up and delivered within its own borders, but it denied its power to tax goods in transit, and thought it equally clear, but for the contrary decision of its own supreme court, that power was wanting in a state to tax freight brought from, or carried to, points beyond the state lines on account of transportation. It followed a decision deemed unsound, to the end that the case might proceed directly to the United States Supreme Court instead of coming back for a new trial.

When the decision of the Pennsylvania supreme court, just cited, came before the Supreme Court of the United States for review in the State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall. 232, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 148, counsel for the state, in a display of great learning, and with marked ability, contended: (1) That the power conferred by the Federal Constitution upon Congress to regulate foreign, interstate, and Indian tribal commerce did not, ipso facto, divest the states of all power to do likewise, but that the state power in the premises still existed in all its pristine vigor until Congress enacted laws, or a law, governing the subject; (2) that the Pennsylvania statute, sub judice, taxing all railroads within the state a stated sum for every ton of freight they carried, both internal and external, imposed a franchise tax measured by tonnage or business done, and was not in any case such a regulation of commerce as fell within the purview of the commerce clause granting it to confer exclusive power on Congress. These contentions did not prevail. The court held that freight carried from state to state was interstate commerce, and not subject to a state tax, although there has been no regulation by Congress upon that subject. Whatever, it said, may be the true doctrine respecting the exclusiveness of the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the states, we regard it as established that no state can impose a tax upon freight transported from state to state, or upon the transporter because of such transportation.

A tax on the freight or tonnage carried from one state to another, it further held, is a regulation of commerce, and cannot be imposed by a state, even upon its own domestic corporations engaged in such carriage. And when a state tax is, in express terms, laid upon freight carried by a railroad,—as where the carrier is required to pay the state a tax at specified rates on each 2,000 lbs. of freight carried,—and such tax is not proportioned to the business done in transportation, but is the same whether the freight is moved a mile or 300 miles, and, though carried by several connecting lines on a continuous journey, the tax is to be paid by whichever one line the state treasurer calls upon, and freight carriers are authorized to add the tax to the tolls,—the tax plainly rests upon the freight carried, and not upon the franchise or business of the carrier. Such a tax, so far as it attaches to freight carried from or to places beyond the boundaries of the state, is void for conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Ibid.

The constitutionality of a state tax, said Strong, J., who expressed the views of the majority of the court in that case, is to be determined, not by the form or agency through which it is to be collected, but by the subject on which the burden is laid. And, again, he says: As there is no limit to the rate of taxation she (the state of Pennsylvania) may impose, if she can tax at all, it is obvious the condition may be made so onerous that an exchange of commodities with other states would be impossible. And, he adds, in substance, nor of said company. It avers that the scheme of taxation set forth in the act, "while professing to require the taxation of property in the state of Ohio, does not in fact do so, inasmuch as it directs the said board of appraisers and assessors, in ascertaining and assessing the value of the property of express companies in Ohio, to be 'guided by' and to 'determine the value' of the company's property in the said state 'by the value of the company's capital stock.'" It also alleges that the value of its capital is fixed and determined by the nature, extent, and uses of its property, not only in Ohio, but in many other states of the United States, and by the skill, diligence, fidelity, and success with which its business is conducted in all these states; that it employs many thousands of men, who are constantly engaged as messengers in carrying goods, wares, and merchandise from one part of the country to another, and otherwise, and that its income is largely the result of their efforts; that it "owns valuable securities of other companies, and holds valuable contracts and business arrangements with other corporations, and all of these, none of which are held and owned in the state of Ohio, and many of them not taxable at all, together with the good will which it has earned in the course of more than fifty years of service to the public in said business, go to make up the value of the shares of its capital." It further complains that the act does not provide a method for taxation of property according to its true value in money, "but is really an attempt to enforce against express, telegraph, and telephone companies the payment of a tax for the privilege of doing business within the said state by placing a fic-can it make any difference that the purpose of the law is revenue, and not regulation. It is not the purpose, but the effect, that is to be considered. Ibid.

Swayne, J., dissented, taking the ground that the statute in question imposed a tax on the business of those required to pay it, and that the tonnage was only a mode of ascertaining the extent of such business. He thought the fact that the act made no discrimination between internal and external carriage of freight conclusive on this point. Ibid.

Argued with this case, and decided the same way, was Erie R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 15 Wall. 282, 21 L. ed. 164.

A state law making it unlawful for any domestic coal-mining company or association to transport by rail, canal, or vessel any coal mined in the state to any place in the state or elsewhere for sale until a state tax of 2 cents a long ton be first paid on such coal to the carrier for the use of the state, and requiring every carrier to collect, in advance, such tax before receiving at any mine coal for transportation for sale; with additional provisions for returns, payment to state officials, and penalties for noncompliance, and for the remission to coal-mining companies that pay such tax of other taxes on their capital stock,—imposes a tax upon the transportation of property beyond the state, and is unconstitutional and void under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. State v. Cumberland & P. R. Co. 40 Md. 22. Three members of the court dissented in this case, deeming the tax one laid, not upon transportation, but upon coal-mining corporations, measured by their output.

A state statute providing that all corporations regularly doing business in the enacting state, and not being domestic ones, shall be assessed and taxed for and in respect of the business done by them within the state, a transit duty of a specified sum on every passenger and ton of freight carried by or for any such corporation, or on any railroad or canal within the state for any distance beyond 10 miles (except passengers and freight transported exclusively within the state); and requiring such transit duty for railroad and canal transportation to be paid to the state treasurer annually in January for the transactions of the preceding year, according to sworn statements of the number of passengers and tons of freight carried furnished each year,—does not conflict with the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. State v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 30 N. J. L. 473.

c. Traffic.

1. Beginning.

Whenever a commodity has begun to move as an article of trade from one state to another, commerce in that commodity between the states has commenced. The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 909.

But this movement does not begin until the article has been shipped or started for transportation from the one state to the other. Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475.

No definite rule, says the court in the latter case, has been adopted as to the point of time when the taxing power of the state ceases as to goods exported to a foreign country or to another state. The view which seems to us the sound one on that subject is that goods do not cease to be part of the general mass of property in the state, subject, as such, to its jurisdiction, until they have been shipped or entered with a common carrier for transportation to another state, or have been started on such transportation in a continuous route or journey. We think that this must be the true rule on the subject. The products of a state, although they are intended by their owner to be exported to another state, and are partially prepared for such purpose by being deposited at a place or port of shipment within the state, are not free from state taxation as exports. Ibid.

When the products of the farm or the forest are collected and brought in from the surrounding country to a town or station serving as an entrepôt for that particular region, whether on a river or a line of railroad, such products are not yet exports, nor are they in process of exportation, nor is exportation begun until they are committed to the common carrier for transportation out of the state to the state of their destination, or have started on their ultimate passage to that state. Until then it is not only reasonable to regard them as not only within the state of their origin, but as part of the general mass of property of that state subject to its jurisdiction and liable to taxation, & not taxed by reason of their being intended for exportation, but taxed without any discrimination in the usual way and manner in which such property is taxed in the state. Ibid.

The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another state does not, of itself, make it an article of interstate commerce within the meaning of the Constitution, and the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the control of the state and belongs to commerce. Kidd titious value upon their property;" "that the said pretended law is a tax upon interstate commerce, inasmuch as it attempts to establish an artificial and fictitious basis for the valuation for taxation of the property of your orator in this state, a valuation which is determined by the value of its property in other states and by reference in part to its earnings and gains in this state from business which is largely interstate;" that, in making the assessment complained of, the assessors "were guided by the value of one share of your orator's capital, and in all other respects as directed by the act." In conclusion, the bill avers that the method of taxation is unfair, unjust, and unequal, "inasmuch as it requires your orator to pay taxes in Ohio upon property situated in other states, upon which it pays taxes according to its value, and upon its gains and earnings in localities outside of the state of Ohio, in which its gains and earnings are very much larger than those derived from an equal number of miles of line operated by it in Ohio."

By amendment, the minutes of the board and an affidavit of E. W. Poe, one of the board, and a defendant, were incorporated as parts of the bill. From these it appears that the complainants had actual notice of the meetings of the board, appeared and explained their returns, and were heard by counsel; that, in the testimony of the agents of complainants, information as to the character in detail of the property of these companies in the state, and the character of the business done, was laid before the board; and that supplementary statements were filed (not under oath) showing that the total value of the real estate of the Ad-

v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6.

A tax laid upon each ton of coal mined by corporations is a tax on the business of mining, and not upon commerce; and, therefore, although the coal is intended for transportation beyond the borders of the state, the tax is not violative of the commerce clause. Com. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co. 2 Pearson (Pa.) 402.

Corn purchased by a foreigner and moved from its place of growth to a railroad station and there temporarily stored in cribs awaiting shipment, intended to be removed from the state as soon as a favorable opportunity for transportation presents itself, and not in fact sold, used, or manufactured in such state, has no situs for taxation at its temporary resting place, because its commercial transit has begun. Ogilvie v. Crawford County, 2 McCrary, 148, 7 Fed. 745.

But ice cut within a state and there kept in storage until the market is ready to take it, when it is shipped to the domicile of the owner, a foreign corporation, for distribution from its office in another state, is not, while so stored, property in transit, and is, therefore, taxable as personal property in the state of its origin, without violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. State, John Hancock Ice Co., Prosecutor, v. Rose (N. J. L.) 50 Atl. 364.

Logs, after they have been inspected pursuant to state laws, in possession of persons engaged exclusively in exporting timber to foreign countries, purchased in the state for the purpose of exportation, and lying in a seaport of such state awaiting shipment abroad, and in process of such shipment, are exports within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, and so exempt from state and county taxes at such seaport. Clarke v. Clarke, 3 Woods, 408, Fed. Cas. No. 2,846.

Timber so circumstanced, belonging to an alien having contracts of sale to foreigners, and in part actually exported before the owners of personal property are required to make their returns for taxation, and the rest of it shipped within a few months thereafter, must be regarded as segregated from the mass of property in the state, and to be exports not taxable therein. Blount v. Munroe, 60 Ga. 61.

A tax or duty on a bill of lading, although differing in form from a duty on the article shipped, is, in substance, the same thing, for it, or a like instrument, is necessarily always associated with every shipment of articles of commerce from one port to another. Hence, a state law to provide a revenue from stamp taxes upon 60 L. R. A.

written instruments, in so far as it requires bills of lading for transporting gold or silver in coin, dust, or ingots, from within to places without the state, to bear stamps expressing in value the amount of the tax or duty laid, lays an impost or duty upon exports, and, therefore, is unconstitutional. Almy v. California, 24 How. 169, 16 L. ed. 644.

Strong, J., afterwards, in the State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall, 232, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 146, criticised this decision as assigning the wrong reason. The statute should have been declared void, in his opinion, because it was a regulation of commerce.

Recently the United States Supreme Court annulled, as an unconstitutional tax or duty on exports, the act of Congress of June 13, 1898 (30 Stat. at L. 448, § 6, chap. 448, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2201), so far as it required stamps to be affixed to foreign bills of lading. Fairbank v. United States, 181 U. S. 283, 45 L. ed. 862, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648.

But the constitutional prohibition against laying any tax or duty on articles exported from any state is not infringed by the provisions of the internal revenue act requiring distinguishing stamps to be attached to packages of tobacco intended for export at the warehouse of the manufacturer, because, under the rule laid down in Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475, such packages do not take on the character of exports until they leave the manufacturer and actually begin their journey. Turpin v. Burgess, 117 U. S. 504, 29 L. ed. 988, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 835.

2. In transit.

To prevent the taxation of property at the place of its location on the ground that it is in transit, there must be the fixed purpose to have it proceed on its journey within a reasonable time. It is not enough that it is intended to be removed at some time in the future, dependent upon contingencies. State Trust Co. v. Chehalis County, 24 C. C. A. 584, 48 U. S. App. 190, 79 Fed. 282.

Property actually in course of transportation to another state, temporarily delayed en route, is not taxable at the place of detention. It has no situs there, and is in course of interstate commerce. Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Com. 1 Monaghan, 86, 1 L. R. A. 232, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 222, 17 Atl. 175.

When freight destined for a market without the state has been delivered to a carrier, and has actually begun its journey, it is as much beyond the reach of state taxation when that ams Express Company was $3,050,272.47, and of the personality $1,034,481.43, and that the total value of the real estate of the American Express Company was $4,956,585.63, and of its personality $1,742,402.04. No statement as to the total value of the realty or personality of the United States Express Company was given. By schedules filed, the value of the personal property at each office in the state was given, and the gross receipts from business done in the state at each office was also shown. This affidavit further sets out that "in the statement of the Adams Express Company were included reports from 363 offices. From 2 of these offices the personal property was returned at a value of less than $1; from 72 offices the personal property in each instance was returned at a value of over $1; from 51 offices the personal property was returned at a value of over $1, and under $2. Thus, from 125 offices of the Adams Express Company the personal property was returned at less than $2. In the statement of the American Express Company there were reports from 302 offices, and from but 46 of these offices was there any return of personal property. In the statement of the United States Express Company there were reports from 417 offices, and from only 95 of these offices were there any returns of personal property. Neither of the express companies made any return of safes, pouches, or other personal property, or the value thereof, used on the railroad lines in this state in the transaction of its business. In arriving at the value of the property of these express companies taxable in Ohio, the board did not follow any fixed rule, except the rule that property in Ohio is ordinarily taxed at not more than journey is temporarily interrupted as it is while in motion on the cars. Com. v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 22 W. N. C. 525.

Coal belonging to a foreign association of nonresidents, mined in one state and sent by rail to a distributing station in another, thence to be shipped by water to a market in a third state, is not taxable under an assessment to commission agents in whose custody it is while lying on the wharf at such station to be assorted into sizes and shipped as fast as cargoes of particular sizes can be made up and vessels secured to transport them; because, first, the agents are not the proper persons to assess under the terms of the controlling statute, and, second, such coal is in commercial transit and has no situs for taxation at such distributing station, and any attempt to tax it there would be futile in view of the commerce clause. State, Detmold, Prosecutor, v. Engle, 34 N. J. L. 425.

A foreign corporation engaged in mining coal in its home state, the great bulk of which it sends from the mines to tide water across another state to market in a third, but of which it delivers in the intervening state from railroad cars on side tracks, some, but only to fill orders previously taken outside of such intermediate state, is not taxable in the middle state, either upon the coal delivered there, or upon the greater quantity lying for a longer or shorter time on the docks at tide water awaiting facilities for shipment to its final market. State, Lehigh & W. Coal Co., Prosecutor, v. Carrigan, 39 N. J. L. 35.

Logs cut in one state, and drawn to a river between it and another state, and there temporarily left upon the ice awaiting the opening of navigation to proceed to a third state, where are the mills and domicile of their owner, following such course in a reasonable time, are exempt as property in transitu in the intervening state. Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. Columbia, 62 N. H. 286.

While it is true that property in transitu on a navigable stream from one state to another is not taxable in an intermediate state, where it is temporarily detained en voyage, yet, where the owner has for several years used a harbor in the intervening state as a safe place to store, through the winter, such property, to be drawn from as he requires it, and has kept an agent there in charge of it, and rented privileges for its accommodation, such property has a sufficient situs at its resting place to make it taxable there. Burlington Lumber Co. v. Willetts, 118 Ill. 559, 9 N. E. 254; Schulenberg-Boeckler Lumber Co. v. Willetts (Ill.) 6 West. Rep. 534.

Staves purchased by a foreign corporation and transported to a railroad station and piled there awaiting shipment without the state to the city where the owner has its domicile, to be there made into casks, where there is no purpose to dispose of them in any way in the state where they temporarily lie, are in transit from such state, and have no situs therein for taxation. Standard Oil Co. v. Bachelor, 89 Ind. 1.

When, however, such staves are stacked at a receiving station, and there made to undergo a process of shaping and trimming to make them of uniform length and thickness before shipment, they then become taxable at such station, although held there for no other purpose than to finish and ship as in the former case. Standard Oil Co. v. Combs, 96 Ind. 179, 49 Am. Rep. 156; Brown County v. Standard Oil Co. 103 Ind. 302, 2 N. E. 758.

Certainly, says Bradley, J., in his dissenting opinion in Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876, property merely carried through a state cannot be taxed by the state. Such a tax would be a duty which the state cannot impose. If a drove of cattle is driven through Pennsylvania from Illinois to New York for the purpose of being sold in New York, whilst in Pennsylvania it may be subject to the police regulations of the state, but it is not subject to taxation there.

A flock of sheep driven by direct route from one state across another to a third, proceeding at a daily average rate, is the subject of interstate commerce, and is not to be subjected to taxation under a statute of the middle state taxing live stock brought into such state for grazing, although the flock on the journey is allowed to graze over a strip of land along its route a quarter of a mile wide. Kelley v. Rhoads, 188 U. S. 1, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 259, Reversing 9 Wyo. 352, 63 Pac. 935.

The law, so far as interstate commerce is concerned, is settled, that property actually in transit is exempt from local taxation, although, if it be stored for an indefinite time during such transit,—at least for other than natural causes or lack of facilities for immediate transportation,—it may be lawfully assessed by the local authorities. Ibid.

The substance of the cases of Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1091; Pittsburg & S. Coal Co. v. Bates, 156 U. S. 577, 39 L. ed. 538, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 30, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415; and Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475,—is, it was said in this case, that while property is at rest for an indefinite time await-two thirds of its actual value, and the law governing this board. The board considered the facts, already stated, set out in the returns and supplementary statements, and also other facts in said returns and in the testimony of the authorized agents of the companies who appeared before the board. For purposes of comparison, the board examined the gross receipts returned by these companies in preceding years. Taking all the information the board had or could secure, the value of the capital stock of the company, its gross receipts within Ohio, the return of the personal property made, and the character thereof, and evidence of undervaluations and omissions therein, the number of officers, the amount of business done, the nature and value of the property and capital required to carry on such business, and other evidence and information, the board, in each instance, ascertained what it considered the fair proportion of the property of the company employed by it in Ohio, and fixed the value of the property of such company situate and taxable therein; being guided, in determining the value of the property, by the value of the entire capital stock, and other evidence and information before the board."

There is no ground for complaint that the assessments were made without due process of law. The complainants had notice of the time and place where the board would meet, and were required to make a sworn return of their property. The time and place were fixed by the law, and its sessions were not secret. In State ex rel. Poe v. Jones, 51 Ohio St. 492, 37 N. E. 945, heretofore cited, the supreme court of Ohio construed the act as entitling the companies "to be present ing transportation or sale, at its place of destination, or at an intermediate point, it is subject to taxation. But if it be actually in transit to another state it becomes the subject of interstate commerce, and is exempt from local assessment. Ibid.

Quoting this statement in the next decision upon the point, wherein was sustained a tax laid by Michigan upon logs cut in her forests and floated by water to a railroad station, and there assessed while awaiting embarkation to a point beyond the state, it was added: In further specification, we may say that the cases establish that there may be an interior movement of property which does not constitute interstate commerce, though the property come from, or be destined to, another state. In the one case, though it has not reached its place of disembarkation or delivery, it may be taxed. In the other case, until it be shipped or started on its final journey, it may be taxed. The case at bar falls within this principle. Diamond Match Co. v. Ontonagon, 188 U. S. 82, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 266.

3. Termination.

The courts have not always found it easy to decide when foreign or interstate commerce in a given subject ended so as to permit the state to tax it.

The early and leading case on the subject established four propositions, viz.: 1. That the right to import an article into a state includes and carries the right to sell it therein in the condition imported, and a state law taxing the right to sell imports is no more valid than is one taxing the right to import, or the imported article itself. 2. That, while it is true that at some point of time the right of a state to tax imported articles commences, that point is not the instant they have fully and completely entered the country and into the possession of the importer. 3. That, while an imported article remains the property of the importer in his warehouse and in the original form or package in which it was imported, a state tax upon it is too plainly a duty upon imports to escape the prohibition of the Federal Constitution against such duties. 4. That, when an importer has so acted upon a thing imported that it has become mixed with the mass of property in the country, it has lost its distinctive character as an import, and become subject to the taxing power of the state. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678. Followed in State v. Shapleigh, 27 Mo. 344.

It is unquestionably no easy task, said Taney, Ch. J., soon afterwards, to mark by a certain 60 L. R. A.

and definite line the division between foreign and domestic commerce, and to fix the precise point, in relation to every imported article, where the paramount power of Congress terminates and that of the states begins. License Cases, 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256.

In these cases, Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678, was said by McLean, J., to have held that a tax on the sale of an imported article imported only for sale is a tax on the article itself; and that importation gives the right to the importer to sell the package imported free from any charge by the state. And by Catron, J., to have held that a tax on the importer is a tax on the import; and that an import which has paid a tax to the United States according to the regulations made by Congress cannot be taxed a second time in the hands of the importer.

It is no objection to a state law that it imposes a tax upon, or prohibits the sale of, an article of merchandise in the original package upon which a tax or duty has been paid to the United States, when such package has either been produced within the state, or, if imported, is not in the hands of the importer, but in those of his vendee, since, on sale by the importer it has become part of the general mass of property in the state. Pervear v. Massachusetts, 5 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 608.

The right to sell imported merchandise in the original unbroken packages free from state and local taxation is restricted to the actual importer, and does not belong to one who purchases from the consignee. Therefore, one who purchases from the consignee cargoes of merchandise brought from abroad, sometimes before and sometimes after the arrival of the carrying vessels at the entrance to the seaport of the United States, but before they are entered at the custom house or duty paid thereon, such cargoes by the terms of the purchase remaining at the risk of the consignees until actually loaded upon lighters furnished by the purchaser for carriage to the wharf, although such merchandise is sold in the original packages as brought into port by such purchaser,—is not an importer of such merchandise, and, hence, is not exempt from a tax laid by municipal ordinance of the port of entry equal to a percentage of his sales, nor relieved from the penalties imposed for failure to make returns of such sales. Waring v. Mobile, 8 Wall. 110, 19 L. ed. 342.

Undoubtedly, said the court, goods at sea may be sold by the consignees to arrive, and, if they indorse and deliver the bill of lading to the purchaser, and he accepts the same under and explain the statement rendered of its property and the value thereof." They did, in fact, appear, and offered evidence, and were heard by counsel. This right to appear and be heard is due process. Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321, sub nom. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Kentucky, 29 L. ed. 414, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57; State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, sub nom. Taylor v. Secor, 23 L. ed. 663; Pittsburgh, O. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114.

The act is assailed upon the suggestion that it permits and requires the assessment and valuation of property outside the state. This contention is based largely upon the theory that the law imposes upon the assessors the arbitrary duty of estimating the value of the property owned by these companies as equal to the market value of its capital stock, and the further duty of apportioning to the state of Ohio that proportion of the total capital stock which the value of its personal property in Ohio bore to the total value of its personal property wherever situated. It must be confessed that the principal rule of assessment has been most obscurely drawn. Whether this was done that it might be read one way by the assessors and another by the courts is somewhat problematical. But the act in its most important feature has been construed by the supreme court of Ohio in State ex rel. Poe v. Jones, and that construction must be now read into the act, and accepted as conclusive as to its meaning by this court. That court, upon this point, said: "The board, in determining the value of the company's property in this state for taxation, is not re-actual delivery and acceptance of the goods, the effect of the transaction is to vest a perfect title in the purchaser discharged of all right of stoppage in transitu on the part of the vendor and indorser of the bill of lading. Nothing of the kind was done in this case. On the contrary the agreement was that the loss, if any, before the delivery of the goods into the lighters should fall on the shippers. Influenced by these considerations, the court is of the opinion that the shippers or consignees were the importers, and that the complainant was the purchaser of the importers and the second vendor of the imported merchandise. Ibid.

But the difficulty here is that the merchandise in question was actually delivered to the purchaser during the voyage, at sea, and before actual importation. The court had just decided that such lightering from the sea-going vessel to the wharf in this identical way in the same harbor was but the "prolongation of the voyage of the vessels assisted to their port of destination." Foster v. Davenport, 22 How. 244, 16 L. ed. 248.

In Henson v. Lott, 8 Wall. 148, 19 L. ed. 387, a majority of the court was of the opinion that a state statute making it unlawful for any one bringing in spirituous liquors from another state to offer them for sale, even in the original unbroken packages, without first paying a tax of 50 cents a gallon thereon, while, if it stood alone, might well be regarded as a regulation of interstate commerce, yet, was saved from invalidity by imposing the same tax on domestic distillations. Nelson, J., however, in dissent, pointed out that, under such a ruling, a state may effectively tax the products of other states without burdening its own citizens at all, as, if New York should tax coal from Pennsylvania, cotton, rice, and sugar from the south, and Illinois, lumber from Wisconsin.

Unsold, imported goods which have paid customs duties and remain in the unbroken, original packages as imported in the importers' hands, kept awaiting sale, are not subject to state taxation, even as a part of the owner's general property. Low v. Austin, 13 Wall. 20, 20 L. ed. 517, followed in State, Gerdaun, Prosecutor, v. Davis (N. J. L.) 50 Atl. 586; State ex rel. Gelpi v. Board of Assessors, 46 La. Ann. 145, 15 So. 10.

There is a difficulty. It is true, says the Supreme Court of the United States in a subsequent case, in all cases of this character, in drawing the line precisely where the commercial power of Congress ends and the power of the state begins. A similar difficulty was felt in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 60 L. R. A.

678, in drawing the line of distinction between the restriction on the power of the states to lay a duty on imports and their acknowledged power to tax persons and property. Following the guarded language of the court in that case, it would be premature to state any rule which would be universal in its application to determine when the commercial power of the Federal government over a commodity has ceased and the power of the state has commenced. It is sufficient that the commercial power continues until the commodity has ceased to be the subject of discriminating legislation by reason of its foreign character. That power protects it, even after it has entered the state, from any burdens imposed by reason of its foreign origin. Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347.

A tax, therefore, laid by the law of the state in such a manner as to discriminate unfavorably against goods produced or manufactured in another state, is a regulation of interstate commerce forbidden to all but Congress by the Constitution of the Union. Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S. 566, 24 L. ed. 1015.

Coal mined in one state, and brought in bulk to another, and there held for sale by its first owner, not being an import within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against laying imposts or duties on imports or exports, becomes immediately subject to taxation as a part of the general property of the state, provided it is not merely temporarily resting on a journey to a destination beyond the state. And it must not be discriminated against because it came from another state. Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1091.

When, said Bradley, J., on one occasion, imported goods become mingled with the general mass of property in a state, they are not followed and singled out for taxation as imported goods by reason of being imported. If they were the tax would be as unconstitutional as if imposed upon them by reason of their being imported. When mingled with the general mass they are taxed in the same manner as other property. Philadelphia & S. Mall S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118.

An import ceases, in the constitutional sense, to be such the moment the importer becomes the vender, and sells it disengaged from the commercial regulations of the United States. In the hands of the retailer or distributor it is an article of the internal trade and commerce of the state,—a trade or commerce which none but state legislation can protect or regulate, and which necessarily falls peculiarly under quired to fix the value of such property upon the principle that the value of the entire property of the company shall be deemed the same as the value of its entire capital stock, thus making the respective values equivalents of each other. But, taking the market value of the entire capital stock as a datum, the board is to be only guided thereby in ascertaining the true value in money of the company's property in this state. The statute does not bind the board to find the value of the entire property of the company equal to that of the entire capital stock. While the value of the property may be less, there may be cases, and not uncommon, in which the value of the property will exceed the market value of the capital stock."

The value of its capital stock under the act, as thus construed, was but one of the factors to be looked to in estimating the total value of the property owned by the companies. The board might conclude, on all the evidence, that the property was of a greater or less value than its capital stock, and there is nothing in the act which arbitrarily requires the assessors to ignore "the other evidence" which the law contemplated they would look to, and find according to the fact. As construed by the Ohio court, the act required the assessors to ascertain the value of the property of all the companies to be assessed by the special board which was "within the state." In the opinion of that court, the provision of the law which required the board to regard the entire property of such companies, wherever situated, as one entire plant, and as "a dividend-producing unit machine," was not obnoxious to the Constitution of that state, nor to any provision of the Constitution of the United the police power of every community. Any tax or restraint, therefore, imposed for police purposes upon the seller of wines and strong liquors within the state can by no construction be deemed a duty upon imports, or a regulation of the commerce of the United States, unless a tax upon a warehouse be a duty upon imports, and a license to a drayman a regulation of the commerce of the Union. State v. Peckham, 3 R. I. 289.

A state law subjecting foreign wines and ardent spirits, and all goods, wares, merchandise, and effects, imported from any place beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and all other goods, wares, merchandise, and effects which are the production of any foreign country, offered for sale by sample or otherwise by brokers, every time they shall be sold to specified duties payable into the state treasury; and which does not discriminate in any manner between articles which have lost, and articles which retain, the character of imports,—is to the extent that the latter are affected, in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and void. People v. Marling, 3 Keyes, 374.

And it has been held that, inasmuch as a state has full power to tax property imported from abroad after it has entered into and mingled with the general mass of property in the state, it may, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, lawfully lay upon such property a heavier tax than it imposes upon property of the same kind produced within the state. Davis v. Dashiell, 61 N. C. (Phill. L.) 114.

4. Original packages.

An original package is the package in the exact condition it is received by the carrier at the initial shipping point. It may be a single bottle, or cardboard box, or two or more of those fastened together, or several contained in a box, barrel, crate, or other receptacle. Guckenhelm v. Sellers, 81 Fed. 997; McGregor v. Cone, 104 Iowa, 465, 39 L. R. A. 484, 73 N. W. 1041; Healey v. State, 42 Neb. 556, 60 N. W. 962.

It is the outside case, although containing several separate packages. State v. Chapman, 1 S. D. 414, 10 L. R. A. 432, 47 N. W. 411; Re Harmon, 43 Fed. 372; Re May, 82 Fed. 422; May v. New Orleans, 178 U. S. 496, 44 L. ed. 1165, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 976.

Unless such case be the receptacle furnished by the carrier for convenience of carriage. Kelch v. Alabama, 91 Ala. 2, 10 L. R. A. 430, 8 So. 353.

616, 25 Pac. 237; Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, 171 U. S. 1, 43 L. ed. 49, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 757.

But the package must be such as has been generally employed in the past by honest dealers for shipping like goods,—one not obviously resorted to for the purpose of evading the law. Austin v. Tennessee, 179 U. S. 343, 45 L. ed. 224, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132.

Drawing the bung from a cask, and taking out a sample of its liquid contents to test in order to accept or reject the sale, do not make the cask a broken package, nor destroy its character as an original one. Wind v. Iler, 93 Iowa, 316, 27 L. R. A. 219, 61 N. W. 1001.

Neither does taking the cover off a box to ascertain whether its contents are what they purport to be. Re McAllister, 51 Fed. 282.

d. Property sent into a state for sale.

The constitutional prohibition against state taxation of imports does not apply to articles brought in from another state. Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. 123, 19 L. ed. 382; Hinson v. Lott, 8 Wall. 148, 19 L. ed. 387; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1091.

It is, therefore, in the commerce clause alone that restraints upon state action respecting property coming in from other parts of the United States must be sought.

The distinction which exists between the commercial power and the police power as affected by the commerce clause of the United States Constitution, as was said in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678, of the power of the states to tax persons and property within their territory, and the prohibition on them against laying any duty on imports, though quite distinguishable when they do not approach each other, may yet, like the colors intervening between white and black, approach so nearly as to perplex the understanding as colors perplex the vision in marking the distinction between them. Re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, sub nom. Wilkerson v. Rahrer, 35 L. ed. 572, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865.

A state statute which requires all importers of foreign articles or commodities of dry goods, wares, or merchandise by bale or package, or of wines and distilled spirits, and other persons selling the same by wholesale, bale, package, hogshead, barrel, or tierce, to take out and pay $50 for a license before they are authorized to sell, with penalties for refusal or neglect so to do, is just as repugnant to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution as it is to that forbidding the states to lay taxes on im-

States. It was also of opinion that the fundamental law of Ohio was not contravened by treating, as elements in making up the gross value of such a unit plant, good will, business skill, contracts with railway or other carriers, and every other business consideration which contributed to the successful and profitable operation of the manifold parts of so complicated a machine. Neither was it objectionable that the value placed by the general public upon the capital stock of such companies, as indicated by sales of shares on the open market, should be looked to as a guide in fixing the total value of the property of such companies, wherever situated. That court was also of opinion that the money value of that part of this unit plant found within the state was within the taxing jurisdiction of Ohio.

Accepting, as we feel constrained to do, the opinion of the Ohio court as to the construction to be placed upon the provisions of the Ohio Constitution concerning uniformity of taxation and admissible methods for assessing the property of corporations, and accepting, also, the construction of this Nichols law as settling the meaning of the legislature, we are unable to see wherein any provision of the Constitution of the United States has been infringed. The law does not discriminate between domestic corporations and those of states other than Ohio. There was due process of law in the ascertainment of values. The bill does not charge any actual fraud upon the part of the assessors. Mere excessiveness of valuation, not the result of intentional or reckless wilfulness, and not a consequence of a departure from the affirmative provisions of the law regulating such assessments, is not remediports. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678.

State statutes passed to discourage the use of ardent spirits by prohibiting their sale in small quantities without previous license, as applied to importations from foreign countries or other states not sold as imported by the importer, are valid, notwithstanding the commerce clause, and in spite of the fact that Congress has, by law, authorized such importations. License Cases, 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256.

In these cases, Grier, J., considered the statutes, sub judice, police regulations merely, and outside of the prohibitory clauses of the Constitution. The question presented in his opinion was simply whether states could interdict the sale of an article of commerce believed to be pernicious in effects, and to cause disease, pauperism, and crime. And Daniel, J., considered the statutes valid, because he thought the decision in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678, unsound, and that the original-package doctrine of the nontaxability of goods in the hands of the importer after importation had completely ended could not and should not be maintained.

A statute imposing a specific tax per gallon upon spirituous liquors distilled within the state, to be paid by the distiller under a system requiring a license and regular returns from him, and, complementary thereto, a specific tax of the same amount per gallon upon such liquors brought into and offered for sale within the state from beyond its borders, to be paid by the dealer introducing the same, inasmuch as it is legislation which does not discriminate against the products of sister states, but merely subjects them to equal taxation with similar home products, is not an attempt to regulate commerce, but is a legitimate exercise of the taxing power of the state. Illinois v. Lott, 8 Wall. 148, 19 L. ed. 387. Nelson, J., dissented on the ground that a state had no constitutional power to tax the sale in original packages of articles imported from other states for a market.

A statute imposing an annual tax for selling spirituous, vinous, malt, and other intoxicating liquors, exclusive of wines and beers made in the enacting state, is a nullity so far as it applies to one exclusively vending vinous and malt liquors fermented or brewed without such state, because the discrimination made is in conflict with the commerce clause. But in other respects it is valid and enforceable, because it makes no discrimination between foreign and domestic distilled spirits. Tiernan v. Rinker, 102 U. S. 123, 26 L. ed. 103. 60 L. R. A.

A state tax on auctioneers' sales of foreign goods in the original packages as imported before they have become incorporated into the general property of the country is unconstitutional and void. Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S. 566, 24 L. ed. 1015.

This is especially so when such sales of domestics are exempted from such tax. Ibid.

As sales by manufacturers are chiefly effected through agents, a tax upon the selling agents of manufacturers is a tax upon the manufacturers, and, if such tax is made to depend upon the foreign character of the wares, that is, upon their having been manufactured without the state,—it is to that extent a regulation of commerce in the articles between the states. Commerce among the states in any commodity can only be free when the commodity is exempted from all discriminating regulations and burdens imposed by local authority by reason of its foreign growth or manufacture. Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S. 344, 26 L. ed. 565.

It matters not, said Field, J., whether the tax be laid directly upon the articles sold, or in the form of licenses for their sale. If, by reason of their foreign character, the state can impose a tax upon them, or upon the person through whom the sales are effected, the amount of the tax will be a matter resting in her discretion. She may place the tax at so high a figure as to exclude the introduction of the foreign article, and prevent competition with the home product. It was against legislation of this discriminating kind that the framers of the Constitution intended to guard when they vested in Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several states. Ibid.

Later the court took the opposite view. New York v. Roberts, 171 U. S. 658, 43 L. ed. 323, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58.

A state may not, under the guise of exercising its police power, or of enacting inspection laws, make discriminations against the products and industries of other states in favor of its own. A law, therefore, making it unlawful to sell fresh beef, veal, or mutton, unless slaughtered within 100 miles of the place of sale, until after it has been inspected and approved, is, when applied to meats brought from a distant state, a direct burden upon interstate commerce, and, therefore, void. Brimmer v. Reiman, 138 U. S. 78, 34 L. ed. 862, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 485, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 213.

So, is a law requiring flour brought from other states to be inspected, and a fee to be paid for such inspection, when there is no such requirement as to state-made flour. Volght v.

able by application to courts of equity. The tax imposed is not a license tax, nor a tax on the business or occupation, nor on the transportation of property through the state, nor from points within the state to points in other states, nor from points in other states to points within the state. It purports to provide for a tax upon property within the state of Ohio. Though this property is employed very largely in the business of interstate commerce, yet that does not exempt it from liability to taxation as all other property within the jurisdiction of Ohio. This proposition is too well settled to need argument. Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 232, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 896; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530-549, 31 L. ed. 790-792, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640-649, 32 L. ed. 311-314, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18-23, 35 L. ed. 613-616, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876.

Neither does the fact that the property of the express companies was valued as a unit profit-producing plant violate any Federal restriction upon the taxing power of a state within which a part of that plant is found. The value of property depends in a large degree upon the use to which it is put. If a railroad may be valued as a unit, rather than as a given number of acres of land plus so many tons of rails and so many thousand ties and a certain number of depots, shops, etc., there is no sufficient reason why the property of an express company should not be treated as a unit plant. If the state of Ohio had a right to tax the property within

State statutes regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, and making no discrimination against imported goods or those coming from other states, are valid exercises of the police power, but inoperative so far as original, unbroken packages in the hands of the first recipient within the state are concerned, because of the commerce clause. When, however, Congress enacts that such laws may apply to such original, unbroken packages brought from other states or from foreign countries, with all the force and effect that they operate upon other goods of the same class, it is a declaration upon its part that commerce therein need be no longer free, and is the removal of an obstacle to the enforcement of such laws or a consent that such laws may be enacted and enforced. Re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, sub nom. Wilkerson v. Rahrer, 35 L. ed. 572, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865. No member of the court dissented from the decision in this case, but three, Harlan, Gray, and Brewer, JJ., who concurred in the result, did not assent to the reasoning in the opinion of the chief justice.

While the act of Congress of August 8, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 313, chap. 728, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3177), providing that all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors transported into any state or territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall, upon arrival therein, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as if such liquors had been produced therein, and shall not be exempt because of introduction in original packages,—warrants the application of local statutes and ordinances licensing, regulating, and controlling traffic in malt liquors to a storage and distributing agency of a foreign brewing corporation sending his beer in original packages; yet, such act has not deprived such beer of its character as an article of interstate commerce, and, hence, an ordinance taxing such agency for revenue only, and not for regulation or control, is void under the commerce clause. Pabst Brewing Co. v. Terre Haute, 98 Fed. 330.

A statute of North Dakota, imposing license taxes upon intoxicating liquors, was attacked upon similar grounds by a Minnesota corporation which did in that state a precisely similar business. The court, upon a critical examination of such statute, concluded that it was not a revenue measure, but a police regulation, and consequently within the purview of the act of 60 L. R. A.

Congress just mentioned, but that, inasmuch as it discriminated adversely to the foreign brewer by requiring of him a wholesaler's license from which domestic brewers selling their own beer were exempt, it was for this reason, and to the extent of the wholesaler's license tax, void. Minneapolis Brewing Co. v. McGilivray, 104 Fed. 258.

A state statute requiring the owners of boat-loads of coal and coke to submit them to the inspection of, and gauging by, state officers, and to pay certain fees therefor, under pecuniary penalties if they sell without so doing, set in operation against a foreign corporation engaged in interstate commerce and sending cargoes of coal and coke mined in its home state into the enacting state for sale, does not conflict with the Federal Constitution. Pittsburg & S. Coal Co. v. Louisiana, 156 U. S. 590, 39 L. ed. 544, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 18, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459, Affirming 41 La. Ann. 465, 6 So. 220.

An act which allows goods manufactured in the state to be peddled free, and exacts a license fee from peddlers of similar goods manufactured without the state, discriminates in favor of domestic, home-made goods, and against those made in other states, and so violates the Federal Constitution. State v. Furbush, 72 Me. 493.

In State ex rel. Morderal v. Charleston, 10 Rich. L. 240, a municipal ordinance declaring every slave brought into the city for sale from beyond the limits of the state subject to a specific tax was held valid. The decision was put upon the grounds, first, that slaves brought from another state were not imports, and second, if they could be so considered, the tax was not a duty or impost, but a levy per capita after importation. The commerce clause was not discussed in the case.

A series of cases in the state of New York upon the question of the taxability of goods sent from other state into that state for sale have been fully discussed in the previous note in this series on the Taxation of capital stock of corporations in the United States (State Bd. of Equalization v. People (III.) 58 L. R. A. 513, pp. 536-540), and need not again be noticed.

The reader will find additional cases in point here in other parts of this note, where franchise privilege and license tax laws come under notice (infra, X.).

VII. Intercourse.

a. Passenger travel.

A state law requiring the master of every incoming vessel to make a sworn report within twenty-four hours after arrival of the name, the state, and to assess it at its true cash value, there is no Federal restriction which will prevent such property from being "assessed at the value which it has, as used, and by reason of its use. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 431, 38 L. ed. 1038, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876.

That an express company owns no line of railway, and operates no railroad, does not prevent the value of its property from being affected by the relation of each part to every other part, and the use to which a part is put as a factor in a unit business. The Pullman Car Company neither owned nor operated any line of railroad. Its cars were moved by railway carriers under contracts, yet it was not regarded as violative of any Federal restriction that its property should be regarded as a unit plant, with a unit value, and the value of its property in Pennsylvania assessed in the proportion that the mileage of the roads over which its cars ran in that state bore to the total mileage covered by its entire business. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, cited above.

Neither is it an objection that the Ohio law required the assessors to look to the value of the capital stock of the company as a factor in arriving at the value of its whole property considered as a unit plant. In State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575-605, sub nom. Taylor v. Secor, 23 L. ed. 663-670, Mr. Justice Miller said: "When you have ascertained the current cash value of the whole funded debt, and the current cash age, occupation, birthplace, and last legal settlement of each of his passengers, and to give bond to prevent any of them becoming a public charge under penalty of $75 for each passenger, is a police regulation only, not a commercial one, and not in conflict with the commerce clause. New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 102, 9 L. ed. 648.

Story, J., dissented, holding that the statute before the court was a regulation of commerce and unconstitutional.

This case was subsequently said to be an authority only for the right of a state to demand of the master or owner of an arriving vessel a list of the passengers with personal statistics, and not for the requirement of bonds or money payments of each passenger. Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543.

While a state has the unquestionable power to protect itself from an influx of foreign paupers and other persons who would become public charges, yet, a statute providing (as did Mass. act April 20, 1837) for the inspection of incoming vessels, and prohibiting the landing therefrom of lunatics, idiots, cripples, aged and incompetent to maintain themselves, and paupers, and which imposes a tax upon the master for passengers brought in, including those who do not fall within any of the prohibited classes, and requires payment thereof before even sane, healthful, and able passengers are permitted to come ashore, is unconstitutional as a regulation of commerce. So, too, is a statute (1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 445, 446, title 4) requiring the master of every vessel entering the state ports to pay a specific sum for each passenger landed and each member of the crew. Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283, 12 L. ed. 702. The court divided in these cases, McLean, Wayne, Grier, Catron, and McKinley, JJ., concurring in the judgment, but not upon all the reasoning, and Taney, Ch. J., with Daniel, Nelson, and Woodbury, JJ., dissenting.

By the judgment in these cases, according to Mr. Justice Wayne, the court meant to decide substantially as follows: a. That statutes imposing taxes upon passengers, either aliens or citizens, entering the ports of the enacting states, either in foreign or domestic vessels, from either foreign nations or other state ports, are in the nature of commercial regulations and inconsistent with the constitutional power of Congress. b. That states cannot constitutionally tax the commerce of the United States to pay the expenses of executing their police laws. c. That commerce includes an intercourse of persons, as well as the importation of merchandise. d. That, inasmuch as Congress has 60 L. R. A.

enacted laws admitting foreigners, with their personal luggage and tools of trade, free of duties and imposts, state statutes taxing for any purpose immigrants while the vessel is in transitu to her destined port, although it has arrived within the jurisdictional limits of such states, before the immigrants have landed, are in conflict with the legislation of Congress, and hence unconstitutional and void. e. That the Massachusetts and New York laws sub judice, so far as they laid any obligation on owners, consignees, or captains of incoming vessels to pay or be responsible for a tax or duty of any kind whatever for arriving passengers, were void in virtue of the commerce clause, and the acts of Congress pursuant thereto. f. That such state laws, so far as they imposed taxes upon passengers, were void, also, because they conflicted with the constitutional requirement of uniformity in duties, imposts, and excises throughout the United States; that requirement being as real and as obligatory with respect of the states without as with congressional action, and such uniformity being interfered with and destroyed by any state tax upon the intercourse of persons between states or between this and other nations. g. That the power of Congress to regulate commerce includes navigation upon the high seas, and in the bays, harbors, lakes, and navigable waters of the United States; and any state tax affecting the right of navigation, or subjecting the exercise of the right to a condition, is contrary to the grant of power to Congress. h. That states, in exercising their police powers, may pass quarantine and health laws interdicting the landing of passengers and freight, may prescribe the places and the time of quarantine, may impose penalties for violation, and may exact such fees as will pay the cost of inspection, detention, disinfection, and purification, which laws, although affecting commerce, are not regulations of it within the meaning of the Constitution. Ibid.

State statutes whereby the master or owner of every vessel landing passengers from a foreign port is bound, on arrival, to report the name, birthplace, age, occupation, and last legal settlement of each passenger, whereupon the local port officers are to indorse a demand that such master or owner give a $300 bond for every passenger entering the city, conditioned to indemnify the immigration commissioners and every city, county, and town in the state against expense for relief or support of such passenger for four years, or, at his option, pay $1.50 in lieu of giving such bond, under heavy penalties for neglect or refusal to do one or the value of the entire number of shares, you have, by the action of those who above all others can best estimate it, ascertained the true value of the road, all its property, its capital stock, and its franchises; for all these are represented by the value of its bonded debt, and the shares of its capital stock."

This language is quoted with approval in Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 429, 38 L. ed. 1037, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114.

It may be that in a particular instance this would operate with injustice, but that it is a proper matter to be considered is not to be controverted. As construed by the Ohio court, this act does not require the assessors to find that the value of the property of such a corporation is the precise equivalent of the value of its capital stock as ascertainied by the rule stated above. The board was only required to treat the value of the capital stock as a guide in ascertaining the actual value of its property.

In view of the wealth, population, and area of Ohio, it is not a violent presumption that the value of the part of such a plant within that state was in the proportion that the actual value of its tangible property in Ohio bore to the total value of all its tangible property, wherever situated. The mileage basis of apportionment has been sustained where railroads, telegraph, and sleeping-car companies were the subject of assessment for taxation. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 431, 38 L. ed. 1038, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114, and other cases heretofore cited. A mileage basis was not adopted by the assessors whose action is now complained of, because the express compaother within twenty-four hours,—are unconstitutional and void under the commerce clause. Whatever the language used in framing such statutes, their natural and reasonable effect is to compel the owners of incoming vessels to pay a sum of money for each passenger they bring to port, and, hence, they as much impose taxes upon passengers as if they lay them directly upon the passengers or on the vessels or their owners for the right to land passengers. A statute that imposes a heavy, and almost impossible, condition on the exercise of the right of a master or owner to land passengers from his vessel, with the alternative of paying a small sum of money, in effect exacts the payment of such sum, and consequently lays a burden upon foreign commerce, and this the state is powerless to do. Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543.

A state statute empowering an officer to satisfy himself whether or not any passenger, not a citizen of the United States, who arrives from any foreign port by vessel, is insane, idiotic, deaf, dumb, blind, crippled, or infirm, and unaccompanied by relatives able and willing to support him, or who is likely to become a public charge, or has been a pauper, a convict, or is a lewd woman; and which excludes every such person from landing until the master, owner, or consignee of the vessel gives a separate bond of $500 with two different resident sureties, in each case running for two years, conditioned to save harmless every county, city, and town in the state against expense for the relief, support, or care of such passenger; and which authorizes such inspecting officer to exact fees for examination of each passenger, for every bond and each oath to sureties, or to commute such fees,—is unconstitutional and void in virtue of the commerce clause. Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 550.

The last two cases were followed, and a like conclusion reached, in New York v. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, 107 U. S. 59, 27 L. ed. 383, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 87.

But while state statutes laying taxes on incoming passengers from foreign nations are void by reason of being regulations of commerce, an act of Congress laying such a tax is valid because Congress has the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, sub nom. Eddie v. Robertson, 28 L. ed. 798, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 247.

A statute imposing a capitation tax upon each passenger about to leave the state by railroad, stage-coach, or other vehicle carrying passengers, for hire, to be collected of the carrier, is unconstitutional and void. Crundall v. Nevada, 60 L. R. A.

6 Wall. 35, 18 L. ed. 745. Miller, J., who wrote for the court, expressed the opinion that the tax did not, of itself, amount to a regulation of commerce of a national character which required or admitted of uniformity of regulation over the whole country, and, therefore, however obnoxious it might be in other respects, that it was not violative of the commerce clause. But Clifford, J., while agreeing that the law was unconstitutional, thought it plainly inconsistent with the commerce clause, and that the judgment annulling it should be placed exclusively upon that ground; a view in which Chase, Ch. J. concurred.

A statute imposing upon every person, corporation, association, or company in the business of carrying passengers by steam power upon land or water within the limits of the enacting state a state tax at a specified rate for each passenger transported, with a proviso that, if the carrier's charter limits the fares it may charge, it may increase fares by the amount of the tax, does not tax the business of the carrier measured by the number of passengers carried, but it taxes the passengers through the medium of the carrier as collector. In so far, therefore, as the law operates upon passengers coming into, passing through, or departing from, the state, it is in effect a regulation of commerce between the states, and hence inoperative and void. Clarke v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 4 Houst. (Del.) 158.

An act requiring one employing laborers in certain named counties for the purpose of sending the hirelings out of the state to pay a license fee is an unconstitutional restriction upon the right of persons to leave or pass through the state with freedom. Joseph v. Randolph, 71 Ala. 499, 46 Am. Rep. 347.

A state tax upon the receiving and landing of passengers and freight at a wharf upon a navigable river bounding another state, by a ferry thereon plying between the two states, is a tax upon transportation, and therefore upon commerce between states, and void under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826.

A state law declaring the running or using of sleeping cars on railroads in the state, when they do not belong to the railroads upon which they are run or used, a privilege, and imposing a specific tax of $50 each, payable annually, upon each car so run or used, enforcing payment on default by distress warrant, is, in respect of all sleeping cars which begin or end runs outside of such state, unconstitutional for nies failed to return the datum asked for by the assessors. Precisely what rule the assessors did adopt in apportioning the total value does not clearly appear, though the inference is strong that the distribution was made largely on the basis of the relative value of tangible property in Ohio to the total value of all the tangible property owned by the complainants.

It may be that, under exceptional circumstances, a rule of apportionment based on mileage or upon the relative value of the local tangible property as compared to the total value, or based upon gross receipts within the state as compared to total gross receipts, would be inequitable and unjust. Speaking of objections to an apportionment on a mileage basis, Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, in Pittsburgh, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 431, 38

L. ed. 1038, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114, said: "It is true, there may be exceptional cases,—and the testimony offered on the trial of this case in the circuit court tends to show that this plaintiff's road is one of such exceptional cases,—as, for instance, where the terminal facilities in some large city are of enormous value, and so give to a mile or two in such city a value out of all proportion to any similar distance elsewhere along the line of the road, or, where in certain localities, the company is engaged in a particular kind of business requiring for sole use in such localities an extra amount of rolling stock. If testimony to this effect was presented by the company to the state board, it must be assumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that such board, in making the assessment of track and rolling stock within the state, took into account the repugnancy to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, because it lays a tax upon the privilege of transporting passengers from state to state. Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34, 29 L. ed. 785, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635; Tennessee v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 51, 29 L. ed. 791, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 643.

A stamp tax upon a contract for passage beyond the limits of the state, which, though nominally paid by the carrier, is added to the price of the passage ticket, and really paid by the passenger, is void as a regulation of interstate commerce. People v. Raymond, 34 Cal. 492.

b. Telegrams.

Intercourse by telegraph between parties in different states, being interstate commerce, states cannot constitutionally lay taxes upon the messages constituting such intercourse.

The supreme court of Ohio, in deciding that a tax of that state upon the receipts within it of a foreign telegraph company, the bulk of which came from business crossing the state lines, was not repugnant to the commerce clause, took the untenable position that commerce between the states related to trade in articles of property, and that telegrams or correspondence by any other method, although relating to commercial transactions, were not commerce. They are, it declared, instruments or aids to facilitate commerce, and, like vehicles on which goods or persons are transported, may be indispensable to a successful prosecution of trade, and such instruments have always been subject to state taxation. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 521.

If this decision rested upon no other ground it could not stand. The same must be affirmed of the similar decision in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Richmond, 26 Gratt. 1.

The reversals of Western U. Tele. Co. v. Com. 110 Pa. 405, 20 Atl. 720, in 128 U. S. 39, 32 L. ed. 845, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 241, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6, and Western U. Tele. Co. v. State Board of Assessment, 80 Ala. 273, 60 Am. Rep. 49, in 132 U. S. 472, 33 L. ed. 409, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 726, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 161, and the decision in Ratterman v. Western U. Tele. Co. 127 U. S. 411, 32 L. ed. 229, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 59, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1127, are conclusive on this point. Receipts from interstate telegrams are not taxable by the states because of the commerce clause.

A tax laid upon a telegraph company of a specific sum for every message sent, because it is sent and without regard to the distance it is 60 L. R. A.

to go or the price paid for transmitting it, is a tax on the messages, and, so far as it operates on messages sent out of the state, it is a regulation of foreign and interstate commerce and beyond the power of the state to impose. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 28 L. ed. 1067, Reversing 55 Tex. 314.

And such statute having in respect of out-of-state messages been thus held an unconstitutional interference with commerce between the states, inasmuch as there is no way of effectively discriminating under its terms between business wholly within the state, which might be taxed under a properly worded law, and the business protected by the commerce clause, it cannot be saved. Id. 62 Tex. 630.

But where the subjects of taxation can be separated so that what arises from interstate commerce can be distinguished from what arises from commerce wholly within the state, the courts will act upon the distinction, and will restrain the tax upon interstate commerce while permitting the state to collect that resting upon commerce solely within its territory. Ratterman v. Western U. Tele. Co. 127 U. S. 411, 32 L. ed. 229, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 59, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1127.

To present a defense to a claim for such taxes the facts must show that the messages transmitted were interstate commerce, or in obedience to governmental orders, and that the office was kept and used for such purposes only. Moore v. Bufaula, 97 Ala. 673, 11 So. 922.

The court cannot take judicial notice that a domestic telegraph company complaining of an assessment against it as in contravention of the commerce clause does an interstate business and operates its lines outside of the state. People ex rel. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Tierney, 57 Hun, 357, 10 N. Y. Supp. 940, Modified in other respects in 126 N. Y. 166, 12 L. R. A. 251, 27 N. E. 269.

And a telephone company carrying on an interstate business, sued for license fees imposed under a statute charging 75 cents a year in each county where it carries on a telephonic business for each instrument in use, has the burden of showing what instruments and how many are used in interstate commerce, so as to be beyond the reach of such tax. It cannot escape liability by simply showing that the instruments used in domestic and local business cannot be segregated or discriminated from those used in interstate business. State v. Rocky Mountain Bell Teleph. Co. (Mont.) 71 Pac. 311.

VIII. Internal commerce.

The internal commerce of a state—that is, peculiar and large value of such facilities, and such extra rolling stock. But whether in any particular case such matters are taken into consideration by the assessing board does not make against the validity of the law, because it does not require that the valuation of the property within the state shall be absolutely determined upon a mileage basis."

The valuation of the returned personal property of the Adams Express Company for 1893 was $53,500, and the assessed value as determined by the board is $460,033.08. This great increase undoubtedly casts a shadow on the action of the board. Still, the bill, including the amendments incorporating the affidavits of Auditor Poe as a part thereof, does not charge any actual fraud on the part of the board, by intentionally and deliberately placing a valuation grossly in excess of the real value, for the purpose of compelling the complainant to bear a larger share of taxation than it rightfully should. As in the case last cited, it may be said "that the most that can be made out of the bill is a complaint that the assessment is too high, because the board took into consideration property outside of the state, and gave to the property within the state a value partly deduced from that without the state." But if it was lawful to value the whole plant looking to it as a unit, and looking to the market value of the capital stock as a factor in the ascertainment of that total value, and that such a method does not contravene the Constitution or law of Ohio, then it would seem to follow, in the absence of specific charges of fraud, or of a departure from the method of appraisal indicated by the law, that a court of equity is without power to relieve against a mere excessive valuation. Clearly, a court of equity will not, in the absence of fraud or violation of law, enjoin an assessment merely upon allegations of excessiveness.

What we have said as to the case made by the Adams Express Company is equally applicable to the suits of each of the other express companies, there being no material difference in the averments of the several bills.

Our conclusion must be, therefore, that neither the law nor the assessment thereunder is obnoxious to either the Constitution of Ohio nor any Federal restriction; and the decree of the Circuit Court dismissing the several bills must be affirmed.

the commerce which is wholly confined within its limits—is as much under its control as foreign or interstate commerce is under the control of the general government. Sands v. Manistee River Improv. Co. 123 U. S. 288, 31 L. ed. 149, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 113.

No judicial decision has been noticed, said the supreme court of Maine half a century ago, which denies to a state the right to regulate navigation upon its interior waters which cannot be navigated for the purpose of commerce with foreign nations or among the several states. On the contrary, that right has been admitted in those judicial opinions which have been considered to advance the most extensive claims to the regulation of commerce and navigation by the United States. Moor v. Veazie, 32 Me. 343, 52 Am. Dec. 665.

The power given to Congress to regulate commerce does not carry the power to tax for revenue. That is derived from the authority to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. Nor does such power to regulate, even if construed to be exclusive, prohibit states from taxing commerce within their own jurisdictions. The inability of states to do this, results altogether from the prohibition against laying duties on imports and exports. Johnson v. Drummond, 20 Gratt. 419.

The power of each state to tax, at its discretion, its own internal commerce, and the franchises, property, and business of its own corporations, so that interstate intercourse, trade, or commerce, which must be free, be not embarrassed or restricted, is beyond dispute. State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall. 232, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 146.

A state law regulating commerce, if confined to internal commerce and to only so much of interstate commerce as directly affects the people of the state, does not conflict with the commerce clause. Pelk v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 94 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 97.

A state may lawfully tax traffic and transportation between places wholly within its own territory. Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Com. 1 Monaghan, 36, 1 L. R. A. 232, 2 Inters. Com. 60 L. R. A.

Rep. 222, 17 Ati. 175; Com. v. Buffalo, N. Y. & P. R. Co. 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. 216.

Even when, in the course of a continuous journey between such places, the state is left and returned to again. Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 36 L. ed. 672, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 87, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 806; And see, 1 L. R. A. 232, note, 1 Monaghan, 45, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 226; Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 21 W. N. C. 410.

It was not contested in Northern P. R. Co. v. Raymond, 5 Dak. 356, 1 L. R. A. 732, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 321, 40 N. W. 538, but that a territorial statute imposing a tax or providing for the commutation of it upon a railroad was valid so far as its application was restricted to local business alone, although it was unconstitutional as to business extending beyond the limits of the territory. And, in effect, this was decided in Northern P. R. Co. v. Barnes, 2 N. D. 310, 51 N. W. 366.

A state statute imposing upon railroads of a designated class a privilege tax graduated by the mileage operated or controlled for taking up and transporting freight and passengers from one point to another within such state, a specific sum annually, does not violate the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 53 L. R. A. 921, 43 S. W. 115.

But a statute imposing upon railroad corporations an annual excise tax or license charge equal to a fraction of 1 per cent of their gross earnings from transportation business originating and terminating within the taxing state, not to include earnings derived from business of an interstate character, does not warrant the inclusion of receipts for carrying the mails, although these were in part paid for mail matter taken up and set down within the state, where it cannot be determined how much was received for business of this kind. People ex rel. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Morgan, 168 N. Y. 1, 80 N. E. 1041.

A state, and its municipalities by its authority, may tax commerce within the jurisdictional limits, if such business exclusively is affected, when carried on by railroads (Nashville, C &

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Thomas TAGGART et al.

1. The existence of facts which would authorize the signatures of the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature to a statute cannot be inquired into where it is authenticated by their signatures
2. A state tax on that portion of the property of an interstate telegraph company which is within the state may lawfully be made by considering the value of the whole line as a unit, and assessing the tax on a mileage basis after deducting the value of property subject to local taxation, such as real estate, structures, machinery, and appliances.
3. The fact that a telegraph line is engaged in interstate commerce does not prevent a state tax on the value of that portion of the property which is within the state, although the value of the whole line as a unit is taken into account in fixing such value.

4. The fact that the portions of a telegraph line outside the state are of proportionally greater value than portions within the state does not prevent applying the mileage basis of valuation under the act of 1893, after deducting the value of property subject to local taxation, since allowance for any such variance of value may be made, and the cardinal rule of the statute is to assess only what property is within the state, and that at its true cash value.
5. The fact that the valuation of the property of an interstate telegraph company is made upon its capital stock is not objectionable, where the tax is in effect levied only upon the actual value of the property of the company within the state.

APPPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion

*This decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States on May 18, 1896 (163 U. S. 1, 41 L. ed. 49, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1054).

Rep. 250; Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214); notwithstanding all such companies are engaged in interstate commerce.

While a state has no power to tax telegraph messages between it and other states or upon business of the national government, it may lawfully lay a tax upon messages passing between private parties and from one place to another exclusively within its own jurisdiction, without coming in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. When a statute does not in terms apply to interstate or foreign business, it is not to be implied that the legislature intended to transcend its constitutional powers in enacting it; if, therefore, the business is such as to be interstate and local commerce, the statute affecting it will be construed to apply only to the local or domestic part of it. IX. Receipts from commerce across state lines.

Cases of franchise and privilege taxation measured by corporate receipts are treated in the next division of this note.

In the note in this series on the Taxation of corporate franchises in the United States (Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 57 L. R. A. 33, the cases of United States Exp. Co. v. Ellyson, 28 Iowa, 370, and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ellyson, 28 Iowa, 380, were noticed sufficiently (vide div. VI., subd. f, 1, p. 60) to make it unnecessary to take them up again. In the same place (pp. 61-64) there were reviewed at length, in relation to the present theme, the cases of the State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164; Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 230, sub nom. Fargo v. Stevens, 30 L. ed. 888, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 51, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857, Reversing Fargo v. Auditor General, 57 Mich. 508, 24 N. W. 538; Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118, Reversing 104 Pa. 109; Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163; and Cumberland & P. R. Co. v. State, 92 Md. 668, 52 L. R. A. 768, 45 Atl. 503.

As the first of these cases appeared, when decided, to be in conflict with the decision that immediately preceded it, viz., that rendered in State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall. 232, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 146, Chase, Ch. J., speaking for the court in Osborne v. Moblle, 16 Wall. 479, 21 L. ed. 470, essayed distinguishing them by saying that the tax on tonnage was held to be unconstitutional because it was in effect a restriction upon interstate commerce which by the Constitution was designed to be free, while the tax on gross receipts was held to be not repugnant to the Constitution because it imposed on the railroad companies what was in the nature of a general income tax incapable of being transferred as a burden upon the property carried from one state to another.

County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to restrain defendants from apportioning among the several townships, and entering upon the tax duplicates, taxes assessed against complainant under the law providing for the taxation of telegraph companies. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Butler, Snow, & Butler, for appellant:

The complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it alleges that the sole authority upon which the appellees justify their action is Acts of 1893, chap. 171, which, upon the facts stated in the complaint as shown by the journals of the senate and house of representatives of Indiana, and admitted by the demurrer, has never been enacted as a statute of the state of Indiana; the senate and house of representatives having passed the bill which was afterwards published as Acts of 1893, chap. 171, and caused it to be presented to the governor within two days next previous to the final adjournment of the general assembly, in violation of art. 5, § 14, of the Constitution of Indiana.

The journals of the senate and house are admissible as evidence to prove the facts stated therein as to the passage of bills passed over the governor's veto, even though such bills are signed by the presiding officers of the two houses.

The journals of the houses of the legislature may be received in proof of facts

The cases in the state courts of Pennsylvania, involving taxes like those passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in the State Freight Tax Case and the Railway Gross Receipts Tax Case, just referred to, should be noted here to complete the general view.

In Com. v. Buffalo & E. R. Co. 2 Pearson (Pa.) 376, it was held that a tax upon the gross receipts arising from all freights carried by a railroad formed by consolidating a domestic with a foreign corporation and operating partly within and partly without the state, proportioned to the internal mileage, was not inimical to the commerce clause. Upon this branch of the case, the court said, in substance: Our supreme court has decided that these taxes are not a regulation of commerce between the states, and, even if they were, that the state could act on this subject and tax the commerce carried over artificial navigation or railroads authorized by its laws until Congress passes laws regulating interstate commerce. At least, such is our understanding of the decisions, and they bind us until reviewed and changed. It was, however, intimated that the personal view of the court was that the tax was invalid, and held otherwise only in deference to the authority of the superior tribunal.

In the case between the same parties, reported in 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 386, the court said the points made were up in Com. v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. and several cognate cases, and, although at first the law was held void, the holding was reversed by the state supreme court, and the reversal affirmed on error, adding: We must therefore consider the law as settled until reviewed and changed by the Supreme Court of the United States. We concede, it was said, that there is no difference between the tax charged on the freight as claimed here and on the goods as decided in those cases, but this point is negatived without qualification in obedience to those decisions.

In Com. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 21 W. N. C. 406; Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 21 W. N. C. 410; and Com. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 21 W. N. C. 412,—the statute taxing the gross receipts from tolls and transportation, telegraph and express business, was held unconstitutional so far as receipts from interstate commerce were affected, although operative with respect of receipts from commerce exclusively internal. In these cases the court deemed its former decisions to the contrary in Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Com. 104 Pa. 109; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Com. 107 Pa. 148; and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Com. 110 Pa. 405, 20 Atl. 720 (afterwards reversed in 60 L. R. A.

128 U. S. 39, 32 L. ed. 345, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 241, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6); together with the case of the state tax on railway gross receipts upon which they rested,—overruled by Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 230, sub nom. Fargo v. Stevens, 30 L. ed. 888, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857; and Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118.

In the like decision in Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Com. 1 Monaghan, 36, 1 L. R. A. 232, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 222, 17 Atl. 175, the court referred to the Freight Tax Case as holding that a state tax upon the freight or tonnage of a domestic corporation is a regulation of commerce and cannot be imposed; and to the Railway Gross Receipts Tax Case as holding that the receipts from such freight or tonnage carried by a domestic corporation may be taxed by its own state, and added: It was at once felt that the distinction thus drawn between freight and money paid for carrying freight was unsound in principle, and that the last decision must soon be overruled.

Com. v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 129 Pa. 308, 18 Atl. 125, and 22 W. N. C. 525, affirmed the taxability of receipts from internal commerce exclusively, and the freedom from taxation of receipts from external commerce.

In Com. v. New York, P. & O. R. Co. 145 Pa. 38, 22 Atl. 212, it was decided that sums received by a foreign railroad company under a lease to another road for the use of a portion of its line within the state of Pennsylvania for the transportation of passengers and the carriage of coal and merchandise by the lessee over such portion of road, not only between terminals in that state, but as well for transportation begun in that state of freight shipped for a continuous journey under a single way bill to a destination beyond the state, are lawfully subject to a state tax upon gross receipts from tolls.

Passing to more general cases, the list is headed by the Delaware Railroad Tax Case. In that case it was decided that taxes imposed upon all domestic railroad and canal companies doing business in the taxing state, of, first, 3 per cent annually upon their net earnings or income from all sources, with a proviso that, when their lines extend beyond the state, only so much of such earnings or income of each company shall be subject to tax as will be in proportion to the whole, as the length of its line within the state bears to the total length thereof; second, $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent on the actual cash value of every share of corporate stock, with a like apportionment in like cases; and, third, specific sums for the use of each locomotive, pas-showing a noncompliance with constitutional requirements in the passage of a bill authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers of the two houses.

Skinner v. Deming, 2 Ind. 558, 54 Am. Dec. 463; Coleman v. Dobbins, 8 Ind. 156; McCulloch v. State, 11 Ind. 424; Coburn v. Dodd, 14 Ind. 347; State ex rel. Brown v. Bailey, 16 Ind. 46, 79 Am. Dec. 405; Cordell v. State, 22 Ind. 1; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 30-52; Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 661, 36 L. ed. 294, 301, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495.

The collection of taxes is a deprivation of property. A tax law is constitutional or unconstitutional according as it does or does not provide, in itself, for such "process" or procedure by the taxing officers as the law recognizes as "due process."

Acts of 1893, chap. 171, violates the requirement of "due process of law," because it fails to provide a tribunal having the duty, as well as the power, to hear and determine the state's claims of increase of valuation.

Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 33 N. E. 421; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 625, 33 N. E. 432.

It violates the requisites of "due process of law" in that there is no provision made whereby the owner of a telegraph plant is given any right, as against any tribunal whatever, to compel a hearing upon a state's specific public claim against him, and his defense thereto.

Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 33 N. E. 421; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 625, 33 N. E. 432.

senger coach, freight car, and truck within the state,—do not conflict with the commerce clause. Although such taxes affect commerce among the states and impede the transit of persons and property from one state to another, yet they do so in the same way, and no other, that taxation of any kind necessarily increases the expenses attendant upon the use or possession of the thing taxed. That taxation produces this result of itself constitutes no objection to its constitutionality. Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 888.

When a state grants a railroad company a franchise to construct a road between named terminals, and to employ thereon machinery and vehicles for transporting persons and property, with a right to charge a certain rate of fare; and, in the grant, stipulates for the semi-annual payment of a definite fraction of the prior receipts from such fares,—such stipulation does not constitute an unconstitutional restriction upon free intercourse and traffic between states. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Maryland, 21 Wall. 456, 22 L. ed. 678.

A state tax upon a railroad on account of tolls or rentals that it receives for the use of a part of its line within the taxing state from another road engaged in interstate commerce is not objectionable as a burden or restriction upon such commerce, although its incidental effect is to increase the amount of tolls exacted for such use. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 158 U. S. 431, 39 L. ed. 1043, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 896.

A state corporation tax law, in so far as it seeks to tax the earnings derived from interstate commerce, is unconstitutional, and an interference with commerce, which is exclusively within the control of Congress. Vermont & C. R. Co. v. Vermont C. R. Co. 63 Vt. 1, 10 L. R. A. 562, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 488, 21 Atl. 262, 731.

A state law taxing the gross earnings of railroad corporations when a large proportion of these are derived from interstate commerce violates the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and is void. Ibid.

The court considered that the cases of Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 230, sub nom. Fargo v. Stevens, 30 L. ed. 888, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857, and Philadelphia & S. Mall S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118, holding unconstitutional a state tax upon corporate gross receipts from interstate commerce, being the latest, must be regarded as overruling the earlier decisions to the contrary in the case of State Tax on Railway Gross Re- ceipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164, and the Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 888. Ibid.

The Vermont court declared the facts in the Philadelphia & Southern Mail Steamship Co. Case to be quite like those in the case then at bar. It would serve no useful end, it said, to trace the line of reasoning adopted in that case, nor to attempt a reconciliation of that decision with the earlier ones of the same court claimed to be variant from it. We, as judges of a state court, are bound by the very language of the Federal Constitution to accept the construction of any part of it made by the supreme court; and in this case the reasoning of that court seems to us entirely unanswerable. We hold, therefore, that our corporation tax law, so far as it seeks to tax earnings derived from interstate commerce, is unconstitutional, as it interferes with that commerce the regulation of which is within the exclusive control of Congress. Ibid.

In the case of Northern P. R. Co. v. Raymond, 5 Dak. 356, 1 L. R. A. 732, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 321, 40 N. W. 538, both sides agreed that a territorial statute imposing a percentage tax upon the gross earnings of a railroad corporation to the extent that these came from the transportation of persons and property across the territorial boundaries, was unconstitutional for conflict with the commerce clause.

A state statute providing that every joint-stock association, company, or corporation of foreign origin, conveying passengers to, from, or through any part of the enacting state, in palace, drawing-room, sleeping, or chair cars on contract with any railroad doing business in such state, shall annually, between stated dates, report on oath to the state auditor the gross amount of its receipts for the previous year both within and without such state, and pay into the state treasury 2 per cent of such a proportion of such gross receipts as the distance traversed within the state bears to the whole distance paid for,—is void for conflict with the commerce clause. State ex rel. Carr v. Woodruff Sleeping & Parlor Coach Co. 114 Ind. 155, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 798, 15 N. E. 814; Indiana v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 11 Biss. 561, 16 Fed. 193.

And to the same effect is the case of Indiana v. American Exp. Co. 7 Biss. 227, Fed. Cas. No. 7,021.

A law defining any person, persons, joint-stock association, company, or corporation, of foreign origin, conveying to, from, or through the state

Due process of law, of course, requires some kind of notice to the taxpayer, either actual or constructive, of the state's specific public claim against him, in order to render his right to defend his property effective, and as incidental to such right.

It imposes an unnecessary burden upon the taxpayer to require him to examine each day the record of the taxing tribunal, and a slight burden upon the state to require the taxing tribunal to give special notice of the state's claim of increase of valuation.

money, metals, merchandise, etc., by express on contract with railroad or steamboat companies (except ordinary railroads and steamboats), to be an express company; and requiring every such express company to make a statement of all its receipts for business done within the state by each of its agents, and its proportion of gross receipts for such business done in connection with other companies, and to pay taxes thereon,—is a valid statute not repugnant to the commerce clause, for it applies only to internal commerce, and taxes only business begun, continued, and ended within the state. Pacific Exp. Co. v. Selbert, 142 U. S. 339, 35 L. ed. 1035, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 810, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 250.

A state tax on the gross receipts from business done wholly within the state by a foreign express company is valid. Southern Exp. Co. v. Hood, 15 Rich. L. 66, 94 Am. Dec. 141.

The receipts of a foreign telegraph company from messages passing between places in different states are not the subject of taxation in the state where they are received. Ratterman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 127 U. S. 411, 32 L. ed. 229, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 59, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1127; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Alabama State Bd. of Assessment, 132 U. S. 473, sub nom. *Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rep. 241, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6, Reversing 110 Pa. 405, 20 Atl. 720.

These decisions must be regarded as overruling, so far as this point is concerned, Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Mayer, 26 Ohio St. 521.

When a state imposes a tax upon the receipts taken within its borders by a foreign telegraph company doing business therein for messages taken therein for transmission, and it is made to appear, or can be established by proof, how much of such receipts were for messages passing between places in different states, and how much thereof were for messages from place to place wholly within the state, the tax is not void in toto, but only so far as it affects business not local. Ratterman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 127 U. S. 411, 32 L. ed. 229, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 59, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1127. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States declared that, under its decisions, there was really no question but that, in so far as a state tax was laid upon receipts properly appurtenant to interstate commerce, it was void; and, so far as it affected only commerce wholly within the state, it was valid.

The exercise of the authority which every state possesses to tax corporations and all their property, real and personal, and their franchises, and to graduate the tax upon the corporations according to their business or income or the value of their property, when this is not done by discriminating against rights held in other states, and the tax is not on imports, exports or tonnage or transportation, cannot be regarded as conflicting with any constitutional power of Congress. Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 888.

The state, said Field, J., in that case, may impose taxes upon the corporation as an entity existing under its laws, as well as upon the capital stock of the corporation, or its separate corporate property. And the manner in which its value shall be assessed, and the rate of taxation, however arbitrary or capricious, are mere matters of legislative discretion.

A tax imposed upon the franchise or business of every domestic corporation, joint-stock company, or association according to its capital stock employed within the taxing state, is neither in form nor substance obnoxious to any provision of the Federal Constitution. It interferes in no respect with commerce with foreign nations or among the several states. It is confined to capital employed in the state by an entity existing under its laws, and the manner in which its value shall be assessed and the rate of taxation are matters of legislative discretion. In no aspect does it profess to regulate commerce, nor, in any proper sense, does it have that effect. People ex rel. Platt v. Wemple, 117 N. Y. 136, 6 L. R. A. 303, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 735, 22 N. E. 1046.

A domestic corporation carrying on both interstate and local commerce, subjected in its home state to taxation upon its corporate franchises, the tax being measured by the amount of capital stock employed within the state without distinction, whether employed locally or not, is not exempt from any part of the tax by reason of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. People ex rel. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Campbell, 70 Hun. 507, 24 N. Y. Supp. 208.

When a tax imposed by a state is laid upon the franchise or business of a corporation, and not upon its property, although it is determined according to the amount of its property and assets employed within the state, the fact that part of such property and assets consists of merchandise imported from foreign countries by such corporation, and held in the original, unbroken packages as imported, and of open accounts arising from the sales of like merchandise in the same condition, will not entitle the corporation to a corresponding abatement of the tax. People ex rel. Wiebusch & H. Co. v. Roberts, 19 App. Div. 574, 46 N. Y. Supp. 570, Affirmed in 154 N. Y. 101, 47 N. E. 980.

A tax upon the corporate franchise of a domestic corporation computed according to the amount of capital employed by it within the state, in a case where the subject thereof is a manufacturer, and would, by the terms of the statute, be exempt if wholly engaged in manufacturing within the state, is not rendered invalid by the fact that, besides manufacturing within the state, the only other business the corporation does therein is the importation from foreign countries of goods of the same kind that it manufactures and the sale thereof in the original, unbroken, imported packages in connection with the sale of its own manufactures. People ex rel. William J. Matheson & Co. v. Roberts, 158 N. Y. 162, 52 N. E. 1102.

A domestic corporation organized under a general railroad act is liable, first, to a state tax upon its corporate franchise or business at a rate fixed by a percentage of its gross earnings for transportation business transacted within the state; and, second, for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchise, or carrying on its business in an organized or corporate capacity, to an annual excise tax or license fee equal to a percentage of its gross earnings from transportation or transmission business originating and terminating within the state, and not including earnings from interstate business, when its entire business consists of loading, unloading, and storing grain and freight going to or coming from places in other states, at an elevator and warehouse with appurtenant railroad tracks that it owns in a harbor of its own state, where it has no boats or railroad rolling stock of its own. People ex rel. Connecting Terminal R. Co. v. Miller, 82 N. Y. Supp. 582.

The subjecting of a domestic manufacturing company to a franchise or license tax because it does business without the state, when manufacturing companies that carry on their business within the state are exempted therefrom, is not a discrimination against those engaged in interstate commerce. State v. Underground Cable Co. (N. J. Eq.) 18 Atl. 581.

Because a corporation is engaged in making electric cables, and performs its functions in another state, it cannot be said, ipso facto, to 60 L. R. A.

be engaged in interstate commerce and for that reason not subject to a license tax on its franchise in the state where it was incorporated. Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Atty. Gen. 46 N. J. Eq. 270, 19 Atl. 733.

A state may constitutionally tax its own corporations upon their franchise, right, or privilege to be a corporation aggregate, and to do business as such, irrespective of the character of the investments or businesses. Hence, a tax upon the franchise of a domestic corporation empowered to do an interstate and foreign commercial business, even if actually exclusively engaged therein, is not violative of the commerce clause in the Federal Constitution. It is, of course, otherwise as to a tax upon the business itself, or on the privilege of doing it, instead of upon the right or privilege of corporate existence. Honduras Commercial Co. v. State Board, 54 N. J. L. 278, 23 Atl. 668.

A corporation is none the less a domestic one, and embraced by a statute imposing a franchise tax upon the right of such to corporate existence, because it also has been incorporated in an adjoining state, and, being a bridge company between two states, cannot lawfully exist and do business without both charters. Nor is it exempt from such a tax because wholly engaged in interstate commerce, or because the river it bridges has been by compact between the states it separates declared a public highway free to all. Lumberville Delaware Bridge Co. v. State Board, 55 N. J. L. 529, sub nom. State, Lumberville Delaware Bridge Co., Prosecutors v. State Board, 25 L. R. A. 134, 26 Atl. 711.

The right of a state to levy and collect taxes upon the value of the corporate franchise it has granted, in the same way and at the same rate that it taxes other franchises and property, is not at all affected by the circumstance that the corporation is solely one owning and maintaining an interstate bridge across a navigable river flowing between its own and an adjoining state, over which passes interstate commerce from which the corporation so taxed collects tolls. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 623, 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486, Affirmed in 166 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 953, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532, Followed in Henderson Bridge Co. v. Negley, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 746, 68 S. W. 989.

And a tax upon the franchise of a domestic corporation owning and operating a ferry between its home state and another, and so engaged exclusively in interstate commerce, is not violative of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. Louisville & J.

Acts of 1893, chap. 171, denies to complainant the equal protection of the laws because it requires appellant, unlike the great mass of Indiana taxpayers: (1) To deliver to the state of Indiana a part of its property wholly outside the jurisdiction of the state of Indiana; (2) to pay to the state of Indiana a tribute on account of its present, and expected, future, successful business management; and (3) to pay to the state of Indiana an indefinite amount in addition to the above amounts, dependent on special conditions of business having no direct relation to appellant.

The states in which the property is of maximum value per mile will not give up a part of the value which they might right-

Ferry Co. v. Com. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 446, 57 S. W. 624.

Although the decision in this case was reversed in the Supreme Court of the United States (188 U. S. 385, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403), this proposition is unaffected. The reversal went upon the ground that a state, in subjecting a corporation of its own creation to a franchise tax computed by capitalizing the net earnings and deducting the value of the tangible property, was bound, also, to exclude the value of franchises granted by another state which it held and owned, and that were necessary to its operations. And, because this had not been done, the judgment was not allowed to stand.

In Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Nolan, 14 Fed. 532, the court refused an injunction to restrain the collection of a state tax laid upon a railroad corporation with a terminal at Memphis, Tennessee, and engaged wholly in interstate commerce, imposed as a license or privilege tax for the doing of an express business. The report does not show whether the railroad company was a domestic or a foreign one. If it was a domestic corporation the state which created it doubtless had the right to lay such a tax upon it; if not the tax was almost certainly illegal.

A limited partnership enjoying privileges essentially like franchises of corporations, and engaged in mining coal and shipping it to points outside of the state, is liable to a state tax on each ton mined in the state where it is organized, and such a tax is not a burden on interstate commerce, but really on privileges exercised wholly within the taxing state. Com. v. Sandy Lick Gas, Coal, & Coke Co. 1 Dauphin Co. Rep. 314.

A statute, however, which imposes a specific tax upon mining, smelting, and ore-refining companies, discriminating between minerals mined and reduced within the enacting state and those removed therefrom before smelting, whereby all the former are free from taxation and all the latter are taxed a cent and a half per ton, is a direct burden upon interstate commerce, and therefore unconstitutional and void. Jackson Min. Co. v. Auditor Gen. 32 Mich. 488.

A state may impose upon insurance corporations chartered by itself a tax upon their entire business as evidenced by their premium receipts from all sources, both within and without the state, without thereby coming in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. *Insurance Co. of N. b. Consolidated corporations and corporations holding franchises from different governments.

The exaction by a state of any sum it chooses to name, or computes by any method it chooses to employ, as a condition upon which, alone, it will permit the consolidation of railroads incorporated in other states with one of its own, and permit the consolidated corporation to acquire, in its territory, the rights and privileges of its own corporation, is not in any sense a burden or restriction upon interstate commerce, whether the exaction is called a fee, a tax, or a license. The question is not one of the power of a state to lay a charge upon interstate commerce, nor yet of its right to prevent a corporation engaged therein from carrying it on within its confines, but simply its right to fix conditions upon which its law respecting the consolidation of corporations may be availed of. Ashley v. Ryan, 153 U. S. 436, 38 L. ed. 773, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 664, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865.

A license fee exacted by a state from its own corporation (the operator of a ferry between it and an adjoining state), of a specific sum for each boat it owns not graduated by the tonnage, is constitutional. The fact that the boats are enrolled and licensed under the national laws does not render the corporation immune. Such an exaction is no tonnage charge, no duty or impost, nor any burden upon commerce. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 365, 27 L. ed. 419, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257.

A bridge company is lawfully subjected by the state which chartered it to taxation upon its capital stock, notwithstanding its bridge crosses a navigable river to another state, and it has been chartered, also, by such state, and received, as well, the consent of Congress to build and maintain its structure. Quincy R. Bridge Co. v. Adams County, 88 Ill. 615.

The taxation by a state which granted the charter of one of the constituents of a consolidated corporation and gave it permission to consolidate, of the capital stock of the consolidated company, when such company exclusively owns and operates a bridge across a navigable river between two states over which interstate commerce passes upon payment of tolls, is not a burden upon such commerce. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co. v. Illinois, 175 U. S. 626, 44 L. ed. 299, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 205.

fully assess for the benefit of their neighbors. On the contrary, if the corporation is chartered in one state, as is the appellant in this case (by the state of New York), that state may assess it upon the whole value of the capital stock.

Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 33, 35 L. ed. 613, 620, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876.

The market value of stocks is not a true measure of value of the property of any corporation.

Acts of 1893, chap. 171, denies to the appellant, as an incorporated owner of telegraph property in Indiana, the equal protection of the laws, because:

1. It establishes a compulsory rule of valuation which is not applied to other taxpayers, and which is unjust as necessarily imposing an exorbitant valuation on the portion of appellant's telegraph plant situated in Indiana, a state in which appellant's plant is of minimum average value per mile, without the possibility of the appellant obtaining a corresponding deduction in other states and countries, where it owns connected property of greater average value per mile.

2. It establishes a compulsory rule of valuation which is not applied to other taxpayers, and which requires the state board to impose an exorbitant valuation on the appellant's telegraph plant in Indiana, by a process whereby it practically imports temporarily into Indiana many elements of value attaching actually, or in the belief of buyers and sellers of appellant's shares, wholly to the business of appellant, and having no relation to the value of its property; and whereby it practically imports tempo-

A general act relating to the imposition and collection of taxes, which, after enumerating certain corporations, embraces all others created pursuant to the laws of the enacting state, and requires each of them to pay yearly a license fee or tax of a specified per cent on the amount of its capital stock, is one taxing the franchise right of corporate existence; and, therefore, when it is applied to, and enforced against, a domestic corporation owning and operating a bridge across a navigable river flowing between the home state and another, which, also, has granted it a charter, and whose business is wholly interstate commerce, there is no violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Lumberville Delaware Bridge Co. v. State Board, 55 N. J. L. 529, sub nom. State, Lumberville Delaware Bridge Co., Prosecutors v. State Board, 25 L. R. A. 134, 26 Atl. 711. Garrison, J., writing for the court in that case, carefully reviews and classifies the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States annulling and sustaining state tax laws more or less affecting interstate commerce. And he lucidly states the distinction between a tax upon the right of corporate existence,—to do business at all in an organized corporate capacity,—and a tax upon the business actually done, or upon the privilege of doing a particular kind of business.

A state which charters a corporation to build a bridge across a navigable river which parts it from an adjoining state may properly include the franchise it has granted, in generally valuing the property of such corporation for the purposes of taxation. It may do this notwithstanding the other state has granted similar franchises to such corporation, and the corporation itself has conformed to the requirements of an act of Congress in respect of bridges across such river, and notwithstanding, too, the bridge is both a post route and a conduit for interstate commerce, and its maintenance the sole business of such corporation. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 953, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532. The proposition is unaffected by the argument of the dissenting members of the court. They dissented because they thought the statute sub judice laid a burden upon interstate commerce by taxing the earnings of the bridge, and that the assessment under it necessarily included franchises granted by another state and the general government.

In Louisville & J. Ferry Co. v. Kentucky, 188 U. S. 385, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 463, Reversing 22 Ky. L. Rep. 446, 57 S. W. 624, the Supreme Court of the United States, having held the tax in dispute invalid because foreign franchisees which the state had no jurisdiction to tax were included as elements of value in the assessment, declined to consider a question presented by the record and discussed by counsel, whether the taxation by the home state of the domestic corporation's franchise from the adjoining foreign state to transport by ferry persons and property from such other state to the home state was not, by necessary effect, a burden on interstate commerce forbidden by the Federal Constitution.

Under a statute for the payment of a state tax by every corporation formed for transportation purposes and doing business within the taxing state, as a tax upon its corporate franchise or business, of a fraction of per cent upon its gross earnings in such state for tolls, transportation, telephone, telegraph, or express business transacted in such state, the computation of the earnings of a domestic railroad corporation forming part of a consolidated company operating an interstate and foreign line may include, not only receipts from business begun, continued, and ended within the taxing state, but, as well, such part of the receipts as may be apportioned to it for business done within the state whether beginning or ending outside of it. There is no conflict in such case with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. People ex rel. Dunkirk, A. Valley & P. R. Co. v. Campbell, 74 Hun, 210, 26 N. Y. Supp. 832.

c. Foreign corporations.

1. Exclusion and conditional admission.

There is certainly one exception to the general rule that a state may, with or without reason, absolutely exclude from its territory any foreign corporation, or, admitting it, attach to its permission to come in any conditions it chooses. That exception is in favor of a foreign corporation which is an agency of the Federal government. If, said Mr. Justice Bradley in Stockton v. Baltimore & N. Y. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 411, 32 Fed. 9, 14, Congress should employ a corporation of shipbuilders to construct a man-of-war, it would have the right to purchase the necessary timber and iron in any state of the Union; and to this statement Mr. Justice Field in Pembina Consol. Siliv. Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 31 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 737, added, "without the permission, and against the prohibition, of the state."

There is, doubtless, one other exception.

rarily into Indiana all the property, rights, and franchises of appellant, regardless of the part of the world in which they may be situated, or under what exclusive jurisdiction they fall.

3. It establishes a compulsory rule of valuation which is not applied to other taxpayers, and which classifies the appellant on account of the character of its personality.

Auditor General*, 53 Mich. 79, 18 N. W. 586.

Acts of 1893, chap. 171, is in violation of

Probably a foreign corporation which has complied with all the terms and conditions of the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, has an absolute right to enter any state and acquire therein necessary facilities for transacting the business of interstate and international telegraphy, and to carry on such business. Pensacola Tele. Co. v. Western U. Tele. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 12, 24 L. ed. 708, 711.

One of the qualifications upon the power of a state with respect of admitting foreign corporations, that was established by this decision, said Mr. Justice Field, afterwards, is that it cannot exclude from its limits a corporation engaged in interstate or foreign commerce. Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403.

But the decision did not go quite to this extent. It decided no more than that a state was powerless to exclude a foreign telegraph corporation engaged in foreign, interstate, and national business, which had complied with the act of Congress just referred to, from occupying national post roads within its boundaries.

Yet there are to be found in the decisions many expressions of opinion which appear to warrant the statement that a state has no power to keep out of its territory a foreign corporation whose business is exclusively foreign or interstate commerce, or both.

The only limitation, said Mr. Justice Field, on another occasion, upon the power of a state to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within its limits, or hiring offices for that purpose, or to exact conditions for allowing it to do business or hire offices there, arises where the corporation is in the employ of the Federal government, or where its business is strictly commerce, interstate or foreign. The control of such commerce, being in the Federal government, is not to be restricted. Pembina Consol. Silv. Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 190, 31 L. ed. 650, 654, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 737.

The question is squarely presented, it was said in another case, whether a state, as a condition of doing business within its jurisdiction, may exact a license tax from a telegraph company a large part of whose business is the transmission of messages from one state to another and between the United States and foreign countries, and which is invested with the powers and privileges conferred by the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, and other acts in 60 L. R. A.

title 65, Rev. Stat. Can a state prohibit such a company from doing such a business within its jurisdiction unless it will pay a tax and procure a license for the privilege? If it can, it can exclude such companies, and prohibit the transaction of such business, altogether. We are not prepared to say that this can be done. Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 811, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380.

The exceptions to the rule that a corporation may not do business in a state which did not create it, save by its consent, which it is free to withhold without reason, embrace only cases where a foreign corporation rests its right to enter upon the Federal nature of its business, as where it has derived its being from an act of Congress, and is an agency of the government performing governmental, or quasi governmental, functions, or is an instrument of, or engaged in, interstate or foreign commerce. Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648, 39 L. ed. 297, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 610, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207.

The law is thoroughly settled that a state may exclude from its limits foreign corporations seeking to do business therein, and may impose whatever limitations and restrictions it may choose as conditions upon their right to come into the state and do business with its citizens. But the rule does not apply to foreign corporations engaged in interstate commerce. State v. Canda Cattle Car Co. 85 Minn. 457, 89 N. W. 66.

In a recent case in the New York court of appeals, O'Brien, J., points to the qualification of the doctrine that a state cannot exclude a foreign corporation engaged in external commerce. Making use of the language of Field, J., in Pembina Consol. Silv. Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 190, 31 L. ed. 650, 654, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 737, above stated, he adds: If the contention of the learned counsel for the relator should prevail, then any manufacturing corporation of another state or foreign country could come here and establish an office or agency, and transact a part, or even the whole, of its business here, and escape taxation entirely on the ground that it was engaged in selling some part of its product in other states or in foreign countries, and therefore was engaged in interstate or foreign commerce within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. People ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 181 N. Y. 64, 70, 29 N. E. 1002.

A state tax on the capital of a foreign corporation engaged in interstate commerce and nothing else, and necessarily requiring a wharf art. 10, § 1, of the Constitution of Indiana, which reads as follows: "The general assembly shall provide, by law, for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation; and shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation of all property, both real and personal, excepting such, only, for municipal, educational, literary, scientific, religious, or charitable purposes, as may be specially exempted by law."

Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1; Fields v. Highland County, 36 Ohio St. 481; Fayette County Treasurer v. People's & Drovers' Bank, 47 Ohio St. 519, 10 L. R. A. 196, 25 N. E. 697; *Gilman v. to receive and discharge passengers and freight, cannot be justified upon the ground that it can lease such wharf only by the consent of the state in which it is located, and, therefore, is subject to taxation by such state, viz.: as a condition imposed by the state for the privilege of doing business therein. Such a tax (the amount being discretionary with the state legislature) would be inconsistent with and subversive of the power vested in Congress over such commerce. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826.

But a state statute requiring every foreign corporation (except an insurance company) which does not invest and use its capital within the state to obtain a license and pay annually to the state $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mill on each dollar of its authorized capital stock before it is permitted to have an office in the state for the use of its officers, stockholders, agents, or employees, does not conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Pembina Consol. Silv. Mtn. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 31 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 787.

In following this decision, and sustaining a tax assessed in virtue of the same statute, the Pennsylvania supreme court held that a railroad corporation chartered by other states, whose main line and branches were wholly outside of Pennsylvania, but connected at various points with other lines that entered and departed from that state, and which had with such lines traffic agreements that made it a link in a chain of railroads carrying through freight and passengers, was liable to pay license fees required by the laws of Pennsylvania from all foreign corporations doing business in that state, because it maintained an office and made some purchases of supplies for its own use in that state. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Com. 114 Pa. 256, 6 Atl. 45.

But this decision was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States because the tax in this case was considered to be in conflict with the commerce clause. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 394, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 178, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 958.

It is well settled by numerous decisions of this court, said Lamar, J., speaking for the court in this case, that a state cannot, under the guise of a license tax, exclude from its jurisdiction a foreign corporation engaged in interstate commerce, or impose any burdens upon such commerce within its limits. Ibid.

And this statement is quoted with approval by Bradley, J., for the court, in Crutcher v. 60 L. R. A.

Yet the court afterwards decided that a state could lawfully require of a foreign railroad corporation engaged in interstate and foreign commerce an excise tax for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchises within such state. Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163.

But later still it was conceded that, although a state might lawfully tax local commerce, yet it could not tax or burden interstate commerce. Neither could it require the taking out of a license as a condition precedent to carrying on foreign or interstate commerce. Osborne v. State, 33 Fla. 162, 25 L. R. A. 120, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 731, 14 So. 588, Affirmed in 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214.

A foreign corporation whose manufacturing operations are carried on in other states, and which maintains an office or sales agency, a storage warehouse, keeps a bank account, refines its crude products, sells and delivers to some extent its refined products, and employs a part of its capital within a state where it did not originate, having a statute for the taxation of foreign corporations doing business therein upon their franchise or business, is subject to taxation in virtue of such statute, notwithstanding it sells its products, purchases its materials, and does its first manufacturing in other states of the Union, or in foreign countries, and is thus engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and invokes the protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. People ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 131 N. Y. 64, 29 N. E. 1002.

The court grounded this decision upon the well-settled principles: (1) That a state has power to exclude foreign corporations from doing business within its jurisdiction; (2) that, if it permits them to come in and transact business, it may tax them for the privilege accorded; (3) that a lawful exercise of the power of taxing corporations for the time being within the jurisdiction of the state is not a regulation of commerce. All of which is indisputable; but the question presses, whether there is not the important proviso that the business is not exclusively interstate or foreign commerce. Ibid.

We are not called upon to determine, in this case, said the same court soon afterwards, whether the state, under the general rule that it may exclude foreign corporations from coming here, and that it is by comity, alone, that such corporations are permitted to exercise corporate franchises outside of the jurisdiction of origin, could lawfully exclude a foreign corporation engaged in interstate commerce from landing its freight and passengers on our shores or at the wharves in the city of New York, or from there receiving freight or passengers. It is sufficient for this case to say that the state has not attempted to exclude the relator from doing business in this state, or withdrawn the comity under which it has been permitted to carry on its business here and acquire real and personal estate for the transaction of its business. People ex rel. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Wemple, 138 N. Y. 1, 19 L. R. A. 694, 33 N. E. 720.

While it is firmly established that a state has power to prescribe the terms upon which a foreign corporation may do business within its territory unless the corporation is engaged in interstate commerce, and may even levy a tax upon its receipts if not so engaged, in matters of commerce between the states the power of the Federal government is exclusive and supreme, and a state law taxing the gross receipts of a foreign corporation derived from interstate commerce in part conducted within the taxing state is unconstitutional and void. State ex rel. Carr v. Woodruff Sleeping & Parlor Coach Co. 114 Ind. 155, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 798, 15 N. E. 814.

A foreign corporation which merely sells through itinerant salesmen soliciting orders within the state, its product manufactured outside of the state, and delivers to customers secured on orders previously taken, is not subject to a state franchise tax imposed generally upon foreign corporations for the privilege of doing business in such state, nor to the penalties imposed for omitting to procure such a license, because such business is interstate commerce and beyond the power of state regulation. Coit & Co. v. Sutton, 102 Mich. 324, 25 L. R. A. 819, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 768, 60 N. W. 690.

But, although no license is required to enable a foreign corporation to have transactions of this character, and it cannot be penalized for engaging in them without such license, because they constitute interstate commerce, yet, if a foreign corporation which does nothing else, and purposes doing nothing else, in the state, voluntarily takes out and pays for a license to do business in such state, mistakenly believing it is obliged so to do, it cannot recover back the payment. Moline Plow Co. v. Wilkinson, 105 Mich. 57, 62 N. W. 1119.

manufacturer or importer procures a license from the state treasurer, and for it pays annually a privilege tax of $500 for each separate brand, although it in terms imposes a tax upon the selling privilege, in effect taxes the fertilizers themselves, and, therefore, as respects fertilizers brought from other states for sale, is void for repugnancy to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. American Fertilizing Co. v. North Carolina Bd. of Agri. 11 L. R. A. 179, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 532, 43 Fed. 609.

But inspection laws of this character, passed in good faith in the exercise of the police power to protect agricultural interests against spurious and low-grade fertilizers, and which exact fees covering the actual cost of inspection, may operate on fertilizers brought in from other states. State ex rel. Goodwin v. Caraleigh Phosphate & Fertilizer Works, 119 N. C. 120, 25 S. E. 795; Patapasco Guano Co. v. North Carolina Bd. of Agri. 171 U. S. 845, 43 L. ed. 191, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 862.

The many cases which have decided controversies between private parties in actions to recover the purchase price of merchandise sold in the course of interstate commerce by foreign corporations without permission or license to do business within the purchaser's state, and the analogous cases not involving taxation, lie wholly without the scope of this note.

2. Business and the privilege of doing business.

It is not an easy matter to say how far a state may tax the business of a foreign corporation, or the corporation itself, for the privilege of doing business within its boundaries, when that corporation is more or less engaged in foreign or interstate commerce. The local business and the privilege of doing a local business, may certainly be taxed. The privilege of doing a business which is exclusively external commerce most certainly cannot be taxed. It is not safe to assert positively aught further.

A telegraph company, although it is engaged in interstate and foreign business, and has accepted the restrictions and obligations imposed by the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, may be taxed by a state in a proper way on account of its occupation and its business. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 26 L. ed. 1067.

The privilege of keeping a ferry, with the right to take tolls for passengers and freight, is a franchise grantable by the state, to be exercised within such limits and under such regulations as may be required for the safety, com-

Messrs. Willard Brown, S. O. Pick-ems, and Charles W. Wells also for ap-pellant.

Messrs. A. G. Smith, W. A. Ketcham, J. W. Kern, A. J. Beveridge, L. O. Bailey, M. Moores, S. Claypool, and J. W. Claypool for appellees.

Howard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit for injunction, begun in the Marion circuit court against the auditors and treasurers of each of the counties of the state in which the lines of the appel-lant telegraph company are situated, to re-strain the county auditors from apportionfort, and convenience of the public. Still, the fact remains that a ferry from one state to another is a necessary means of commercial intercourse between the states, and must be conducted without the imposition by the states of taxes or other burdens on commerce between them. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826.

Speaking, afterwards, of this decision, Brad-ley, J., in Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 306, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118, said: It is hardly necessary to add that the tax on the capital stock of the New Jersey com-pany in that case was unconstitutional because, as the corporation was a foreign one, the tax could only be construed as a tax for the priv-ilege or franchise of carrying on its business, and that business was interstate commerce.

A privilege tax upon the right to run sleep-ing cars to bring passengers into, transport them through, or carry them out of, the taxing state is void. Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34, 29 L. ed. 785, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635; Tennessee v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 51, 29 L. ed. 791, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 643.

In this case, said Blatchford, J., expressing the views of the court, the payment of the tax imposed was a condition prescribed, without complying with which what was done by the plaintiff was made illegal. The tax was imposed as a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to run and use the 36 sleeping cars owned by it as it ran and used them on railroads in Tennessee. The privilege tax is held by the supreme court of Tennessee to be a license tax for the privilege of doing the thing for which the tax is imposed, it being unlawful to do the thing without paying the tax. What was done by the plaintiff in this case in con-nection with the use of the 36 cars, if wholly a branch of interstate commerce, was made by the state of Tennessee unlawful unless the tax should be paid, and, to the extent of the tax, a burden was placed on such commerce; and, upon principle, the tax, if lawful, might equally well have been large enough practically to stop altogether the particular species of commerce. Ibid.

A railroad corporation organized under the laws of two states in which its entire line and branches lie, although by traffic agreements and connections with other lines that enter a third state it carries freight and passengers coming from and going to such other state, cannot, in the latter state, be subjected to a license tax for the privilege of maintaining, for the pur-ing to the several townships of such coun-ties, and entering upon the tax duplicates, the amounts claimed as taxes against said appellant company for the year 1893, based upon the valuations certified to such county auditors by the state board of tax commis-sioners under provisions of an act of the general assembly of the state of Indiana ap-proved March 6, 1893 (Act 1893, p. 374; Rev. Stat. 1894, § 8478, and following), and from delivering the tax duplicates contain-ing such entries to the county treasurers. The grounds upon which the injunction was asked were that the act in question was not passed in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the state of Indiana; and, if duly enacted, that it is in violation of said Constitution and of the Constitution of the United States. To the complaint for injunction a demurrer was sustained, and poses of its business merely, an office therein, when it owns no property and has no invested capital in such state, because the sole business of such office as it maintains is interstate com-merce. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 394, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 178, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 958.

A state law providing that every corporation, joint-stock company, or association, domestic and foreign alike, that does business in the state, to a tax upon its corporate franchise or busi-ness, computed at a certain percentage of its capital stock either at par value or actual value according as dividends of a stated per cent have or have not been paid thereon during the cur-rent year, is not, when applied to a foreign mining company which brings into such state bars of silver from other states and there makes them into standard bars, and does nothing else in such state except its financial business and correspondence, repugnant to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403.

A state law providing that every corporation, person, or association operating a railroad shall pay to the state annually an excise tax for the privilege of exercising its franchises therein, the amount thereof being ascertained by divid-ing the gross transportation receipts of the previous year by the number of miles of rail-road operated, to get the average of such re-cceipts per mile, and then taking a larger or smaller percentage thereof according as they are less or more than certain stated sums, and, in case of railroads partly within and partly without the state, proportioning the mileage operated and the gross receipts within the state to both totals and averages,—is valid as against a foreign railroad corporation operating an in-terstate and international railroad, and engaged in external commerce, both foreign and between states. Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163. Four members of the court, Bradley, Harlan, Lamar, and Brown, JJ., dissented in this case. They held that, although a state might have power to exact from a for-eign railroad corporation a tax for the priv-ilege of exercising its corporate franchises with-in the state limits, yet, an unconstitutional mode of doing this could not be adopted. They asserted that the mode adopted in the case at bar was to lay a tax upon gross receipts, and, inasmuch as the major part of these was de-rived from international and interstate com-this ruling of the court is the only error assigned on the appeal.

The first proposition argued by the able counsel for appellant is that the act in question, and under the provisions of which the assessment of taxes was made, never became a law of the state of Indiana; for the reason that, as shown by the journals of the senate and house of representatives, the bill was passed by the legislature, and sent to the governor, within the two days next preceding the final adjournment of the general assembly, in violation of article 5, § 14, of the state Constitution. A demurrer admits facts well pleaded, but does not admit all the conclusions which may be drawn from such facts by the pleader. Because it is alleged in the complaint that the bill was passed and sent to the governor on March 6, 1893 (the last day of the session), it is not, therefore, admitted by the demurrer that the statute was enacted in violation of the Constitution. The exact point here made was made and decided against the contention of appellant in the case of Bender v. State, 53 Ind. 254. It was there contended, as it is here, that the courts have the power to go behind the statute, and inquire whether or not the act was passed according to the Constitution; and numerous authorities, as here, were cited in support of the contention. The court in that case, however, deemed it unnecessary to review the decision cited, or to consider the arguments advanced, for the reason that the question had been fully considered and finally decided in the case of Evans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514, 95 Am. Dec. 710, saying, expressly: "We regard the question as settled, and will not open it." In Evans v.

merce, the tax was laid upon such commerce, and, therefore, was unconstitutional and void.

A municipal ordinance requiring a license to be obtained by every person, firm, company, or corporation engaged in any trade, business, or profession within the city, and charging telegraph companies or agencies each for business done exclusively within the city, and not including any business done for the national government or between places of which one is outside the state, a license fee of $500, is not, when enforced against a foreign telegraph company engaged in interstate and foreign business, void for conflict with the commerce clause. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Charleston, 153 U. S. 692, 39 L. ed. 871, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 637, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1094.

The questions here under consideration were involved and thoroughly discussed in an action brought by the revenue agent of the state of Mississippi to recover of a foreign telegraph corporation operating in that state a privilege tax imposed, by a state law, on each telegraph company operating 1,000 or more miles, $3,000 in lieu of all other taxes, state or local, and on each such company operating a less mileage $1 a mile. In the state court, Woods, J., in delivering the opinion sustaining the tax, naively writes: The record presents a Federal question, and we acknowledge ourselves bound to follow the decisions of the court of last resort of the United States, if that court shall be found to have adjudicated it. Our difficulty arises from our inability to say with confidence what the Supreme Court of the United States has finally determined in cases of like character. The reported decisions of that court are so irreconcilable in their variances and seeming conflicts, in our view, that it is with diffidence that the impartial student can affirm what will or will not follow in any given state of case. If the line of decisions adopted in Pennacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 26 L. ed. 1067; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826; Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380; and Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851,—stood alone, the settlement of the controversy in the case at bar would be made without great difficulty in accordance with the contention of the appellant. If we had for our guidance only the other line of decisions, embracing State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164; Ostborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. 479, 21 L. ed. 470; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 365, 27 L. ed. 419, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961; Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163; Ficklen v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 145 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 601, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 79, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 810; St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485,—the right of the revenue agent of the state to maintain this suit successfully would seem to be well established in accordance with the views of the counsel for the appellee. The learned judge thereupon proceeds to reason out a conclusion, as follows: This is the case of a foreign corporation admitted to the use and enjoyment of its corporate franchises in our state upon the terms of perfect equality with all others. It is freely permitted to engage in the vast and varied employments connected with its business; it has the use and enjoyment of the country highways of the state and the streets of our villages, towns, and cities for the planting of its poles and the construction of its lines; and it has the care and protection of our laws and government. In return, the state claims the right to treat it as she treats similar corporations chartered by her own authority. She asserts her authority to tax the exercise of its franchises in her midst as she does all others, domestic as well as foreign corporations. The state may tax its property as she does all other property of persons or corporations within her limits. She may tax the exercise of its franchises within her borders and under the sheltering protection of her laws and government. The privilege tax, the tax on the business, the occupation, the tax on the exercise of franchises, may be incidentally burdensome to interstate commerce. Every tax is a burden, and, to the extent imposed, is an interference with the pursuit or business on which it is laid. If the business is partly interstate commerce, then that commerce is incidentally affected and interfered with by every tax of any nature whatever that may be levied on it. In the case at bar there is no direct burden upon interstate commerce; there is no further interference with it than will be found necessarily to result from the imposition of any burden of taxation in any shape. Postal Teleg.

Browne, after a complete examination of the question, including a discussion of the authorities in this and other states, it was held that the courts of this state must take judicial notice of what is and what is not the public statutory law of the state, and also that, where a statute is authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature, the courts will not search further to ascertain whether such facts existed as gave constitutional warrant to those officers to thus authenticate the act as having received legislative sanction in such manner as to give it the force of law. These holdings have been since adhered to by this court, and we are of opinion that they are in accordance with the weight of authority. Edger v. Randolph County, 70 Ind. 331; Madison County v. Burford, 93 Ind. 383; Stout v.

Boice*, 140 Ind. 506, 39 N. E. 64, 40 N. E. 113, we have again considered this question, and reached the same conclusion. See also Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 249, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495, where the question is discussed. The authentication of the act in the manner provided in art. 4, § 25, of the Constitution, that "all bills and joint resolutions so passed shall be signed by the presiding officers of the respective houses," is conclusive evidence that the act was duly passed in conformity with the provisions of the organic law of the state. This decision was affirmed, and the tax in question held not to conflict with the commerce clause, by the Supreme Court of the United States. Id. 155 U. S. 688, 39 L. ed. 811, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 1, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, 360. Two of the justices, Brewer and Harlan, JJ., dissented on the ground that the tax was one for the privilege of exercising the franchise of, or doing business as, an interstate carrier of telegraphic messages, and so was a regulation of interstate commerce and void.

A state tax law which requires all foreign corporations, save certain designated ones, doing business in the enacting state, to pay upon their franchise or business a state tax graded according to annual dividends, and based upon the amount of capital stock employed within the state, and by the terms of which there are exempted from such tax all corporations, both domestic and foreign, wholly engaged in manufacture, or in mining ores within the taxing state, does not, when applied to and enforced against a manufacturing corporation created by another state, and which does a general business in the taxing state of selling and delivering its manufactured products from a permanently maintained warehouse, conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution by discriminating against the manufactures of other states. New York v. Roberts, 171 U. S. 658, 43 L. ed. 323, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58.

Nor does the circumstance that such corporation also, through its managing agent, imports from foreign countries crude materials some of which are sold at such warehouse in the original and unbroken packages, render such tax invalid for repugnancy to the commerce clause. Ibid. Justices Harlan and Brown dissented in this case. They thought that, under the commerce clause, it was not competent for a state to impose a tax upon the franchise or business of manufacturing corporations which were not wholly engaged in manufacturing within its limits, and at the same time expressly exempt from such tax other manufacturing corporations because they were wholly engaged in manufacturing within such state. This kind of discrimination, in their opinion, not only operated against the products of other states contrary to the commerce clause, but against producers in other states to the extent of denying them the equal protection of the laws.

A tax upon privileges levied by virtue of a state statute embracing sleeping-car companies carrying passengers from one point to another 60 L. R. A.

within the taxing state, and charging a specific sum, and, in addition, a further sum per mile for each mile of railroad track within the state over which they run their cars, is not a burden upon, or regulation of, interstate commerce when enforced against a foreign corporation engaged therein, because it is imposed for the privilege which such company is free to forego, of carrying on a local business. Pullman Co. v. Adams, 189 U. S. 420, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494, affirming 78 Miss. 814, 29 So. 917.

A state statute making the capital employed within the enacting state by a foreign corporation that does business therein the basis of a tax for the privilege of doing business as and in the name of a corporation does not conflict with the commerce clause. People ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 131 N. Y. 64, 29 N. E. 1002.

The imposition of a tax upon a foreign corporation, by a state in which it does business, on its business therein, even when the subject of the tax is engaged in external, as well as internal, commerce, is not in conflict with the Federal Constitution. People ex rel. Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Campbell, 70 Hun, 507, 24 N. Y. Supp. 208.

A statute providing for the taxation of domestic corporations, and of foreign ones doing business in the state which enacted it, upon their corporate franchises or business, imposes, not a property tax upon either class, but a tax upon the franchises only of domestic corporations and a tax upon the business only of foreign ones. And, when the business of a foreign railroad corporation is entirely interstate commerce,—when it carries on no interior commerce whatever, but has merely a terminal at the boundary line where all its business either begins or ends,—such business is not taxable, because the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution prevents. Such a tax cannot be sustained on the ground that it is laid upon the privilege the foreign corporation enjoys of coming into the state and exercising its corporate functions, since, granting the power of the state thus to tax a foreign corporation exclusively engaged in interstate commerce, such a statute is not cast in a form to attain such end, nor, in enacting it, has the legislature manifested any such purpose. People ex rel. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Wemple, 138 N. Y. 1, 19 L. R. A. 694, 33 N. E. 720.

Mr. Chief Justice Andrews, who wrote for the court, reasons thus: The business in which the relator was engaged was exclusively that of interstate commerce. Whatever it did here tary of state, comes to us as by the solemn authentication of the legislature itself, under the hand and seal of its presiding officers. Such authentication imports absolute verity as to the passage of the act, even as in the case of the acts of a court, which are authenticated by its certificate and seal under the hand of its clerk.

Counsel further contend, second, that the act is invalid, in that it fails to provide due process of law; third, in that it denies to the appellant the equal protection of the laws; fourth, in that it violates the provisions of the Constitution of the United States which prohibit any state from laying any imposts or duties on imports or exports; fifth, in that it is in violation of the provisions of the state Constitution which require a uniform and equal rate of taxation; sixth, in that it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, as being a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce; seventh, in that it is in violation of the Constitution of the state, as being a local or special law; and, eighth, in that it is in violation of the state Constitution, as conferring judicial powers upon executive and administrative officers.

We are of opinion that these propositions have already, in effect, been considered by this court and by the Supreme Court of the United States, and decided against the several contentions of appellant, in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, and other Indiana Railroad Tax Cases, 133 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 133 Ind. 609, 625, 33 N. E. 421, 432, 443, and 154 U. S. 421-447, 38 L. ed. 1031-1046, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114, 1122. It is to be remembered that the law under consideration (Acts was incident to and in aid of the business of interstate transportation. Interstate transportation was not a part only of its business in this state. It performed the work of an interior carrier in other states, but in this state its business was that of interstate commerce exclusively. There may, therefore, be eliminated from the discussion the question which would arise in the case of a foreign corporation conducting within this state both the business of strictly interior transportation and that of interstate carrier to points within and from points without the state. We do not intend to be understood, he is careful to add, whether, in that case, the state might not lawfully impose upon such a corporation, in common with all other corporations, domestic and foreign, doing business here, a business tax based upon its capital employed in this state. There would seem to be no question that domestic corporations engaged in both state and interstate commerce may lawfully be subjected by the state to a franchise tax measured by its whole capital or business, or in any other way in the discretion of the legislature, without taking notice of the part of its business arising from interstate commerce, provided no hostile discrimination is made against such part. Nor would there seem to be any valid reason why a foreign corporation, engaged both in the business of state and interstate transportation in this state, should not be subject to taxation in common with domestic corporations. But what Chief Justice Andrews styled the crucial question in the case, to wit: Can the state tax a foreign corporation upon its business carried on in the state which is exclusively interstate commerce? or, in another form, May a state tax a foreign corporation whose business in such state is exclusively interstate commerce, for the privilege of transacting that business there?—the court answered in the negative. Ibid.

The tax assessed under the statute which was involved in the last-cited case, and in the Parke Davis & Co. Case (New York v. Roberts, 171 U. S. 658, 43 L. ed. 323, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58), just before noticed, was contested by the American Soda Fountain Company. It has already been stated that such statute exempted from the tax all corporations that were wholly engaged in manufacturing within the state. Parke Davis & Co. complained that it was discriminated against because it did its manufacturing without the state. But the American Soda Fountain Company did manufacturing within the state. It would have been exempt from this tax in case it did nothing else within the state. Besides manufacturing, however, it 60 L. R. A.

was, according to the record, engaged in interstate commerce, and in that only. It would have been exempt, therefore, from this tax if that had been its sole business, under the decision last cited. In the supreme court of the state it was held not taxable. Parker, J., for the majority, saying: It was evidently carrying on two lines of business in this state. One that of manufacturing only, in which all the capital it had in this state was employed. The other that of selling by samples. This latter business was, however, protected from taxation by the Federal laws regulating interstate commerce. And Herrick, J., in dissenting, said: The relator is not wholly engaged in carrying on manufacture; it is doing other business within this state besides that of manufacture. It may be, and probably is, true that none of its capital stock is engaged in this state in any other than manufacturing business; but it has places of business, employees, and samples of its wares, and at those places of business, by those employees, and from those samples, sales are made. It is a business that is done in connection with its manufacturing, and in connection with the sales of those articles manufactured within the state; and the fact that part of that business is exempt from taxation does not make it a corporation wholly engaged in manufacturing. People ex rel. American Soda Fountain Co. v. Roberts, 29 App. Div. 585, 51 N. Y. Supp. 487.

The decision was reversed by the court of appeals, and the views of the dissentients prevailed. Id. 158 N. Y. 168; 52 N. E. 1104.

A corporation, six sevenths of whose business consists in the importation of foreign goods and the sale thereof in unbroken packages as imported, and the remainder in selling broken packages of such goods and similar goods of domestic production, is taxable, in virtue of said statute, upon its business in said state upon the basis of its whole capital employed therein, notwithstanding the commerce clause and import-duty clause of the Federal Constitution. People ex rel. A. Klipstein & Co. v. Roberts, 36 App. Div. 597, 55 N. Y. Supp. 950.

This decision was affirmed in the court of appeals upon the opinion below, without, as the court said, expressing any opinion as to the result had the relator's business been wholly that of foreign or interstate commerce. Id. 167 N. Y. 617, 60 N. E. 117.

The case rested upon the Parke-Davis Case, sub nom. New York v. Roberts, 171 U. S. 663, 43 L. ed. 325, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58, but went much farther. In the Parke Davis & Co. Case the importing business was a mere 1893, p. 374; Rev. Stat. 1894, § 8478, and following), for the assessment and taxation of telegraph and other like companies, is supplementary to and amendatory of the general act for taxation (Acts 1891, p. 199; Rev. Stat. 1894, § 8408, and following); and also that the duties and powers of the state board of tax commissioners and other assessing and taxing officers of the state are defined and prescribed solely in said general tax law of 1891. The two acts are, therefore, to be treated not only as in pari materia, but as in fact but different parts of one and the same law of taxation; and hence all the sections of the act under consideration are to be so construed, if possible, as to harmonize the same with the provisions of the general law. All questions raised on this appeal, therefore, in relation to due process of law, the equal protection of the laws, notice to appellant of the time and place of meeting of the state board of tax commissioners, the right of appellant to appear before said board, and be heard on the assessment of its property before the final assessment is made, taxation of interstate commerce, local or special laws, and the giving to executive and administrative officers judicial powers, were directly passed upon, and the provisions of the statute fully sustained, in the Backus Cases, above cited.

The additional provisions of the act of 1893, so far as they affect this case, are as follows:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Indiana, that any joint-stock association, company, copartnership, or corporation, whether incorporated under the laws of this state or of any other state, or of any foreign nation, engaged in incident to the general business of marketing its manufactured products, and the contest waged over the question whether it was discriminated against because it did its manufacturing outside of the state. In the Klipstein Case, importing and selling imports in the original, unbroken packages was plainly the main business of the relator, and all else that it did merely incidental thereto. The tax in the Klipstein Case, in effect, rested upon foreign commerce.

A state tax laid upon the business of a foreign corporation doing business in the taxing state, measured by the amount of capital stock employed within such state, is not abated by the consideration that a part of such capital is employed in foreign commerce. People ex rel. Kippens, S. & W. Co. v. Roberts, 51 App. Div. 152, 64 N. Y. Supp. 627.

A foreign corporation without a place of business of any kind in another state, whose transactions therein are confined to filling orders taken by its traveling salesmen and sent to its home office, is not liable to a tax laid by such state upon corporations doing business therein as merchants. Com. v. American Tobacco Co. 178 Pa. 531, 34 Atl. 223; Woessner v. H. T. Cottam & Co. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 611, 47 S. W. 678; Wagner v. J. & G. Meakin, 33 C. C. A. 577, 63 U. S. App. 477, 92 Fed. 76.

A state statute enacting that owners of palace, parlor, or sleeping cars, except railroads operating domestic railways, shall not have a right to charge or collect fares for the use of such cars in the state without a license procurable only upon annually making a sworn statement of gross earnings from the use of such cars between places within the state, and the payment of a license fee of 2 per cent on such earnings, requires from a foreign palace-car company engaged in interstate commerce only a statement of its gross earnings from fares on journeys which both begin and end within the state, and not of the proportionate part of fares for such part of the journeys beginning or ending, or both, without the state, as the part traversed within the state bears to the fares paid for the whole passage. State v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 64 Wis. 89, 23 N. W. 571.

This construction certainly left the statute free from objection upon the score of the commerce clause, and the court did not deem it worth while to say whether or not the act, differently construed, would be constitutional.

A county ordinance requiring a transcontinental railroad invested with Federal franchises to take out and pay for a license to continue its business of carrying persons or freight for hire in railroad cars in such county is unconstitutional and void. San Benito County v. Southern P. R. Co. 77 Cal. 518, 19 Pac. 827.

The former decisions of the court in Central P. R. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 60 Cal. 35; Los Angeles v. Southern P. R. Co. 61 Cal. 59; and Santa Clara County v. Southern P. R. Co. 66 Cal. 642, 6 Pac. 744,—were overruled, the court declaring that, in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073, it would be useless to follow them, as it was clear that in a proper case the Supreme Court of the United States would hold the ordinance in the case at bar void.

A license tax which is a tax upon the privilege of doing business that involves interstate commerce is void. It cannot be saved by showing that the railroad subjected to it operates only a branch line wholly within the jurisdiction of the authority imposing the tax. San Bernardino v. Southern P. R. Co. 107 Cal. 524, 29 L. R. A. 327, 40 Pac. 796.

A statute requiring all foreign corporations regularly doing business in the state to be assessed and taxed, for and in respect of the business transacted by them in such state, a transit duty of a stated sum on every passenger and each ton of freight carried on any railroad or canal in the state beyond a named distance, except passengers and freight transported exclusively within the state, lays a burden upon interstate commerce, and, hence, is unconstitutional and void. Erie R. Co. v. State, 31 N. J. L. 531, 36 Am. Dec. 226.

But a foreign company whose entire business consists in transporting oil from points in other states to points in the taxing state, although engaged merely in interstate commerce, may none the less constitutionally be subjected to "an annual tax, for the use of the state, by way of a license for its corporate franchise," of a stated percentage of "the gross amount of its receipts from the transportation of oil or petroleum through its pipes in the state" during the preceding year; the said gross amount being such a proportion of the gross receipts for transportation of oil or petroleum over its whole line as the length of its line in the taxing state bears to the entire length thereof. Tide Water Pipe Co. v. State Board, 57 N. J. L. 516, 27 L. R. A. 684, 31 Atl. 220.

The court relied for its authority upon Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163, saying that it was so apposite as to

The total capital stock of such association, company, copartnership, or corporation. Second. The number of shares of capital stock issued and outstanding, and the par or face value of each share. A state statute providing for the payment by express companies of yearly license or privilege taxes in lieu of all other than ad valorem taxes, if the lines are less than 100 miles long, $1,000, and, if longer, $3,000, for one or more packages taken up at one point and carried to another within the state, although purporting on its face to apply only to express business within the state, is none the less, when applied to an express company doing an interstate business, a burden upon interstate commerce. United States Exp. Co. v. Allen, 39 Fed. 712. The court said such statute was not an exercise of the police power. That the amount of business done had no relation to the tax. As much had to be paid for a license to carry one package 5 miles as to carry a million packages over 100 miles when the line was longer. The tax depended wholly on the length of the line, and was a mere device for taxing the express company.

The imposition of a heavy annual tax upon express companies doing business in the state for the privilege of doing such business, sanctioned by severe penalties for doing business without first paying it, upon a foreign joint-stock company engaged in interstate commerce, is void for repugnancy to the commerce clause, notwithstanding such company does local business, when the statute does not discriminate between internal and external business. United States Exp. Co. v. Hemmingway, 39 Fed. 60.

The cases of Com. v. Smith and Com. v. United States Exp. Co. 92 Ky. 38, 17 S. W. 187, are very similar, and were decided the same way.

A statute which requires every common carrier that conveys express matter from one place to another for hire to procure a license, and pay therefor a tax graduated according to the amount of business done, and which makes the obtaining of such license and the payment of such tax a condition precedent to the carrier's doing any business whatever, inasmuch as it does not discriminate between internal and interstate express business, and cannot be construed to apply alone to internal traffic, is void for conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. State v. Northern P. Exp. Co. (Mont.) 71 Pac. 404.

A county cannot recover of a corporation created by, and domiciled in, another state, where its boats are enrolled and all its property has its situs, and whose exclusive business is ferrying across a navigable river between two states, penalties for not taking out a ferry license as required by the laws of the state in which such county is situated, merely because it maintains therein a landing place. St. Clair County v. Interstate Car Transfer Co. 100 Fed. 741.

A foreign telegraph corporation carrying on an interstate and foreign business, and operating in a state other than the one which gave it life, by virtue of its compliance with the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, is not to be subjected, in such other state (which has granted it no franchise), to a franchise tax, because of the protection of the commerce clause. San Francisco v. Western U. Tele. Co. 96 Cal. 140, 17 L. R. A. 301, 31 Pac. 10.

While a state cannot tax either the interstate or government business of a telegraph company, it has the power to tax so much of its business as is carried on wholly within the state lines, provided the tax is not levied in gross upon both external and internal business, but is restricted solely to that within the state. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Fremont, 39 Neb. 692, 26 L. R. A. 698, 5 Intern. Com. Rep. 48, 58 N. W. 415.

A statute requiring every person, corporation, or association doing business in the state as a telephone company to pay a license, in each county where such business is transacted, of 75 cents a year for each instrument in use, is not in conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, since it is to be construed as limited in its application to instruments used for messages between points lying wholly within the state, because of the constitutional infirmity of the state to lay such an excise upon interstate telephonic communication. State v. Rocky Mountain Bell Teleph. Co. (Mont.) 71 Pac. 311.

Section 5, p. 378, provides, amongst other things, that "upon the filing of such statements the auditor of state shall examine them, and each of them, and if he shall deem the same insufficient, or in case he shall deem that other information is requisite, he shall require such officer to make such other and further statements as said auditor of state may call for."

Section 6, p. 379, reads as follows: "Upon the meeting of the state board of tax commissioners for the purpose of assessing railroad and other property, said auditor of state shall lay such statements, with such information as may have been furnished him, before said board of tax commissioners, who shall thereupon value and assess the property of each association, company, copartnership, or corporation in the manner hereinafter set forth, after examining such statements and after ascertaining the value of such properties therefrom, and from such other information as they may have or obtain. For that purpose they may require the agents or officers of said association, company, copartnership, or corporation to appear before them with such books, papers, or statements as they may require, or they may require additional statements to be made to them, and may compel the attendance of witnesses, in case they shall deem it necessary, to enable them to ascertain the true cash value of such property."

From information thus obtained, § 7 pro-

franchise or privilege granted by the state. It is a right which every citizen of the United States is entitled to exercise under the Constitution and laws of the United States; and the accession of mere corporate facilities as a matter of convenience in carrying on their business cannot have the effect of depriving citizens of such right, unless Congress should see fit to interpose some contrary regulation on the subject. Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 861.

A state has the right to regulate its internal commerce, and a license for the privilege of doing business within its limits is not a regulation of commerce. A business is exclusively local when a city office is maintained for the sale of merchandise to all comers, and packages brought in from other states are broken and their contents sold in the usual way of carrying on business in the state. State v. Hammond Packing Co. (La.) 34 So. 368.

These statements may well be regarded as guides pointing generally to a correct determination of particular cases as they arise.

1. Telegraph, railroad, express, and other transportation business.

A foreign corporation operating telegraph lines throughout the United States, and which has complied with the act of Congress relating to the constructing of telegraphs and the government use thereof, cannot be compelled to pay a municipal license tax imposed in lieu of ad valorem property taxes, greater in amount than would be such taxes if assessed at the same rate as other property in the same city is assessed, when the ordinance imposing the excise does not limit its application to business confined to the limits of the state, and does make the payment of the tax a condition precedent to the doing of business at all in the city. Such an ordinance is void for conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Richmond, 99 Va. 102, 37 S. E. 789, Overruling the earlier contrary decision in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Richmond, 26 Gratt. 1.

A municipal ordinance, however, passed under legislative authority, imposing a yearly license tax for revenue upon the business or occupation of taking messages in the city from persons therein and sending them by telegraph from such city to persons and places in the same state, and of receiving and delivering in such city telegraph messages sent by persons at and from places in the same state, expressly excluding and declaring free messages between United States government departments, agents, and agencies, and interstate commerce messages,—is not repugnant to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fremont, 39 Neb. 692, 26 L. R. A. 698, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 46, 58 N. W. 415.

To the same effect are Moore v. Eufaula, 97 Ala. 670, 11 So. 921; Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Charleston, 56 Fed. 419, Affirmed in 153 U. S. 692, 38 L. ed. 871, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 637, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1094; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Charleston, 56 Fed. 419, Appeal Dismissed in 163 U. S. 711, 41 L. ed. 309, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1208.

A municipal ordinance passed pursuant to a charter power requiring all in the city that engage in the business of operating a railroad for transporting freight or passengers, or both, to and from the city to and from other places in the same state, and who keep an office or place of business within such city, to pay an annual license tax for each main line of road used in connection with such business running into or through the city; and, before engaging in such business, to take out and pay for a license to carry it on,—is not in conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, since it affects only business done within the city limits. Anniston v. Southern R. Co. 112 Ala. 557, 20 So. 915.

The same decision was made in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Bessemer, 113 Ala. 668, 21 So. 64, and in Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama City, 134 Ala. 414, 32 So. 731.

But a state statute which allows a municipality to exact license taxes from every railroad doing business within it, without limiting its application to internal state business exclusively, is void as an interference with interstate commerce, although the ordinance in pursuance thereof bases the tax upon internal business alone. Southern R. Co. v. Asheville, 69 Fed. 359.

The reason given for this conclusion is that, inasmuch as a municipality can tax only by virtue of legislative authority, an unconstitutional statute confers none.

In Piedmont R. Co. v. Reldsville, 101 N. C. 404, sub nom. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Reldsville, 2 L. R. A. 284, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 416, 8 S. E. 124, the opinion was expressed that a municipal ordinance imposing upon such railroad traversing the city a tax of $50, being a tax upon business within the municipality, and such taxes having been authorized by the legislature, was not repugnant to the commerce clause; but no decision was rendered because of the incompleteness of the record in the case.

vides for the manner of assessing such property within the state as follows: The market value of the capital stock, added to the mortgages thereon, if any, shall be taken for the true cash value of the whole property. If there is no market value, then the actual value shall be taken. "For the purpose of ascertaining the true cash value of the property within the state of Indiana," the board shall next deduct from the value of the whole property "the assessed value for taxation in the localities where the same is situated, of the several pieces of real estate situate without the state of Indiana, and not specifically used in the general business of such associations." The true cash value of the property within the state of Indiana shall then be found by taking the proportion of such balance which the length of the telegraph lines within the state bears to the total length of the lines. "From the entire value of the property within the state so ascertained, there shall be deducted, by said board, the assessed value for taxation of all the real estate, structures, machinery, and appliances within the state and subject to local taxation in the counties and townships, . . . and the residue of such value so ascertained, after deducting therefrom the assessed value of such local properties, shall be by said board assessed to said association."

By § 8 it is provided that the value of 1 mile in the state shall be found by dividing "the residue of such value so ascertained" by the total mileage in the state.

Section 9, p. 381, provides for certifying the valuation so found for each county to the several county auditors, and § 10 for a

The supreme court of Alabama, and afterwards the Supreme Court of the United States, held that a municipal ordinance requiring every express or railroad company whose business extended out of the state, and which was doing business within the ordaining city, to pay a stated annual license fee, imposed without discrimination alike upon residents and nonresidents, upon natural and artificial persons, and foreign and domestic corporations, under penalty of fine for neglect or refusal,—imposed merely a charge for the privilege of doing business within the city limits, irrespective of the character of such business: and, therefore, that it placed no burden or restriction upon external commerce, notwithstanding the subjects thereof were engaged therein. Osborne v. Mobile, 44 Ala. 493; Southern Exp. Co. v. Mobile, 49 Ala. 404; Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. 479, 21 L. ed. 470.

But afterwards the Supreme Court of the United States, in referring to this decision, said: This court, in December, 1872, held that the ordinance was not unconstitutional. In view of the course of decisions which have been made since that time it is very certain that such an ordinance would now be regarded as repugnant to the power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce among the several states. Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 311, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380.

Thereupon, it decided that a municipal ordinance adopted pursuant to a power given by the state legislature, laying a tax, called a license tax, but designed to afford revenue, of $225 on telegraph companies, and imposing upon the agents thereof pecuniary penalties if they neglect or refuse to pay it, is, when applied to a foreign telegraph corporation authorized, under the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, to enter and do business in the state, a tax for the privilege of carrying on its business; and, as such business is transmitting telegrams between states and to and from foreign countries, the ordinance and tax are void for repugnancy to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Ibid.

But when a state-license tax law, as construed by the highest court of the state that enacted it, in exacting from the agent of an express company engaged in interstate commerce a license fee for his business or occupation under pain of fine or imprisonment, applies only to the local business of such company, wholly within the state, and does not apply at all to its international or interstate business, which the company is left at liberty to carry on without a license or paying any tax, provided it does no local business,—there is no conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214, Affirming 33 Fla. 162, 25 L. R. A. 120, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 781, 14 So. 588.

A state law which requires from the agent of every express company, not incorporated in the enacting state, a license from an officer of such state before he is allowed to do any business for his company in that state, when such business embraces the carriage of express matter between different states as well as between places within the state; and which requires, also, a statement to be made and filed by the company itself showing the possession by it of a capital of $150,000 in cash or safe securities not stock notes,—is plainly a regulation of, a burden or restriction upon, interstate commerce, and as such is void for repugnancy to the Federal Constitution. Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851.

Such a statute cannot be upheld as an exercise of the police power of the state to protect and secure citizens who intrust property to express companies for carriage, because, however promotive of the public good it may be, the subject is beyond the regulative power of the state, and belongs exclusively to Congress. Ibid.

We do not think, said the court, that the difficulty is at all obviated by the fact that the express company, as incidental to its main business, which is to carry goods between different states, does also some local business by carrying goods from one point to another within the state. It does not obviate the objection that the regulations as to license and capital stock are imposed as conditions on the company's carrying on the business of interstate commerce,—manifestly the principal object of the organization. These regulations are clearly a burden and a restriction upon that commerce. Whether intended as such or not, they operate as such. Ibid.

This decision was followed in the state supreme court in Com. v. Smith, 92 Ky. 38, 17 S. W. 187.

A municipal ordinance to the effect that every express company, or agency thereof, doing an express business in the city, shall pay an ad valorem tax equal to that which is levied upon real estate within the city limits for general and special purposes, upon the gross amount of all moneys which, during the year, shall have been received by such company or agency within the city as a compensation for transacting such express business, does not violate the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution when like distribution by the auditors to the townships.

It will be noticed that the method thus provided for assessing telegraph property in the state is not essentially different from that prescribed in the general tax law of 1891 for the assessment of railroad property. In both cases the local property is assessed by local officers, and the general or unit property by the state board of tax commissioners. In both the companies are required to make property statements to the auditor of state, to be by him laid before the state board. In both the time and place of meeting of the board is fixed by law. In both the companies may come before the board to make such further statements as they desire, and they may be required to do so. In both the board may seek such other information as they shall be able to find, in order to enable them to discover the true cash value of the property in the state. In both it is the property in the state, and that alone, that can be assessed. And in both the standard of valuation is the same as in assessing all other property in the state; namely, "the true cash value."

In the Backus Railroad Tax Cases, 133 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 33 N. E. 421, it was contended by counsel for appellants, both in this court and in the Supreme Court of the United States, that the general tax law of 1891 authorized the importation of values into this state by the state board of tax commissioners, or the taxing by them of property of the railroads not within the jurisdiction of the state, for the reason that such taxation seemed to be implied in § 80 of that act, and also for the reason that the fourth item of the schedule filed with set in operation against a foreign corporation whose business in such city consists in receiving packages to be transported from the city to points beyond the state. American Union Exp. Co. v. St. Joseph, 68 Mo. 675, 27 Am. Rep. 382.

But a municipal ordinance imposing a license tax on every express company having an office in the city, and receiving goods, wares, and merchandise, and forwarding them to points within the same state, or receiving goods, etc., within such state and delivering them in the city, is void for conflict with the commerce clause, because it includes business coming from without the state. Webster v. Bell, 15 C. C. A. 360, 25 U. S. App. 379, 68 Fed. 183.

This conclusion was reached upon a somewhat technical construction of the statute, sub judice, that plainly aimed at being confined to internal business, and might plausibly have been so construed.

The weight of authority, it is said in a very recent case, establishes, as a general rule, for the interpretation of license acts applying to corporations engaged in both local and interstate commerce, that, in the imposition of a tax upon such a corporation, the interstate business must be discriminated from the internal business, or it must be capable of being so discriminated so that it will clearly appear that the internal business alone is taxed. Whenever the subjects of taxation can be separated so that that which is interstate commerce can be distinguished from that which is commerce wholly within the state, the distinction will be made by the courts, and the state permitted to collect the tax upon the commerce solely within its own territory. If, however, the terms of the statute are such,—if the license fee is a unit charge upon the business as such; is strictly an occupation tax,—if there is no attempt to differentiate the local from the foreign business in the language of the statute, and the license is a prerequisite to commencing or continuing business,—the charge must be deemed an interference with, an attempt to regulate, interstate commerce; and, therefore, the statute imposing it is void. State v. Northern Pacific Exp. Co. (Mont.) 71 Pac. 404.

A municipal ordinance passed under powers granted by the legislature requiring a license to establish and operate a ferry between the United States and Canada, and exacting for it a fee sufficient and intended to afford revenue, and prohibiting unlicensed ferries under penalties, is not obnoxious to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, even when applied to a ferry enrolled and licensed under national laws for coasting and foreign trade. Chilvers v. People, 11 Mich. 43.

The invalidity of a license tax-law upon the means of carrying on interstate commerce is unaffected by the fact that the commerce it relates to is wholly between states other than, and entirely without, the taxing state. If a state may not constitutionally tax commerce passing through, coming into, or going out of, it, a fortiori it may not tax commerce which does not come near it. Therefore, an ordinance imposing municipal license taxes, requiring the quarterly payment of a stated sum for every railroad agency, under penalty of a heavy fine or long imprisonment, when enforced against an agent of a foreign railroad whose entire line and terminals are in distant states, who neither receives nor disburses money, and who sells no tickets, but merely labors to induce passengers leaving the state to be booked over his road at the other end of their journeys,—is unconstitutional and void for repugnancy to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 391, 3 Intera. Com. Rep. 181, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881.

This decision in effect overrules Lightburne v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 4 Lea, 219.

A municipal ordinance requiring every person who operates and maintains in the city any telephone instrument for which rent is charged to pay an annual license fee for each instrument so used was not intended to, and does not, apply to, or affect in any manner, business of an interstate character; but was intended to, and does, apply to and affect only local business done within the city as shown from the rental of instruments therein. It therefore does not burden or interfere with interstate commerce. Ogden City v. Crossman, 17 Utah, 66, 53 Pac. 985.

2. Trade.

A statute laying an annual tax of $200 upon every sewing-machine company selling or dealing in sewing machines either by itself or agents, and upon all wholesale dealers in sewing machines made by companies that have not paid such tax; and requiring companies and wholesalers to furnish a list and pay annually $10 for each of their county agents, whereupon a certificate of authority to do business in the state is to be issued,—is not, applied to a foreign corporation that manufactures its machines without the state, and sells them out of stocks brought into the state for the purpose by agents, resident or nonresident, repugnant the auditor of state by the companies required them to report the value of their capital stock for the consideration of the state board, as provided in § 85 of that act (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 8503), as follows: "Fourth. A statement or schedule showing: (1) The amount of capital stock authorized and the number of shares into which such capital stock is divided; (2) the amount of capital stock paid up; (3) the market value, or if no market value, then the actual value of the shares of stock; (4) the total amounts of all indebtedness except for current expenses for operating the road; (5) the total listed valuation of all its tangible property in this state." We think that the schedule required of telegraph companies by the act of 1893, now under consideration, is not substantially unlike the foregoing, required of railroad companies under the act of 1891. In one respect, at least, the schedule under the act of 1893 is more favorable to the companies; namely, in providing for a deduction of the valuation of real property outside the state from the total valuation.

In answer to the contention, made in the Railroad Tax Cases, as to assessment of imported valuations, and also that assessments ought to be made on a basis of cost of construction and maintenance and with reference to value of land and material in actual use by the companies, without regard to business connections or to "character and amount of business done and the financial credit of the different companies," both of which contentions are also urged in this appeal, the Supreme Court of the United States said in Pittsburgh, O. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, no discrimination being made between foreign and domestic corporations, citizens and strangers. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 97 Ga. 114, 35 L. R. A. 497, 25 S. E. 249; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 33 Fed. 121, Appeal Dismissed in 141 U. S. 696, 35 L. ed. 906, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 103.

The cases of Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754, Affirming 9 Bart. 518, and Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. ed. 430, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 68, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 367, Affirming 103 Mo. 247, 11 L. R. A. 219, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 527, 15 S. W. 81, are to the same effect; and both were followed upon this point in Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Carver, 118 N. C. 328, 24 S. E. 352.

One traveling with a team, and selling sewing machines carried with him, made out of the state by a foreign corporation, his stock being replenished from a depot within the state, is not engaged in interstate commerce, and may lawfully be penalized for so trafficking without a state license applying to all who travel and sell sewing machines, musical instruments, and lightening rods, without discriminating between residents and nonresidents, or home and foreign products. State v. Richards, 32 W. Va. 348, 3 L. R. A. 706, 9 S. E. 245.

A statute whereby the agent for the sale of articles made in other states must first obtain a license to sell, for which he is required to pay a specific tax for each county in which he sells or offers to sell them, while an agent for the sale of articles made within the state need not be licensed nor pay any license tax, is, because of discriminating in favor of home manufactures, and against those of other states, void as a regulation of commerce between the states. Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S. 844, 26 L. ed. 565.

A foreign corporation selling, through traveling salesmen, by wholesale, its manufactures made at home, is engaged in interstate commerce in states where such sales are made. It is, therefore, not bound to comply with statutory conditions prescribed as precedents to such a business. Com. v. Hogan, McM. & T. Co. (Ky.) 74 S. W. 737.

Although a traveling salesman employed by a foreign corporation and furnished by his employer with a conveyance and samples of its wares, engaged in soliciting orders in Georgia, which his principal fills by shipments from the home state, either to the purchasers direct or to other agents to deliver, is a peddler, within the statutes of Georgia, requiring peddlers to take out licenses, and penalizing those who do 60 L. R. A.

not do so; yet, if he is a nonresident of the state, he is exempt, because his business is interstate commerce, and under the protection of the Federal Constitution. Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 758, 8 L. R. A. 273, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 146, 11 S. E. 238.

But if such an agent, after he has taken for nonresident principals a number of orders for goods without the state at the time, receives them by shipments in bulk, and, breaking bulk, delivers to the respective purchasers, he is subject, in that state, to a license tax, notwithstanding the commerce clause. Racine Iron Co. v. McComma, 111 Ga. 536, 51 L. R. A. 134, 36 S. E. 866.

Inasmuch as the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on all questions appertaining to the construction of the Federal Constitution and the laws of Congress are paramount, then, under the interpretation of that tribunal of the Tennessee statute involved in Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 480, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, and the constitutional power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, that part of the Louisiana statute (Act 101, of 1886, § 12) which declares all traveling agents offering any species of merchandise in this state for sale, or selling the same, by sample or otherwise, shall pay a license of $50, must be held to violate the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and the license tax provided therefor must be adjudged to be illegal in respect of nonresident merchants sending into the state goods in unbroken packages for sale through traveling agents soliciting customers and selling by sample. Simmons Hardware Co. v. McGuire, 39 La. Ann. 848, 2 So. 592.

A state law declaring any person selling, or offering to sell, at retail, manufactured implements or machines other than sewing machines, unless he be the owner and duly licensed as a merchant, or taking orders therefor on commission, an agent for the sale of manufactured articles; and prohibiting him from acting as such without a license, and then only in person under penalty of a fine for each violation, and fixing the license fee for the privilege of transacting such business,—applies to the traveling agents of a foreign manufacturing corporation who take orders for its wares, to be filled from a general depot or warehouse within the state, and sell and deliver them to the purchasers they find. Such business is not interstate commerce. American Harrow Co. v. Shaffer, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 336, 68 Fed. 750, Appeal Dismissed for lack of jurisdiction in 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114; "Again, the act is challenged as permitting and requiring the assessment and valuation of property outside the state. . . . We do not think that the matters referred to justify any such imputation. It is not to be assumed that a state contemplates the taxation of any property outside its territorial limits, or that its statutes are intended to operate otherwise than upon persons and property within the state. It is not necessary that every section of a tax act should in terms declare the scope of its territorial operation. Before any statute will be held to intend to reach outside property, the language expressing such intention must be clear. . . . It is obvious that the intent of this act was simply to reach the property of the railroad within the state. . . . No intent to the contrary can be deduced from the provision requiring the corporation to file a statement of its total stock and indebtedness, for that is one item of testimony fairly to be considered in determining the value of that portion of the property within the state. The stock and the indebtedness represent the property. As said by Mr. Justice Miller in State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 605, sub nom. Taylor v. Secor, 23 L. ed. 670: 'When you have ascertained the current cash value of the whole funded debt, and the current cash value of the entire number of shares, you have, by the action of those who above all others can best estimate it, ascertained the true value of the road, all its property, its capital stock, and its franchises; for these are all represented by the value of its bonded debt and of the shares of its capital stock.' In Franklin County v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 12 Lea, 521,

One engaged in taking orders for a corporation of another state whose business office and factory are in its home state, for the enlargement of portraits afterwards shipped into the state for delivery to the customers, is not amenable to a municipal license ordinance making it unlawful to hawk, peddle, or solicit the sale or purchase of pictures save on payment of a specific monthly fee, because he is protected by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Re Tinsman, 95 Fed. 648.

A municipal ordinance exacting a license from the agent of a foreign corporation, who receives from it portraits and their frames separately, to be put together by him and then delivered to customers who have previously placed orders therefor, is void as a regulation of interstate commerce. Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229, Reversing 127 N. C. 521, 37 S. E. 138.

This decision weakens the authority of the above-cited case of Racine Iron Co. v. McCommons, 111 Ga. 536, 51 L. R. A. 134, 36 S. E. 866.

Books shipped by a foreign corporation into another state, consigned to an agent, who delivers them to purchasers upon the instalment plan, and afterwards collects payments as they become due, although received and delivered in the original packages as shipped, do not constitute interstate commerce so as to defeat the application of the laws of such state concerning peddling and the licensing thereof to the agent making the deliveries. Collier v. Burgin, 130 N. C. 632, 41 S. E. 874.

Municipal ordinances imposing license taxes on wholesale and retail dealers in meats, and burdensome restrictions as to the times when and places where, and the quantities of meats that may be sold, which have the effect, necessarily, to hamper and burden dealers in dressed meats brought in from other states; from all of which charges, restrictions, and burdens all persons selling the meat from animals they have themselves raised are expressly exempted and freed,—are unconstitutional and void as regulations of interstate commerce and denials of the equal protection of the laws. Georgia Packing Co. v. Macon, 22 L. R. A. 775, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 508, 60 Fed. 774, Appeal Dismissed, because a constitutional question was involved. In 9 C. C. A. 262, 13 U. S. App. 592, 60 Fed. 781.

e. Occupations.

A tax on the occupation of an importer is a tax on importation. It must add to the price of the article, and be paid by the consumer, or by the importer himself, in like manner as a direct duty on the article itself would be made. This the state has not a right to do, because it is prohibited by the Constitution. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678.

The exaction of a license tax as a condition of doing any particular business is a tax on the occupation; and a tax on the occupation of doing a business is surely a tax on the business. Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 311, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380.

No one questions, said Field, J., the general power of the state to require licenses for the various pursuits and occupations conducted within her limits, and to fix their amount as she may choose. And no one on this bench,—certainly not the writer of this opinion,—would wish to limit or qualify it in any respect, except when its exercise may impinge upon the just authority of the Federal government under the Constitution, or the limitations prescribed by that instrument. But where a power is vested exclusively in that government, and its exercise is essential to the perfect freedom of commercial intercourse between the several states, any interfering action by them must give way. This was stipulated by the indissoluble covenant by which we become one people. Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S. 344, 26 L. ed. 565.

The invalidity of a license tax upon the occupation of carrying on interstate commerce is not affected by the fact that the business subjected to it may not be essential to such commerce, and that the latter is burdened thereby insignificantly and very remotely. If the business is actually a part of interstate commerce, and assists in any degree in increasing it, or aids in carrying such commerce on, it is beyond the power of a state to tax. McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 391, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 181, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881.

The cases of which Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592; Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129, 32 L. ed. 368, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 241, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; Ficklen v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 145 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 601, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 79, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 810; Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 38 L. ed. 719, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 658, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829; and Stockard v. Morgan, 185 U. S. 27, 46 L. ed. 785, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576,— 539, the supreme court of Tennessee, in a well-considered opinion, which was quoted with approval by this court in Columbus Southern R. Co. v. Wright, 151 U. S. 470, 479, 38 L. ed. 238, 242, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396, thus referred to the means of ascertaining the value of a railroad track: 'The value of the roadway at any given time is not the original cost, nor a fortiori, its ultimate cost after years of expenditure in repairs and improvements. On the other hand, its value cannot be determined by ascertaining the value of the land included in the roadway assessed at the market price of adjacent lands, and adding the value of the cross-ties, rails, and spikes. The value of land depends largely upon the use to which it can be put, and the character of the improvements upon it. The assessable value for taxation of a railroad track can only be determined by looking at the elements on which the financial condition of the company depends,—its traffic as evidenced by the rolling stock and gross earnings in connection with its capital stock. No local estimate of the fraction in one county of a railroad track running through several counties can be based upon sufficient data to make it at all reliable, unless, indeed, the local assessors are furnished with the means of estimating the whole road.' . . . When a road runs through two states, it is, as seen, helpful in determining the value of that part within the state to know the value of the road as a whole. It is not stated in this statute that, when the value of a road running in two states is ascertained, the value of that within the state of Indiana shall be determined absolutely by dividing the gross value upon a mileage basis, but are typical,—sometimes styled "The Drummer Cases,"—involving merely the validity of taxes upon individuals selling property brought in from other states, whether belonging to corporations or not,—do not lie within the scope of this note. When cases of this character have been cited at all, they have illustrated some phase of excise taxation of corporations. This line of decisions embraces, besides the cases mentioned or elsewhere cited in this note, Corson v. Maryland, 120 U. S. 502, 30 L. ed. 699, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 50, 7 Sup. Ct. The general rules deducible from this line of cases are, that, if the statute imposing the occupation tax has a limited application to persons who are exclusively engaged in interstate commerce; or if it is made to operate upon goods made in, or the products of, other states, not yet brought in the taxing state, or upon agents who exclusively represent nonresident principals in commercial transactions only,—it is unconstitutional. But, if those who follow the taxed occupation are engaged in internal and local commerce, separately or even in combination with external commerce; or if the statute operates impartially, without discrimination, upon domestic and foreign products and residents and nonresidents alike, the commerce clause is not violated.

In so far as the cases of Cumming v. Savannah, R. M. Charlt. (Ga.) 26; People v. Coleman, 4 Cal. 46, 60 Am. Dec. 581; Sears v. Warren County, 36 Ind. 267, 10 Am. Rep. 62; and Biddle v. Com. 13 Serg. & R. 405,—run counter to these rules, they may be said to be against the weight of authority.

The case of Seymour v. State, 51 Ala. 52, which was contrary to these principles, was afterwards, in Vines v. State, 67 Ala. 73, expressly overruled.

It was because these rules were broken by the state of Missouri that its statute respecting peddlers' licenses was condemned as a violation of the commerce clause, in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347.

The Missouri statute discriminated in favor of goods and merchandise the growth or product of that state, and against those grown or made in other states, in the conditions upon which sales were permitted to be made by traveling dealers.

The Wisconsin peddlers' license tax act (Laws 1870, chap. 72), which, in substance, was the same as that of Missouri, was held not to be in conflict with the commerce clause. Morrill v. State, 38 Wis. 428, 20 Am. Rep. 12.

But afterwards that decision was overruled upon the authority of the Missouri case just mentioned, and the latter decision was followed. Van Buren v. Downing, 41 Wis. 122.

A tax law operating by discriminating provisions against the citizens or products of other states, to fetter commerce among the states, would infringe the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and be void. But a simple tax on sales of merchandise, imposed alike upon only that the total amount of stock and indebtedness shall be presented for consideration by the state board. Nevertheless, it is ordinarily true that, when a railroad consists of a single continuous line, the value of one part is fairly estimated by taking that part of the value of the entire road which is measured by the proportion of the length of the particular part to that of the whole road. This mode of division has been recognized by this court several times as eminently fair. Thus, in State Railroad Tax Cases, on page 608 [92 U. S. on page 671, 23 L. ed.] it was said: 'It may well be doubted whether any better mode of determining the value of that portion of the track within any one county has been devised than to ascertain the value of the whole road, and apportion the value within the county by its relative length to the whole.' And again, on page 611, 23 L. ed. page 673: 'This court has expressly held in two cases, where the road of a corporation ran through different states, that a tax upon the income or franchise of the road was properly apportioned by taking the whole income or the value of the franchise, and the length of the road within each state, as the basis of taxation. Delaware Railroad Tax Case, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 888; Erie R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 Wall. 492, 22 L. ed. 595.' The mileage basis of apportionment was also sustained in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876; Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters.

all sales made in a city, whether by a citizen or a stranger, and whether the goods sold are the product of the state or not, without any attempt to discriminate injuriously against the products of other states or the rights of their citizens, is not an attempt to fetter commerce between the states, and is valid. Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. 123, 19 L. ed. 382.

Grant, says Clifford, J., that states may impose discriminating taxes against citizens of other states, and it will soon be found that the power conferred upon Congress to regulate interstate commerce is of no value, as the unrestricted power of the state to tax will prove more efficacious to promote inequality than any regulation which Congress can pass to preserve the equality of right contemplated by the Constitution among the citizens of the several states. Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449.

I concur, said Bradley, J., in the same case, in the opinion of the court that the act of the legislature of Maryland, complained of in this case, discriminates in favor of residents and against nonresidents of the state, and consequently is in violation of the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore pro tanto void. But I am further of the opinion that the act is in violation of the commercial clause of the Constitution, which confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several states; and it would be so although it imposed upon residents the same burden for selling goods by sample as is imposed on nonresidents. Such a law would effectually prevent the manufacturers of manufacturing states from selling their goods in other states unless they established commercial houses therein, or sold to resident merchants who chose to send them orders. It is, in fact, a duty upon importation from one state to another under the name of a tax. I therefore dissent from any expression in the opinion of the court which in any way implies that such a burden, whether in the shape of a tax, or of a penalty, if laid equally upon residents and nonresidents, would be constitutional. Ibid.

Ficklen v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 145 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 601, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 79, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 810, is to be distinguished from Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, which preceded it, and from Stockard v. Morgan, 185 U. S. 27, 46 L. ed. 785, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576, which followed it; both holding a privilege tax laid upon an agent of an out-of-the-state principal, selling merchandise within the taxing state, coming from another state and doing such business exclusively, void for conflict with the commerce clause, by the circumstance that Ficklen, on the contrary, had an unrestricted license to do business generally as a broker, and was authorized to do any and all kinds of business for both residents and nonresidents, in state and local, as well as ultra state, products, and so was liable to pay the privilege tax, although, for the particular year that he disputed it, he had represented only nonresident owners and dealt in foreign goods.

The business of operating, under a United States license, towboats upon navigable waters between different states, is interstate commerce; and whose engages therein is not liable to a state or municipal occupation license tax. Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 69, 28 L. ed. 653, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 38; Frere v. Von Schoeler, 47 La. Ann. 324, 27 L. R. A. 414, 16 So. 808.

And a municipal ordinance exacting a license for the privilege of navigating a river flowing through the city and emptying into the harbor, from the owner of every tug, steam barge, or towboat, when such vessels are enrolled and licensed under the Federal laws, and are actually engaged in interstate and international coasting, and in towing vessels so engaged, is void as a burden upon external commerce. Harman v. Chicago, 147 U. S. 396, 37 L. ed. 216, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306.

But a state revenue act requiring each money or exchange broker to pay a specified annual tax is not, when applied to a dealer in foreign bills only, in common and equally with other brokers doing a domestic business exclusively, in conflict with the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. Nathan v. Louisiana, 8 How. 73, 12 L. ed. 993.

XI. Charges for facilities, services, and piloting.

It has now become settled law that state statutes, such as pilotage and quarantine acts, and laws imposing charges for the use of wharves, the services of port officers and tolls for improved navigation, and the use of highway, although they are regulations of commerce and impose burdens upon it, are constitutional enactments. The exactions made in virtue of such laws are valid excises, and constitute an excepted class to ordinary burdens laid upon commerce.

A compulsory state pilotage law is not objectionable as violating the commerce clause, the prohibition against state imposts or duties on imports or exports or tonnage taxes, or of any preference by commercial regulation or rev-

In again considering these questions, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 439, 38 L. ed. 1041, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122, said: "The true value of a line of railroad is something more than an aggregation of the values of separate parts of it, operated separately. It is the aggregate of those values plus that arising from a connected operation of the whole, and each part of the road contributes not merely the value arising from its independent operation, but its mileage proportion of that flowing from a continuous and connected operation of the whole. . . . When a road runs into two states, each state is entitled to consider as within its territorial jurisdiction, and subject to the burdens of its taxes, what may perhaps not inaccurately be described as the proportionate share of the value flowing from the operation of the entire mileage as a single continuous road. It is not bound to enter upon a disintegration of values, and attempt to extract from the total value of the entire property that which would exist if the miles of road within the state were operated separately. Take the case of a railroad running from Columbus, Ohio, to Indianapolis, Indiana. Whatever of value there may be resulting from the continuous operation of enue act to the ports of one state over another; nor yet against entering, clearing, or paying duties by vessels of one state in the ports of another, in the Constitution of the United States. Such a law may lawfully require vessels of a stated tonnage and upwards, going to or coming from other state or foreign ports, to take aboard a pilot, or pay half fees if they refuse. It may devote such half fees to the relief of disabled and superannuated pilots, their widows and children, as that is germane to any system of pilot regulation. And it may exempt vessels in a particular trade, vessels of small tonnage, and vessels plying on particular waters, and still be constitutional. Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996.

The mere grant to Congress of the power to regulate commerce, said Mr. Justice Curtis, in that case, writing for the majority of the court, did not deprive the states of power to regulate pilots. And, although Congress has legislated on this subject, its legislation manifests an intention, with a single exception, not to regulate this subject, but to leave its regulation to the several states. The diversities of opinion, he continued, which have existed upon this subject, have arisen from the different views taken of the nature of this power. But, when the nature of a power like this is spoken of; when it is said that the nature of the power requires that it should be exercised exclusively by Congress,—it must be intended to refer to the subjects of that power, and to say they are of such a nature as to require exclusive regulation by Congress. Now, the power to regulate commerce embraces a vast field containing, not only many, but exceedingly various, subjects, quite unlike in their nature; some imperatively demanding a single, uniform rule, operating equally on the commerce of the United States in every port; and some, like the subject now in question, as imperatively demanding that diversity which, alone, can meet the local necessities of navigation. Either absolutely to affirm or deny that the nature of this power requires exclusive legislation by Congress is to lose sight of the nature of the subjects of this power, and to assert, concerning all of them, what is really applicable to but a part. Whatever subjects of this power are, in their nature national, or admit only of one uniform system or plan of regulation, may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive regulation by Congress. That this cannot be affirmed of laws for the regulation of pilots and pilotage is plain. This view was shared by Taney, Ch. J., Catron, McKinley, Nelson, and Grier, JJ. Dan- 60 L. R. A.

iel, J., who concurred in the result, was of the opinion that the law, sub judice, was not a regulation of commerce at all, but only an exercise of the police power, and one not committed to Congress. McLean, J., dissented because he thought the act a regulation of commerce repugnant to the commerce clause under which the power of Congress was all in all exclusive. And in this view Wayne, J., concurred. Ibid.

In Ex parte McNeil, 13 Wall. 236, 20 L. ed. 624, Swayne, J., speaking for the court, and conceding pilot laws to be regulations of commerce, says that, in the Federal system, the governmental powers fall into four classes: (1) Exclusive state powers; (2) exclusive national powers; (3) concurrent powers; and (4) powers permitted to the states until Congress acts, when they become dormant until conditions recur to warrant their renewed exercise; and that the commercial power is, in part, a power of the fourth class. Some of the regulations of commerce, he says, must be uniform throughout the country from their very nature, and to that extent the Federal power is exclusive; others may well vary with varying circumstances of different localities. Pilot laws are of this nature, and states may, if Congress does not, act with respect of this subject.

Ex parte Loud, 154 U. S. 582, and 20 L. ed. 627, was decided the same way, and both sustained the validity of the challenged law.

It is the same regarding quarantine laws. While a quarantine law which detains at a station every vessel arriving at a state port until it is examined and certified by a health officer and fumigated, if infected; and which exacts from every such vessel, according to its character as ship, bark, brig, schooner, steamship, or steamboat, a larger or smaller specific fee devoted to the payment of official salaries and to the increment of a fund to meet quarantine expenses exclusively,—is undoubtedly a regulation of commerce, it is not in conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, because the subject is local in its character, not national, and consequently within the police powers of the state, and not exclusively belonging to Congress. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Louisiana Bd. of Health, 118 U. S. 455, 30 L. ed. 237, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114.

But, while the power to establish quarantine laws rests with the state, and has not been surrendered to the general government, and the states may lawfully raise a revenue from executing and enforcing them, notwithstanding they operate as burdens and restrictions upon commerce, yet the means employed by the state must be such as the United States' Constitution—that road is partly attributed to the portion of the road in Indiana and partly to that in Ohio, and each state has an equal right to reach after a just proportion of that value, and subject it to its taxing processes. The question is, How can equity be secured between the states? And to that a division of the value of the entire property upon the mileage basis is the legitimate answer. Taking a mileage share of that in Indiana is not taxing property outside of the state."

All that is thus forcibly and convincingly said as to the taxation of interstate railroad property is equally applicable to the taxation of interstate telegraph property. It is not easy to see how 1 mile of appellant's telegraph line connecting Chicago with New York could be of less value than any other mile of the same line. Cut out 1 mile, even though it be through a swamp or un-al restrictions on the taxing power allow; and a duty of tonnage or impost without consent of Congress is not among them. Peete v. Morgan, 19 Wall. 581, 22 L. ed. 201.

And it is lawful to charge wharfage to all vessels making use of the wharves. Although such charges are burdens upon commerce, they are in the nature of compensation for facilities afforded. Cannon v. New Orleans, 20 Wall. 577, 22 L. ed. 417; Keokuk Northern Line Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80, 24 L. ed. 377; Northwestern Union Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U. S. 423, 25 L. ed. 688; Vicksburg v. Tobin, 100 U. S. 430, 25 L. ed. 690; Guy v. Baltimore, 100 U. S. 434, 25 L. ed. 743; Cincinnati, P. B. S. & P. Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U. S. 444, 30 L. ed. 976, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 379, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 907.

A state may lawfully exact payment for the services of its port officers, inspectors, etc., although rendered compulsorily. Pittsburg & S. Coml. Co. v. Louisiana, 156 U. S. 590, 39 L. ed. 544, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 18, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459; State ex rel. Ravenel v. Charleston, 4 Rich. L. 286.

Provided the exaction does not take the form of a duty of tonnage. Inman S. S. Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S. 238, 24 L. ed. 118; Cole v. Johnson, 10 Daly, 238.

And also provided there are services actually rendered. Southern S. S. Co. v. New Orleans Portwardens, 6 Wall. 31, 18 L. ed. 749.

And if a state makes improvements in a navigable stream, whereby its navigability is materially enlarged so as to be open for a greater distance, or for larger vessels, or be safer, she may lawfully charge tolls for the use thereof against such as avail themselves of the benefits. Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543, 30 L. ed. 487, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 313; Sands v. Manistee River Improv. Co. 123 U. S. 295, 31 L. ed. 149, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 113; Kellogg v. Union Co. 12 Conn. 7.

And, without violating the commerce clause, a state may require the owner of every vehicle used upon the streets of a city to pay a license fee to augment a fund devoted to the care and repair of such streets. Bogart v. Ohio, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 297.

We concede, said Strong, J., for the court in the State Freight Tax Case, the right of the owners of artificial highways, whether such owners be the state or grantees of franchises from the state, to exact what they please for der a lake, and the value of the whole line is practically destroyed. The property is a unit, valuable as a whole, and by reason of its several connections, and not by virtue of any part taken by itself. No way, therefore, by which the value of the lines in this state can be determined, seems so just and equitable as to take that proportion of the whole value which the mileage in this state bears to the whole mileage.

A further contention made against the act of 1893, that it provides for a taxation of interstate commerce, is conclusively answered in Cleveland, O. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 445, 38 L. ed. 1046, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122: "It has been again and again said by this court that, while no state could impose any tax or burden upon the privilege of doing the business of interstate commerce, the use of their ways. That right is an attribute of ownership. A tax is a demand of sovereignty; a toll is a demand of proprietorship. 15 Wall. 232, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 146.

XII. Conclusion.

Can the conceded right of a state to exclude from its territory any foreign corporation be exercised against a corporation engaged in interstate or foreign commerce? Does the conceded right of a state to attach any conditions it chooses to its consent to the entrance upon its soil of a foreign corporation authorize it to impose upon such a corporation, seeking entrance and engaged exclusively in foreign or interstate commerce, a tax which in effect is a burden upon such commerce? No decision has explicitly answered these questions. In every case where they were propounded either the corporation involved was not exclusively engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or else the tax laid upon it was considered to be no burden upon, interference with, or regulation of, such commerce. It may, however, be said with confidence that the decisions warrant the conclusion that a state may exclude the corporation, but not the commerce in which it is engaged. It may condition the foreign corporation, but it must leave unconditioned the commerce that it does. A foreign corporation may send its agents into another state to buy and sell property to be taken out of or sent into such state in the course of commerce; it may send its products to a market therein, without the consent, even against the will, of the state; but it cannot, without the state's permission, tacit or expressed, establish itself therein and carry on its business, even though that business is interstate or foreign commerce. The exception to this doubtless is a telegraph corporation that has complied with the terms of the act of Congress of July 24, 1866; and another exception probably is a corporation actually an agency of the national government in carrying into effect its constitutional powers. It is probable, also, that a foreign corporation, whose business was exclusively interstate or foreign commerce or both, would have the right, in spite of the objection of a state, to gain and maintain a foothold therein for the express and sole purpose of carrying on such commerce so far as it might be absolutely essential for it so to do. The cases of Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34

merce, yet it had the unquestioned right to place a property tax on the instrumentalities engaged in such commerce. See, among many other cases, Marye v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 127 U. S. 117, 32 L. ed. 94, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1037; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876. The rule of property taxation is that the value of the property is the basis of taxation. It does not mean a tax upon the earnings which the property makes, nor for the privilege of using the property, but rests solely upon the value. But the value of property results from the use to which it is put, and varies with the profitableness of that use, present and prospective, actual and anticipated. . . . If property is taxed at its actual cash value, it is taxed upon something which is created by the uses to which it is put. . . . Take, for illustration, property whose sole use is for purposes of interstate commerce; such as a bridge over the Ohio between the states of Kentucky and Ohio. From that springs its entire value. Can it be that it is on that account entirely relieved from the burden of state taxation? Will it be said that the taxation must be based simply on the cost, when never was it held that the cost of a thing is the test of its value? Suppose there be two bridges over the Ohio, the cost of the construction of each being the same; one between Cincinnati and Newport, and another twenty miles below, and where there is nothing but a small village on either shore. The value of the one will, manifestly, be greater than that of the other, and that excess of value will spring solely from the larger use of the one than of the other. Must an assessing board of either state, assessing that portion of the bridge within the state for purposes of taxation, eliminate all of the value which flows from the use, and place the assessment at only the sum remaining? It is a practical impossibility. Either the property must be declared wholly exempt from state taxation, or taxed at its value, irrespective of the causes and uses which have brought about such value. And the uniform ruling of this court—a ruling demanded by the harmonious relations between the states and the national government—has affirmed that the full discharge of no duty intrusted to the latter restrains the former from the exercise of the power of equal taxation upon all private property within its territorial limits. . . . It is enough for the state that it finds within its borders property which is of a certain value. What has caused that value is immaterial. It is protected by state laws, and the rule of all property taxation is the rule of value; and by that rule property engaged in interstate commerce is controlled the same as property engaged in commerce within the state."

But counsel contend most earnestly that the act of 1893, in applying the mileage basis of valuation to appellant's lines of

Memphis & L. R. Co. v. Nolan, 14 Fed. 532, abstracted in 27 Alb. L. J. 217, and in 4 Ky. L. Rep. 840, under the title Memphis & L. R. Co. v. Nelson, is apparently alone upon the other side. But the reasoning in that case is certainly faulty, and it rests on Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. 479, 21 L. ed. 470, which was discredited in Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 311, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380.

The business which the Memphis & L. Railroad Company did in Memphis was identical with that done by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in New York, and by the Clyde Steamship Company in Charleston; and the tax was of the same nature in each case. The one decision cannot be reconciled with the other two.

Mr. Justice Brewer, in the latest decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the questions discussed in this note, states and cites cases at length to prove that the following propositions have been adjudicated so often as to be no longer open to discussion. First. The Constitution of the United States having given to Congress the power to regulate commerce, not only with foreign nations, but among the several states, that power is necessarily exclusive whenever the subjects of it are national in their character, or admit only of one uniform system or plan of regulation. Second. No state can compel a party, individual, or corporation to pay for the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce. Third. This immunity does not prevent a state from imposing ordinary property taxes upon property having a situs within its territory, and employed in interstate commerce. Fourth. The franchise of a corporation, although that franchise is the business of interstate commerce, is, as a part of its property, subject to state taxation, provided, at least, the franchise is not derived from the United States. Fifth. No corporation, even though engaged in interstate commerce, can appropriate to its own use property, public or private, without liability to charge therefor. Atlantic & P. Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817.

An interesting question that has not been discussed much, if any, arises upon the decision in Re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 540, sub nom. Wilkerson v. Rahrer, 35 L. ed. 572, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865, and the act of Congress of which it was predicated. It is as to the right of Congress to abdicate in favor of the states its constitutional power to regulate interstate, foreign, and Indian tribal commerce. Does the power conferred upon Congress in the commerce clause go beyond the power to regulate or leave free? Can Congress at once refuse to regulate, and yet declare that commerce shall not be free? Can Congress surrender to the states any power which the Federal Constitution has conferred upon it and taken away from the states? The logic of the decision just cited appears to require an affirmative answer to each of these questions. It is to be regretted that no member of the court in that case dissented from its conclusion and that the three who withheld approval from the reasoning of the chief justice omitted to give their own views. The principle of the decision will cover commerce in other things than intoxicants. Congress consenting, states may wholly interdict commerce with sister states in, say, tobacco, oleomargarine, convict-made goods, articles not stamped by labor unions, and divers other products. If the as-telegraph, compels the state board of tax commissioners to add large outside values to the values of the Indiana portions of the lines, for the reason, as claimed, that the extra state parts of appellant's property are proportionately of greater value than the parts within the state. In this counsel do not interpret the law correctly. The act, it is true, provides a method of valuation—the mileage method—as a basis for the taxation of certain property within the state of Indiana. But this is simply a means for determining the true cash value of the property within the state; and if in the case of appellant's property, or in any other case, it is shown to the board, or is discovered by them, that still further deductions should be made, on account of larger proportional values outside of the state, or for any other reason, then the board must make such deductions, so that, finally, only the property within the state of Indiana shall be assessed, and that at its true cash value.

As said already, and as appears from the title and from § 12 of the body of the act of 1893, p. 382, here in review, that statute is "supplementary to and amendatory of" the general tax law of 1891, and must therefore be construed in connection therewith. By the act of 1893, §§ 68, 69, 70 and 71 of the act of 1891, for which the act of 1893 was substituted, "and all other laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act," were expressly repealed. The express repeal of those sections left all the other sections of the act of 1891 in full force, showing that it was not the intent of the legislature to abridge or change in any respect the duties and powers of the state board as fixed by the act of 1891. Neither is the ultimate basis of taxation as there fixed changed by the act of 1893. The cardinal rule remains that it is the property within the state not expressly exempt from taxation, and that alone, which is to be assessed, and that at its true cash value. By § 3 of the act of 1891, "all property within the jurisdiction of this state, not expressly exempted, shall be subject to taxation." Authority is given to tax no other property. By §§ 33, 48, 53, 61, 74, 90, 95, 97, 102, 105, 112, 114, 129, 130, 137, and perhaps other sections, all assessing officers, from the township assessor to the state board of tax commissioners, are required and bound by their oaths of office to assess all property at its "true cash value." By § 120, p. 252, it is made the particular duty of the state board, among other things, "to see that all assessments of property in this state are made according to law." By § 129, p. 252, it is provided that "the state board of tax commissioners is hereby given all the powers given to county boards of review. They shall not be bound by any reports or estimates of value of railroad property, real estate, or other property, as returned to the county auditors or to the auditor of state, but shall asserted power exists at all it is unlimited, and it is conceivable that a coterie of congressmen may sometime be formed and be sufficiently powerful over legislation to enable particular sections or states to annihilate commerce with others in the staple products of the latter,—the cotton and rice of the south, the maple sugar of Vermont, the coal of Pennsylvania.

The New York decisions in People ex rel. William J. Matheson & Co. v. Roberts, 158 N. Y. 162, 52 N. E. 1102, and People ex rel. American Soda Fountain Co. v. Roberts, 158 N. Y. 168, 52 N. E. 1104, reversing 29 App. Div. 585, 51 N. Y. Supp. 487, deserve a passing notice in conclusion. The practical effect of these decisions runs to this: That when a corporation does two kinds of business, each exempt from a particular tax if carried on separately, it may be taxable on both by doing them in combination. The statute under which these two corporations were taxed—the domestic one upon its franchises, and the foreign one upon its business within the state—expressly exempted manufacturing companies wholly engaged in manufacturing within the state. Both these corporations were engaged in manufacturing within the state under such circumstances that neither would have been taxable if not engaged, the one in foreign, and the other in interstate, commerce. Both, too, would have been exempt if neither had carried on manufacturing in the state, since the business of one was foreign, and that of the other interstate, commerce. Either can now secure that exemption by discontinuing one branch or the other of its business, and it will not matter which. Each in carrying on its two lines has lost all exemption.

Of the latest New York decision, that rendered in People ex rel. Connecting Terminal R. Co. v. Miller, 82 N. Y. Supp. 882, it may be said that, granting the business of the relator to be "transportation," and its earnings "receipts from transportation," the conclusion doubtless follows that it was taxable under the statute in its first form upon its corporate franchise because it was a domestic corporation; but it is not at all clear that it is liable under the statute in its later form, since the measure of the tax under that law is "gross earnings from transportation or transmission business originating and terminating within this state, and not including earnings derived from business of an interstate character." It may plausibly be argued that, under this language, no basis is afforded for taxing the relator, whether its business is or is not technically interstate commerce.

The trend of the decisions is that if, in a statute or an ordinance imposing taxes upon a corporation engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, pains are taken, either by express words of disclaimer, or by language from which courts may spell out an intention to exclude from its application all governmental, foreign, and interstate transactions, and to confine its operation to internal business exclusively, its validity is assured, and the tax may be made as onerous as the will of the authority imposing it dictates. It is all so very simple that one wonders why any tax upon interstate commerce need ever be illegal.

appraise and assess all property at its true cash value, as defined by this act, according to their best knowledge and judgment, and so as to equalize the assessment of property throughout the state." And, by § 130, each member of the board is required to declare, as a part of his oath of office: "I will in no case assess any property at more or less than its true cash value." Interpreting the act of 1893 in the light of the foregoing provisions of the act of 1891, as we must, we can have no difficulty in concluding, as we do, that in the act of 1893 the legislature provided the mileage method as the basis for the assessment of telegraph and other like property, both as to lines situated partly within and partly without this state, and also as to lines running through several counties or other subdivisions of the state; but that it was not the intention of the legislature, nor is it the meaning of that act, that any property outside of the state should be assessed by importation of values or otherwise, or that any property should be assessed at more or less than its true cash value. Construing the acts of 1891 and 1893 together, it will therefore be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the state board has deducted from the total valuation of all interstate property such values, if any, of extra state property, as will leave the remaining property within and without the state, as near as may be, of equal proportional value.

The possibility of such exceptional cases in the assessment of railroad property is referred to in Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 431, 38 L. ed. 1038, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114: "As, for instance, where the terminal facilities in some large city are of enormous value, and so give to a mile or two in such city a value out of all proportion to any similar distance elsewhere along the line of the road, or where in certain localities the company is engaged in a particular kind of business, requiring for sole use in such localities an extra amount of rolling stock. If testimony to this effect was presented by the company to the state board, it must be assumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that such board, in making the assessment, . . . took into account the peculiar and large value of such facilities and such extra rolling stock." So in this case. The act of 1893 provides generally for a mode of ascertaining the true cash value of that part of interstate telegraph and other property which is within the state of Indiana, to wit, the mileage method. But, should there be particular cases where that method must be modified in order to reach the necessary result,—namely, the true cash value of such part of the property as is within the jurisdiction of the state,—the law of 1893 itself supplies the means of doing so. In § 6 of the 60 L. R. A.

act, after speaking of the reports and schedules filed with the auditor, and by him laid before the board, it is said that the board shall proceed to assess the property according to the mileage method, "after examining such statements, and after ascertaining the value of such properties therefrom, and from such other information as they may have or obtain. For that purpose they may require the agents or officers of said association, company, copartnership, or corporation to appear before them with such books, papers, or statements as they may require, or they may require additional statements to be made to them, and may compel the attendance of witnesses in case they shall deem it necessary, to ascertain the true cash value of such property."

Were it true, as counsel for appellant contend, that the act of 1893 provides an iron-clad mode of assessment by which the board is required to import and assess valuations of property outside the state, there would be no need of any further information than that given by the schedules filed in the first instance. The fact that other information is provided for, and agents of the companies and other witnesses may be called, shows that the intention was, as expressly provided in the general tax law of 1891, that the board should assess only property within the jurisdiction of the state, and that only at its true cash value.

That the valuation is upon the capital stock is no objection to the statute. The law looks through forms, and rests upon things. In speaking of the Massachusetts statute, similar to that here under consideration, it was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Western Union Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961, and approved in Atty. Gen. v. Western Union Teleg. Co. 141 U. S. 40, 35 L. ed. 628, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 889: "The tax in the present case, though nominally upon the shares of the capital stock of the company, is in effect a tax upon that organization on account of property owned and used by it in the state of Massachusetts; and the proportion of the length of its lines in that state to their entire length throughout the whole country is made the basis for ascertaining the value of that property." To the same effect is Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876,—both cases cited already.

The objection that the company paid taxes under the act of 1891 for the year ending April 1, 1893, is not well taken. The act of 1893, by its terms, imposes taxes on appellant's property only from and after the 1st day of April, 1893.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

Lucy PARKER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Michael J. NOTHOMB.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. In construing a statute, the strict letter of the law ought not to be followed when such an interpretation would lead to an unreasonable or absurd conclusion. The court will endeavor to ascertain the true intention of the legislature, and give it effect, rather than the literal sense of the terms employed.
2. At common law, a bastard child was one born neither in lawful wedlock, nor within a competent time after its termination, or under circumstances which render it impossible that the husband of its mother can be its father.
3. Under the statute entitled "Illegitimate Children," prior to its amendment in 1875, an action in bastardy could be maintained by any woman giving birth to an illegitimate child, even though begotten and born during the existence of the married state.
4. By the amendment of the statute in 1875, which was entitled "An Act for the Maintenance and Support of Illegitimate Children," an action can be maintained only by a woman who, while unmarried, has become pregnant with child, which, if born alive, would be a bastard, or has been delivered of an illegitimate child.
5. The word "unmarried," as used in the statute as amended in 1875 (Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 37, § 1, entitled "Illegitimate Children"), properly refers to the status of the mother at the time her child is begotten and born, and does not relate to her situation at the time of making the complaint therein referred to.

(February 4, 1908.)

ERROR to the District Court for Seward County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in a bastardy proceeding. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Commissioner, rendered after the first hearing, which was as follows:

Only one question is presented in this case,—the construction to be placed upon the opening clause in § 1, chap. 37, Comp. Stat., relating to illegitimate children. The provision is "that on complaint made to, any justice of the peace in this state by an unmarried woman resident therein, who shall hereafter be delivered of a bastard child, or being pregnant with a child which, if born alive, may be a bastard, accusing on oath or affirmation any person of being the father of said child, the justice shall," etc. The complaining witness made the following complaint: "On this 2d day of April, A. D. 1900, Lucy Parker, formerly Lucy West, a resident of Seward county, Nebraska, personally appeared before me, J. J. Thomas, county judge in and for Seward county and state of Nebraska, who, being by me first duly sworn, on her oath says that she is now a married woman, but at the time of the birth of the child hereinafter set forth, and at the time the same was conceived, was an unmarried woman, and resident of said county and state, and that she was on the 29th day of April, 1897, delivered of a male bastard child, and that said child is now living; and affiant further says that Michael Nothomb, name otherwise unknown, is the father of said child, and further affiant saith not." Examination was held, and defendant gave bail for his appearance in district court. There he pleaded "Not guilty." A jury was impaneled. Objection was then made to the introduction of any evidence on the ground that the complaint stated no cause of action. This was sustained, and by instruction of the court a verdict of not guilty returned. Motion for new trial was overruled, and error is brought to reverse the judgment of dismissal.

The sole question is whether "unmarried," in the statute, relates forward to the following clauses, or back to the complaint. Must it be the complaint of a woman unmarried at the time of making it, or merely the complaint of a woman unmarried when delivered of a bastard child, or pregnant with one? It is held in Johnson v. State, 55 Neb. 781, 76 N. W. 427, that the complainant at the time of the birth of the child must be an unmarried woman, and that the evidence must affirmatively show it. Her status at that time fixes that of her offspring. If she was then a married woman, her child will not be a bastard. It is held in Myers v. Baughman, 61 Neb. 820, 86 N. W. 507, that the purpose of the statute is twofold: To require the putative father to support his offspring, and to protect the county in which the child is born. Stoppert v. Nierle, 45 Neb. 105, 63 N. W. 382, and Ex parte Cottrell, 13 Neb. 193, 13 N. W. 174, are cited, and are to the same effect. That the marriage of the mother after the status of her illegitimate child is fixed should be made to relieve its father of all responsibility is clearly against the general intention and object of this statute. Her husband, by the mere fact of marriage, would not be under any obligation to support the child. Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 273; Moubry v. Moubry, 64 Ill. 383.

It is claimed that this statute is penal, and its provisions should be strictly construed. Such a holding is not in conformity with the rulings of this court. In Stoppert v. Nierle, 45 Neb. 105, 63 N. W. 382, it is held that the number of challenges allowed in the selection of the jury are those provided in civil actions, and not those in criminal proceedings. It has also been frequently held that a mere preponderance of the evidence is all that is necessary to uphold a verdict of guilty in these cases. Robb v. Hewitt, 39 Neb. 217, 58 N. W. 88. A provision for the maintenance of helpless children otherwise without claim upon anyone but the mother is certainly remedial in its nature, and, it would seem, should be construed as a remedial statute.

The industry of counsel has brought together the adjudications upon this subject. The holdings, where the question has been directly raised in courts of last resort, seem to be uniformly to the effect that the provision of the statute has relation to the status of the mother at the time of the conception and delivery of the child, and not at the time of making the complaint. In England, under a provision that a "single woman" may make a complaint, it is held that a woman living without access of the husband answers to the description. Queen v. Pilkington, 2 El. & Bl. 546; Reg. v. Col-lingwood, L. R. 12 Q. B. 681; King v. Luffe, 8 East, 193. In Illinois, under a statute identical in meaning, and almost so in form, with ours, in People ex rel. Wilmers v. Volkendorf, 112 Ill. 292, the precise case here was held to entitle the complainant to proceed; and the opposite holding of the appellate court in the same case, in 12 Ill. App. 534, was reversed. In Vermont, under a statute as follows, that when any single woman shall be delivered of any bastard child, or shall declare herself to be with child, and such child is liable to be born a bastard, and shall in either case, in writing or on oath, etc. It was held that it was competent to proceed in the name of the woman under a complaint almost identical in terms with the one that we have here, although in that case the action was carried on jointly by the complainant and the town. Sisco v. Harmon, 9 Vt. 129. The court, both in Illinois and in Vermont, holds that the provision as to the status of the complainant has reference only to the time when her child is conceived and born. In North Carolina, under a statute like that of Vermont, a woman who was unmarried at the time of the birth of two children, after marriage to another party, entered bastardy proceedings against the father; and the court held that she was entitled to carry them on,—making the same holding as in Vermont as to when the requirement that she be a single woman should be held to have application. Wilkie v. West, 5 N. C. (1 Murph.) 319. These are all the cases which counsel's industry has brought forth where courts of last resort have passed upon this point under the state of facts here presented.

In Ohio, in State ex rel. Ross v. Brill, 29 Ohio L. J. 190, the court of common pleas dismissed the complaint of a woman who was married at the time of filing it, though unmarried when her child was begotten and delivered. Such action is based on several opinions of the supreme court of that state, which are broad enough in their terms to include the case which the common pleas court had under consideration, but in each of which the status of the complainant was wholly omitted to be mentioned, or else it appeared that she was a feme covert at the time of the conception and of the birth.

It is contended that to restrict the application of the term "unmarried woman" to the time of the conception and birth of the child is judicial legislation, and violates the plain intention of the statute. It is further claimed that this is unnecessary, because of the following section, which makes provision for the county authorities bringing the action where the mother neglects to bring or to prosecute it. It certainly seems harder to find authority under that section for the county to take action where the woman has done so and been denied than it is to find authority for her proceeding after her marriage under the previous section. It could not be a neglect to bring or to prosecute an action which produced the failure, except on a much more forced construction of the statute than plaintiff asks here.

Citations are given us from other states, including Alabama, Florida, Kentucky, and Indiana, where holdings have been made that it must appear that the complainant was unmarried. But these cases, like those in Ohio, fail to indicate any conclusion as to the precise question here, namely, when she must be unmarried. They are all cases in which the woman's status does not appear at all, or else where her coverture at the time of birth or conception of the child prevented her recourse to the statute.

It is urged that the construction sought by plaintiff in error would render the amendment of 1875, inserting the word "unmarried" in place of "any," meaningless. This seems not to be the result. The intention of that change apparently was to do away with any attempt to establish bastardy by reason of nonaccess of the husband in the case of a child born to a married woman. It seems also to have been intended, as is held in Johnson v. State, 55 Neb. 781, 78 N. W. 427, to do away with any attempt on the part of married persons to avoid responsibility for the support of offspring. Both of these objects are as completely reached by holding that the term "unmarried" has application only to the time of the conception and birth of the child, as by including also the time of making the complaint. As is before suggested, the husband would by the marriage incur no liability for another man's child previously born. The sole reason for holding that this required status of the mother has relation to the time of filing the complaint seems to be the collocation of the word in the statute, and the grammatical effect of such collocation. This, of course, must not be arbitrarily disregarded in construing a statute. It, however, should not control where the intention of the legislature requires it to be disregarded. Schuyler v. Hanna, 31 Neb. 307, 11 L. R. A. 321, 47 N. W. 932. The recent case of McGavock v. Omaha Nat. Bank (Neb.) 90 N. W. 230, makes a similar holding in regard to the words of a contract. In that case the contract had reference to an extension of time on a note, which the circumstances indicated was only to be until a certain case was decided in this court. The agreement provided that it should only be good "until said case should be decided in the supreme court, or for not to exceed two years from this date." This court held that the intention should be gathered from the whole circumstances, and that the final clause did not grant an alternative for, but provided a limitation upon, the preceding one. The argument would seem at least as strong that the intention of the legislature was to establish a provision for bastard children; that the amendment of 1875, introducing the word "unmarried" into this section, meant only to shut out the inquiry as to nonaccess of the husband, and the question of liability for the child by one marrying a pregnant woman. To do this it is only needed that the requirement as to the status of the mother be held to apply to the time of the child's conception and birth. It has been so applied in Johnson v. State, 55 Neb. 781, 76 N. W. 427. To hold that it applies also to the time of filing the complaint would be to defeat the main purposes of the act, as to one class of children, by a provision as to means. It would be to leave the bastard whose mother should marry before the institution of proceedings remediless. "It is, as will be seen presently, construction alone which saves us, in many instances, from sacrificing the spirit of a text or the object to the letter of the text, or to the means by which that object was to be obtained. And without construction, written laws—in fact, any laws or other texts containing rules of actions, specific or general—would in many cases become fearfully destructive to the best and wisest intentions; nay, frequently, produce the very opposite of what it was purposed to effect." Lieber, Hermeneutics, 45.

It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

Messrs. Abbott & Abbott, T. B. Parker, and D. C. McKillip, for plaintiff in error:

The statute means "unmarried" at the conception and delivery of the child, and does not relate to the time of making the complaint.

Messrs. Norval Brothers and M. D. Carey for defendant in error.

Holcomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause is submitted on a rehearing heretofore allowed. The controversy is with respect to the proper construction of § 1, chap. 37, Comp. Stat. 1901, entitled "Illegitimate Children." The direct question presented is whether, under the statute referred to, an unmarried woman who has given birth to an illegitimate child, and subsequent thereto marries, may, after such marriage, 60 L. R. A.

maintain an action against the putative father for the support of her illegitimate offspring. At the former hearing the word "unmarried," in the section referred to, it was held, does not properly refer to the mother's status at the time of making the complaint in bastardy, but only to such status at such time as will affect the question of the legitimacy of the child, or the liability of the husband to support it. The former opinion treats of the propositions involved at some length, and is referred to, in connection with what is here said, for a more comprehensive understanding of the views we entertain regarding the matter. Reiteration will serve no useful purpose, and we shall attempt to avoid it. A brief in support of the application for a rehearing so ably and persuasively argued the question in favor of a contrary construction as to induce the court to grant the motion, for the purpose of more fully investigating and considering the subject, and to arrive, if possible, at a right decision of the controversy.

The statute reads: "That on complaint made to any justice of the peace in this state by any unmarried woman resident therein, who shall hereafter be delivered of a bastard child, or, being pregnant with a child which, if born alive, may be a bastard, accusing on oath or affirmation any person of being the father of said child, the justice shall take such accusation in writing," etc. Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 37, § 1. It is earnestly insisted by defendant's counsel that, because of the language just quoted, the mother of a bastard child, who, subsequent to its birth, and before instituting the proceedings therein contemplated, marries, cannot thereafter bring or maintain an action under the statute. It is argued that the construction given the statute in the prior opinion is contrary to the clear import of the language therein used, and against the weight of adjudged cases bearing on the question. Chief reliance for the construction contended for by the defendant is placed on the wording of that part of the section we have quoted, and it is urged that the intention of the legislature is made so apparent therefrom that there is left no room for any other construction as to the meaning of the language than that the mother of the illegitimate child must be an unmarried woman when she makes the complaint in bastardy, and that an allegation that she is at the time of filing the complaint an unmarried woman is essential and necessary to be made and proved in order to give her and her illegitimate child the benefit and advantage afforded by the statute. It should, perhaps, here be said that on a first reading of the statute no other view seems admissible. Nevertheless maturer reflection and full consideration of the entire act, bearing in mind the object and purpose which the legislature had in view in adopting the statute, as gleaned from the title as well as the act itself, produces in our minds a well-settled conviction that such construction would, in a measure, defeat the intention of the law-making body which passed the measure. In a very recent decision we have said. "It is a well-settled rule in the interpretation of statutes that the reason and intention of the lawgiver will control the strict letter of the law when the latter would lead to palpable injustice or absurdity." Kelley v. Gage County (Neb.) 93 N. W. 194. In the interpretation of statutes, courts ascertain the intention of the legislature, and give effect to it, rather than to the literal sense of the terms employed. State ex rel. Marquett v. Baushausen, 49 Neb. 558, 68 N. W. 950. The law is manifestly one created by a statute remedial in character, and to which resort must be had in the first instance in order to determine the legislative intent, and the objects and purposes sought to be accomplished by its enactment. In determining the character and proper construction to be given a law of the kind under consideration, we should, perhaps, first consider the action taken by the lawmaking body, the changes, if any, which have been made, the reasons for such changes, and the evils sought to be remedied thereby, and thus more certainly ascertain the legislative intent and purpose. The first act on the subject was passed and approved in 1869, and was entitled "An Act to Provide for the Support of Illegitimate Children." In that act it was provided that on complaint made by "any woman," etc., proceedings should be had for the purpose of compelling the father to support his illegitimate offspring. By the wording of the statute as then enacted, the question of the status of the woman making the complaint, with reference to her being married or unmarried at the time of the birth of the child, was not made the test as to her right to maintain an action against the putative father for its support. Under such statute the questions to be determined were whether the woman, be she married or unmarried, had been delivered of a bastard child, or was pregnant with a child which, if born alive, would be a bastard. The illegitimacy of the child was the sole test of the mother's right to prosecute the action. "At common law," it is said, "a bastard is one who is born neither in lawful wedlock, nor within a competent time after its termination, or under circumstances which render it impossible that the husband of his mother can be his father." 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. 625; Com. v. Shepherd, 6 Binn. 283, 6 Am. Dec. 449; Smith v. Perry, 80 Va. 563. See also Wilson v. Babb, 18 S. C. 59. Thus, by the old statute a married woman, although such at the time a bastard child was begotten and born, could maintain an action in bastardy for the support of such child. It is said (and, we are convinced, with much merit) that a law of this character was subject to much abuse, and permitted the prosecution of an action by a woman who while in lawful wedlock gave birth to an alleged illegitimate child, and resorted to the statute solely for the purpose of gain, in an attempt to bastardize a child begotten and born in lawful wedlock, and thus stigmatize as a bastard one whose coming into the world was sanctioned by every law governing the marital relations. To avoid this possible condition of things, we apprehend, was the sole aim and object of the legislature in amending the law as it did in 1875 by inserting the word "unmarried" after the word "any," so that the section should read that on complaint made by "any unmarried woman," instead of "any woman," as originally existing. It cannot, we think, be successfully controverted that this was the prime aim and purpose of the amendment of the statute which in all other respects was left substantially unchanged. What we conceive to be the intention of the legislature by making the amendment was to deny to the married woman giving birth to a child, even though in truth and fact not begotten of her husband, the right to maintain an action against some third party for its support, who is alleged to be its father. The amended act is entitled "An Act for the Maintenance and Support of Illegitimate Children." The title is, we assume, an unerring index, disclosing the object and purpose of the act. These were to provide for the support and maintenance by the putative father of his illegitimate child, begotten and born out of lawful wedlock. It is hard to conceive of any good reason, and we know of none, for saying that an illegitimate child should be denied the protection afforded by the statute because the mother, subsequent to its birth, enters into a contract of marriage with one other than its father. The law does not discourage marriages, and certainly the legislature did not intend to throw any impediment in the way of the unfortunate mother who had given birth to an illegitimate child to enter into a marriage alliance. It cannot be doubted, as was held to in the former opinion, that the husband of a woman contracting such marriage would sustain the legal relation only of stepfather to the illegitimate child, and would be under no legal obligation for its nurture, support, and maintenance. The child, notwithstanding such marriage, is in the same attitude with respect to the law, and in the same need of its beneficent provisions, as before the marriage. It is as much an object of legislative solicitude as other innocent unfortunates of its kind whose mothers have contracted no such alliances. There is in fact no substantial reason, nor can any be advanced, why the legislature intended to deny to the illegitimate child, whose mother after its birth has married, the protection of the statute, and yet extend such protection to those in exactly the same condition whose mothers have not married. The rule is unvarying, so far as we have examined, to the effect that if the mother of an illegitimate child shall marry one other than the father, after the commencement of bastardy proceedings, such marriage will not have the effect of abating the action, or relieving the putative father of the legal obligations imposed upon him by the statute. Austin v. Pickett, 9 Ala. 102; Roth v. Jacobs, 21 Ohio St. 646; State v. Ingram, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 221. See also Swett v.

Stubbs, 34 Me. 178. If a marriage of the mother after the action is instituted, and before judgment, will not operate to discontinue the action, upon what substantial grounds can it be argued that a marriage before the action is instituted will be a bar to the proceedings? By what course of reasoning can it be said that a distinction exists, affecting rights under the statute, between the woman who institutes an action, and then immediately marries, and one who marries, and immediately begins such action? As regards the illegitimate children, their legal status is exactly the same, and, if one is to be denied the benefit of the law because its mother has married before instituting an action, then the legislature has not extended to it the equal protection of the law. We cannot believe that this situation was in contemplation by the legislature when it amended the act by inserting the word "unmarried" between the words "any" and "woman." An examination of the entire act as originally passed, and its subsequent amendment, the title to the act, and the language used in expressing the will of the legislature, constrains us to the view, as expressed in the original opinion, that the word "unmarried," as used in the statute, refers solely to the status of the complainant at the time the illegitimate child is begotten and born, and does not have reference to her situation when proceedings are begun against the father to compel him to contribute to the child's support. What the statute does say, we think, is that when any unmarried woman who has been delivered of a bastard child shall afterwards, and regardless of her status at the time, make complaint in writing as is required by statute, then the proceedings shall be had to charge the father with the support of his child, such as is contemplated by the statute. The word "unmarried" can only mean, if we give the language used an interpretation based on reason and in consonance with the manifest intention of the legislature, the status of the mother at the time of the begetting and birth of the illegitimate child. And this is the construction given in the case of Johnson v. State, 55 Neb. 781, 76 N. W. 427. But it is said such a construction conflicts with the prior decision of this court in the case of Olson v. Peterson, 33 Neb. 358, 50 N. W. 155. While the language used in that case appears on the face of the opinion to be inconsistent with the views herein expressed, yet, when considered in connection with the vital issues presented, the apparent conflict is dissipated. In that case it appears, from an examination of the record and the statements of counsel in their briefs, that the proceedings were first begun during the pregnancy of the mother, and that after the birth of the child, because of some irregularity, a new complaint was filed, and yet the action was substantially a continuation of those proceedings begun before its birth. This, we think, accounts for some of the language used in briefs of counsel and in the opinion, to the effect that it is essential that the complainant be an unmarried woman when the action is begun. At the trial the defendant sought to show that for about two months during the time of gestation the complainant and a third party lived together as man and wife, and that they had in fact contracted a valid common-law marriage. On cross-examination questions were asked of the complainant by which this alleged marriage was sought to be established, the answers to which were excluded by the trial court; and because of such exclusion the judgment rendered was, on error to this court, reversed. What was sought to be established as a defense in that case, and regarding which, only, the cause was reversed, was the alleged common-law marriage of the complainant prior to the birth of the child, and not subsequent thereto, and prior to the commencement of the proceedings, as some of the language in the opinion would seem to indicate. Under the issues as presented, all the court was called upon to decide, and which was in fact decided, in that case, was that a marriage prior to the birth of a child, even though illegitimately begotten, would bar a prosecution by the mother against the putative father for the child's support. Such a construction of the statute is, we think, sound, and in accordance with Johnson v. State, 55 Neb. 781, 76 N. W. 427.

We are committed to the doctrine that the status of the mother must be that of an unmarried person at the time the illegitimate child is begotten and born, and we are now asked to go a step further, and unequivocally decide that she must also be unmarried when the complaint is filed and the prosecution begun. The decisions of the supreme courts of other states are appealed to in support of the construction contended for, which will now be briefly considered. In many of the authorities to which our attention has been called, as well as some found by an original investigation on our part, some things are said and language used which give countenance and support to the contention of counsel for defendant. A thorough consideration, however, of these numerous cases, discloses that in no instance was the question now being considered directly involved in the decision of a court of last resort. Much that is said, and in many instances loosely spoken, when considered in connection with the facts and surrounding circumstances of the particular case, and the real controverted points therein decided, are altogether reconcilable with the views expressed in our former opinion, and which we yet entertain regarding the matter. A discussion of several of these cases will elaborate somewhat our views as already expressed.

As was noted in the former opinion, one of the inferior courts of Ohio has held that a prosecution under the bastardy act could be maintained only by a woman who was unmarried at the time of making the complaint, and we need not here further advert to such holding. State ex rel. Ross v. Brill, 29 Ohio L. J. 190. The decision, however, it is manifest, was the result of a supposed following of the case of Devinney v. State, Wright (Ohio) 564. In that case the complainant failed to allege in the complaint that she was unmarried either at the time of coition and birth of the child or at the time of filing the complaint. The law of Ohio authorized proceedings in bastardy by an unmarried woman who shall be pregnant with, or has been delivered of, an illegitimate child. It is said in the opinion, "As none but an unmarried woman resident in the state can commence and carry on this prosecution, the fact of the prosecutor being unmarried should be set forth, to show the jurisdiction or authority of the court to proceed, and we hold the omission fatal." Whether the court had in mind the situation of the complainant at the time of the birth of the illegitimate child, or when the complaint is filed, we are not advised from anything that appears in the opinion. It is apparent, however, from the later decisions, that it must appear from the complaint that the mother was unmarried at the time of the birth of the child, and it has not yet been directly decided by the court of last resort of that state that the marriage of the mother after the birth of an illegitimate child would debar her from prosecuting an action for its support by its natural father. In this connection, counsel for defendant say that it has been the universal practice in this state to allege in the complaint that the prosecutrix is unmarried when she makes the same, and to insert no averment with reference to her status at the time of coition and birth of the child; that this is a practical construction of the statute, which should have its due weight in the determination of the question. A sufficient answer to this is, we think, that, without exception, until the present case arose, the mother was unmarried when the prosecution was begun, and the general allegation in a complaint that the complainant was an unmarried woman includes the essential averment as to her status at the time her illegitimate child was begotten and born. As heretofore noted in the case of Johnson v. State, 55 Neb. 781, 76 N. W. 427, it is held that it is necessary to aver and prove her status at the time of coition and birth of the child, and this ordinarily is accomplished by the general averment that she is an unmarried woman.

In Haworth v. Gill, 30 Ohio St. 627, relied on by counsel for defendant, it is decided that, under the bastardy act of that state, proceedings cannot be maintained on complaint of the mother when the child in question is begotten and born during lawful wedlock. It is said in the opinion, in discussing the question at issue, that the law "was intended to provide for the support and maintenance of an unfortunate class of children, whose condition of illegitimacy would be apparent and unquestionable, by reason of their being begotten and born out of wedlock. The statute authorizes the complaint to be made either during pregnancy or after delivery. If made during pregnancy, it is certain that the pregnancy alleged must be that of an unmarried woman, and, if not made till after delivery, it is equally certain that the complainant must still continue to be unmarried." Whether we are to understand from the language last quoted that it refers to the status of the mother up to the time of the birth of the child, or to the time of making the complaint, is not entirely clear. The words, as used, may very properly refer to the fact that her status during her time of pregnancy, and until the birth of the child, must be that of an unmarried woman. It does not necessarily follow from what is said that the court is committed to the doctrine that if the mother of an illegitimate child, who is unmarried when it is begotten and born, marry after its birth, she cannot thereafter maintain a bastardy action for the child's support. In that case the child's mother was a married woman at the time of coition and for eight months after the child's birth, and it was with reference to this condition of affairs that the court was discussing the matter. In a late case from Ohio (Miller v. Anderson, 43 Ohio St. 473, 54 Am. Rep. 823, 3 N. E. 605) the court holds that the natural father of a child could not be held for its support, under the law of that state, if the mother, after the child was begotten, and during pregnancy, contracts a marriage with another man, who marries her with full knowledge of her condition; that by such marriage the man so marrying consents to stand in loco parentis to such child; and that this presumption is conclusive. The rule thus announced is in harmony with the principle controlling the decision in Johnson v. State, 55 Neb. 781, 76 N. W. 427.

In Kansas the court of appeals (Blush v. State, 4 Kan. App. 145, 46 Pac. 185) has directly decided that a prosecution for the maintenance and support of an illegitimate child can only be maintained when the complainant at the time of the commencement of the action is an unmarried woman. The decision follows Willetts v. Jeffries, 5 Kan. 470. In the latter case the supreme court construes the statute of that state, which is similar in terms to ours, to mean that a woman must be unmarried at the time of commencing an action in bastardy, and that the word "unmarried" does not refer to her status at the time of the begetting and birth of the child. It is there held that a married woman who has given birth to an illegitimate child may maintain an action in bastardy, provided she is divorced or unmarried when the complaint is filed. This holding is in direct conflict with the principle announced in Johnson v. State, 55 Neb. 781, 76 N. W. 427, and should not, in our judgment, be followed or accepted as authority in the case at bar. Regarding the two different constructions, we are of the opinion that ours is the more reasonable, and more nearly in accord with the true intention of the legislature.

In the states of Florida (Andrew G. v. Catherine A., 16 Fla. 830; William H. T. v. State, 18 Fla. 883; C. T. v. State, 21 Fla. 171; Thomas v. State, 37 Fla. 378, 20 So.

529), Alabama (Pruitt v. County Court Judge, 16 Ala. 705; Limestone County Court Judge v. Kerr, 17 Ala. 328), and Kentucky (Sword v. Nestor, 3 Dana, 453), the cases go no further than to hold that the several statutes of those states apply to single or unmarried women who have been delivered of bastard children, and who alone can maintain an action under the statute. Stating the corollary of the proposition, the rule seems to be that married women who have, during coverture, given birth to illegitimate children do not come within the purview of the statutes, and cannot maintain an action thereunder. While in the several opinions it is said, in general terms, that single or unmarried women only can maintain the action, it is quite apparent from a reading of the several decisions that the language used by the court was with reference to the status of the complainant during pregnancy and at the time of giving birth to the illegitimate child, and not to her situation at the time proceedings under the several bastardy acts were instituted. In none of these cases is it fairly decided, nor do we think it is properly inferable from the opinions themselves, that a single or unmarried woman who has been delivered of an illegitimate child cannot maintain an action under the statute if she marries after the child is born and before the proceedings are begun.

In support of the view we have adopted as to the proper interpretation of the statute, it is stated in the text in 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. 650, that the fact that the mother is a married woman will not preclude her from instituting proceedings under the bastardy act. The keynote of the controversy is, we think, fairly stated by the supreme court of Vermont (Gaffery v. Austin, 8 Vt. 70), where it is held that a married woman cannot sustain a prosecution under the statutes relating to bastardy for the purpose of compelling the father of the child begotten and born during the coverture to contribute to its support. Such a case, says the court, is one not provided for by the statute. In the opinion it is said: "No doubt, such offspring is illegitimate and bastard. It is well settled at common law that the issue may be bastardized, although born during coverture, by showing want of access, immaturity or imbecility of the husband, or any other cause which renders it impossible he should have been the father of the child; but want of access cannot be proved by the wife." Citing King v. Kea, 11 East, 132; Rex v. Reading, cited in 4 Petersdorff Abr. 180; Goodright ex dem. Thompson v. Saul, 4 T. R. 356; King v. Luffe, 8 East. 199; Lomax v. Holmden, 2 Strange, 940. The meaning of the statute is then discussed, and it is held that it applies only to single women who have been delivered of bastard children. Shortly after the decision in the case last cited, the same question presented in the case at bar came on for consideration, and the court decided (Sisco v. Harmon, 9 Vt. 129) that a prosecution under the statute could be sustained against the putative father, though the mother after the birth of the child was married, and was at the time of the prosecution a feme covert. In North Carolina (Wilkie v. West, 5 N. C. [1 Murph.] 319—a very early adjudged case on the subject), under a statute speaking of single women only, it is held that a married woman could maintain an action against the father of her illegitimate child, begotten previous to her marriage. People ex rel. Wilmers v. Volksdorf, 112 Ill. 292 (a case decided by the supreme court of Illinois in 1884, cited in the former opinion), holds uncompromisingly to the rule that under the bastardy act of that state, similar in its general terms to ours, complaint during pregnancy, and before the delivery of the child, can only be made by an unmarried woman; but after delivery, while she is single, the subsequent marriage of the mother will not prevent her from making complaint against the reputed father of the child. Says the court, "The true construction of the statute is that the mother shall be unmarried at the time the child is born; and the word 'unmarried,' in the law, does not properly relate to the time of making the complaint." This construction appears to us as being grounded upon sound reasoning, and results in giving to the statute an interpretation in consonance with what we conceive to be the legislative will. Any other construction, it appears to us, will lead to an absurdity, and create a distinction as to the protection afforded by the statute to illegitimate children which is without a substantial foundation in reason for its support, and is unwarranted from any consideration, save alone the mere collocation of the words used in the statute. We must ignore altogether the spirit of the law, and the humane aims and objects sought to be attained by its enactment, if we adopt the construction contended for by defendant. It is urged that the construction contended for is admissible because of the provisions found in the statute authorizing county authorities to prosecute an action in the event the mother refuses to do so. But this to us appears to necessitate a very strained construction of the provision of the statute referred to. It hardly seems permissible to say that the marriage of the mother before the action is begun must be regarded as a refusal on her part to institute proceedings to compel the putative father to discharge a moral obligation resting upon him, and a legal one imposed by the statute. In this case the mother not only does not refuse to prosecute the action, but is and has been persistently knocking at the door of the court for leave to proceed with her suit. The authorities can only prosecute an action when the mother refuses.

Upon full consideration of the subject in all the different phases in which it is presented, and with all the research we have been able to give to the questions involved, we are of the opinion the conclusion reached at the former hearing is the correct one, and should be held to as the law in this jurisdiction.

The judgment of reversal is accordingly adhered to.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

James A. CAHILL et al., Appts.,
v.

Mary CAHILL et al.

(75 Conn. 522.)

1. Possessory rights only will not sustain an action of ejectment without showing the legal title.
2. Title to real estate which will sustain an action of ejectment cannot be created or established by the presumptions flowing from peaceable possession of it for a period of years short of the time prescribed by the statute governing title by adverse possession.
3. Direct proof of the existence of a deed may be aided by the presumption to be derived from possession and repeated acts of ownership in establishing the title to real estate.
4. That a man refrained from all manner of acts appropriate to ownership is admissible in evidence in a suit to recover, in the right of his wife, real estate occupied by them jointly, as tending to show who was in possession.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in defendants' favor in a suit to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Munger & Munger, for appellants:

For over sixteen years Richard Cahill never claimed any interest in the property. He had permitted his wife to use it, control it in all respects as her own, without any interference or suggestion from him, and such acts were conclusive evidence that he had, in fact, disclaimed any rights which he might have as trustee for his wife.

Julia Cahill exercised certain rights upon the property. Her declarations, which characterize those acts, are admissible in evidence.

The plaintiffs entirely failed to produce such proof. They claimed that there was a deed to the plaintiff, but that it had been lost. They did not claim that such deed was from any person in particular, or that it came from a person in possession of the land; nor did they prove its execution, or its contents. They did not prove that Julia was named in it as grantee.

Prentice, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Richard and Julia Cahill were husband and wife,—married prior to 1877. The plaintiffs are their children, and claim in the latter's right and as her heirs at law. Julia died in 1885. In 1887 Richard married for his second wife the defendant Mary Cahill. Richard died in 1901, leaving surviving him his last-named wife, and leaving also, a will, which was duly probated. The defendant McMahon is the administrator of his estate, cum testamento annexo. The will gave his widow, Mary, the life use of his estate, and the defendant McMahon the remainder in trust for certain persons and purposes. The defendants thus claim through Richard, under the will. The record title to the property in question was never in either Richard or Julia, but stood in other persons; the last conveyance being to Wallace & Sons, a corporation, which received it in 1873. No deed to either of said couple was shown in evidence, nor was proof of a copy or contents of any such deed produced. The conduct of the case assumed—although the fact is not expressly found in that form—that in some manner, between them, they were in possession of the land and exercised dominion over it during the last twelve years, at least, of their married life. The plaintiffs claimed that the wife was so possessed in her own right, independently and apart from her husband; the defendants, that the husband was. The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to recover possession in this action (1) upon a title shown in their mother, and therefore in themselves; and, failing in that, (2) upon their possessory rights in succession to their mother dying possessed.

With respect to the last claim, the court very properly ruled, in accordance with the defendants' contention, that the plaintiffs could not recover without first showing a legal title. The court adopted as its ruling the language of Judge Swift in his Digest, 60 L. R. A.

vol. 1, p. 507, to the effect that the plaintiffs must recover, if at all, by the strength of their own title, and not by the weakness of the defendants', and that it behooved them, not merely to show a better title than the defendants', but a legal title. The plaintiffs concede the correctness, in general, of this principle invoked by the court, but ingeniously contend that it is not a complete statement of the law. Their argument is based upon the existence in the old English common law of certain possessory real actions, and especially the writ of assize, under which an heir or devisee whose ancestor or deviser had died seised of an inheritance was put into possession thereof as against a stranger who had intervened before the heir or deviser had entered, and himself made entry and obtained possession of the freehold. 3 Bl. Com. 184. It is completed by the dictum from Swift's Digest to the effect that our action of ejectment comprehends and answers the purpose of all the old common-law real actions, and the further dictum that, like writs of entry and assize, it will lie for possessory rights. 1 Swift, Dig. 507. The trouble with this argument is that these dicta from Judge Swift do not comport well with his later statements upon the subject of which the passage already referred to is an example, and are in direct antagonism to the repeated utterances of this court. Talcott v. Goodwin, 3 Day, 264; Tracy v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 39 Conn. 382; Bristol Mfg. Co. v. Barnes, 54 Conn. 53, 5 Atl. 593. In the second of the cases cited we said: "We, however, ought to say that we regard it as elementary law in Connecticut that in this action of disseisin or ejectment the plaintiff must recover, if he recover at all, by the strength of his own title. Ample remedies are provided, by actions of trespass and by proceedings for forcible entry and detainer, for the disturbance of quiet possession, and we see no good reason for any change or mitigation of the familiar rule in respect to proof of title in ejectment." The court did not err in ruling as it did.

The plaintiffs claimed to have satisfied the rule adopted by the court, and to have shown a legal title. They sought to prove by direct evidence the existence of a deed which had become lost. The court found that they did not succeed in this regard. For this finding, assuming that the issue was to be determined upon direct proof alone, the evidence furnished ample justification. At the eleventh hour, but in time, perhaps, they claimed to have established a title by adverse possession. The court found otherwise, as it was clearly bound to do upon the evidence. The plaintiffs, evidently foreseeing these results, did not stop here in their claims. They made, first, the broad claim that having shown possession in their mother at her death, and for a period of years prior thereto, the court should, in the absence of countervailing testimony, have presumed and found that she had title. This general claim, which has been urged upon us the most vigorously of all the plaintiffs' many claims, was made in the court below and here in several forms, to wit, that Mrs. Cahill's possession was sufficient evidence of title; that therefrom a lawful grant should be presumed; that her possession and repeated acts of ownership were to be presumed to be lawful, and pursuant to a legal title; that such possession would create a presumption that she was the legal owner; that not only the existence of a deed, but all the essentials of a valid one, would be presumed; that this evidence established a prima facie title, which was good and sufficient until overthrown, etc. This claim, in whatever form propounded, was not well made. The subject of presumptions of a grant from possession had an exhaustive discussion in Sumner v. Child, 2 Conn. 607. It was there decided that a grant of a corporeal hereditament would never be presumed from possession, however long continued; the whole subject, so far as corporeal hereditaments were concerned, being regulated by the statute limiting the right of entry. The court was far from saying, as we shall have occasion to see later, that a presumption arising from possession and acts of ownership could never be of help in establishing a title. What it did say was that such a presumption could not of itself have the operative effect of creating or establishing a title; that a title could not be presumed therefrom which would have the force and effect of a title proven. So it is that a bare presumption of a title thus made cannot satisfy the requirements of a rule which prescribes that a plaintiff in ejectment must recover by the strength of his own legal title shown, and not by the weakness of his adversary's. Were it otherwise, we should have a rule which was no rule. For what would it profit to say that an ejectment plaintiff may not recover upon proof of a bare possessory right, but must show a legal title, if in the same breath we say that a legal title may be inferred from mere possession? The true office of a presumption from possession and acts of ownership, and its use in proof of title, is clearly indicated in this case of Sumner v. Child, 2 Conn. 607. The possession and acts of ownership may, with other circumstances, be proven to perfect the evidence of title. The possession and acts are admitted as secondary corroborative evidence of an actual conveyance, or of some accompanying requisite, of which the original and best evidence is lost. The admission of this evidence assumes the theory of an actual conveyance, as well as the existence of other evidence of a different character, rendering it probable that such a conveyance was made. It is received as one piece of evidence, which, with other testimony, tends to prove that a conveyance in fact was made, and to enable the trier to find, from the whole evidence, such conveyance in fact. The evidence in question is not received for the simple purpose of creating a presumption which should of itself have operative effect. The presumption to be derived from the evidence is one for evidential effect; that is, it is to be weighed and considered in connection with other testimony, and the presumptions and inferences therefrom, in its bearing upon the ultimate question of fact to be determined, to wit, the question of a conveyance in fact. This distinction which the case makes is an important one, and important in its bearing upon the case at bar. The plaintiffs, as we have seen, endeavored to establish by direct proof the existence of a deed to Mrs. Cahill. In their claims to the court, they not only asked that this fact be found upon such proof, but also that the presumption to be derived from her possession and repeated acts of ownership be weighed in connection with the other facts established, and, upon the strength of the conjoined proof, the fact of her ownership, and that such ownership rested upon a valid deed to her, be found. The request thus made in most explicit terms was fairly within the rule laid down in Sumner v. Child, 2 Conn. 607, and so far, therefore, their contention was well made.

The court, however, found as a fact that from August, 1873, until the death of Julia, Richard was in possession of the land, and, of course, by inference, that Julia was not. This finding of fact, if it stands, accomplishes a complete demolition of the plaintiffs' contention. If Julia was not in possession, no presumption from possession could arise in her favor. The finding must stand, unless it was made without evidence, as it clearly was not, or some error of law or some incorrect ruling upon the admission or rejection of testimony may have influenced it. It is urged upon us that the finding was the result of a legal misconception as to the relation of a husband, married before 1877, to the reality of his wife. A portion of the record is pointed out as indicating a probability, at least, that the finding was made upon the theory of law that possession of a wife's lands necessarily inured to the husband. This claim the finding effectually negatives.

There remains to be considered a ruling upon the admission of testimony to which the plaintiffs attach much importance in this connection. Plaintiffs' counsel sought to prove that Richard had never done anything upon or about the land in dispute; in other words, that he had never exercised acts of ownership. Evidence to this effect was excluded. We see no escape from the conclusion that here was harmful error. The plaintiffs sought to prove that Mrs. Cahill was possessed of the property of and for herself, and altogether apart from her husband, and that her husband, by refraining from all manner of acts appropriate to ownership—whether in his own right or in the right of his wife—indicated the true relation to the property of the parties, between whom, it is to be borne in mind, the question was. Such a situation as claimed might exist, and the plaintiffs, if they could prove it, were entitled to the benefit of it, to enforce and emphasize their contention as to the presumptive existence of the deed sought to be established. Whatever situation the acts of the parties tended to disclose, the plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of it upon the question of possession, which the court directly determined, and thus indirectly upon the question of title. The plaintiffs sought to show that Mrs. Cahill had always dealt with the land as peculiarly her own property, and that her husband had never acted as one having any rights therein. The evidence excluded was clearly not immaterial, as ruled. The court has found in favor of the possession of the husband. As a part of the evidence bearing upon the question was ruled out, the court erred, and to the plaintiff's manifest injury.

We are further impressed, in a study of the finding, with the conviction that the court misconceived the real nature of the particular claim we have been discussing. That is, perhaps, not altogether strange, since so many claims in so many forms were made, and the true basis of claim perhaps little emphasized. The court seems to have confused the claim arising from possession and acts of ownership with the principles of adverse possession. It is quite evident that the fact of possession was regarded as important only in connection with a fifteen-years' continuance and an adverse character. The plaintiffs' claim had no relation to a conclusive presumption such as fifteen-years' adverse possession creates. It related to a rebuttable presumption, only, and one which was of an evidential character, merely. Sumner v. Child, 2 Conn. 607. It seems quite clear that in this way, also, the plaintiffs did not obtain the full benefit of their rightful claims of law.

There is error, and a new trial is granted.

The other Judges concur, except Hamersley, J., who dissents.

Hamersley, J., dissenting (Filed April 17, 1903):

The plaintiffs were bound to prove that Julia Cahill owned and possessed the locus at the time of her death. This was essential to establish that legal title in the plaintiffs, without which they cannot recover. Property may be acquired through any kind of lawful conveyance from its owner. This is the principal, and for the great mass of property the only, mode under our law of acquiring ownership. The fact of conveyance may be established by any appropriate evidence, and involves proof of the person who made the transfer, his ownership of the property, and the validity of the transfer as made. Where the conveyance is by writing, and especially where the law requires it to be by writing, it must be proved by the production of the original writing. When the writing has been lost, its existence and contents may be proved by relevant, secondary evidence. As ownership draws after it possession, and possession, especially of personal property, is often a badge of ownership, possession may become a relevant fact in proving the existence and contents of such writing. It may be that all evidence of a conveyance, primary or secondary, is wanting, and the possessor holds property without a conveyance from anyone. For some cases of this kind the law provides other modes of acquiring property, vis., possession and user which is not by virtue of another's right from time immemorial, or such possession for a fixed period unbroken and unchallenged. The latter mode of acquisition is confined mainly to land; the former mainly to intangible rights in property, generally described as easements. Property in these rights may be acquired by prescription as well as by grant. The property is deemed to originate in a grant. By its very nature it is created as property through the assent, voluntary or compelled, of the owner of the tangible thing it burdens. Ownership of the easement is acquired through a valid grant, whether recent or ancient; but such ownership may be acquired through possession from time immemorial as truly and as fully as by a valid grant. This mode of acquisition may rest in part on the effect of occupancy, which, as to movables, is the foundation of separate property rights; but some support is to be found in the elementary principle of jurisprudence which forbids the litigation of claims unsupported by facts within the memory of man. The length of this period has fluctuated, but is now for the most part an arbitrary term. Acquisitive prescription is illustrated when one prescribes in a que estate, but for the most part it is not used in the English law in its direct form. Its substance is secured through a legal fiction. Instead of asserting an ownership acquired by immemorial usage or possession, the owner is permitted to assert an ownership acquired by some indefinite and nonexistent grant, and the facts which establish his acquirement of ownership by possession are treated as conclusive proof of some grant which is not proved, and in most cases cannot be proved, because it never existed. Such a legal fiction does not alter the substance of things. In every such case the ownership is in reality acquired through possession, and is not acquired through a grant. Possession as a mode of acquiring property establishes ownership, when as an evidential fact it is wholly incompetent to prove an ownership acquired by grant. It happens in some cases that evidence is introduced tending to prove the existence of an actual particular grant as well as evidence tending to support the acquisition of ownership through possession. Such possibility has naturally led to some confusion between the force of possession as a mode of acquiring ownership and the evidential value of possession merely as a fact which may or may not become relevant or material in proving an actual and particular grant. The distinction, however, is real and important. A sues B for trespass in crossing his land. B attempts to establish two defenses — one, ownership of a right of way, acquired through user from time immemorial (now provable by adverse possession for fifteen years, or its equivalent, an indefinite and fictitious grant conclusively presumed from a possession from time immemorial); and the other, ownership of a right of way acquired through a grant from A to B, made ten years before the bringing of suit. User or possession of a right of way for fourteen years is proved. Some evidence is produced tending to prove a grant of the way claimed, etc., made by A to B ten years before, and the loss of the deed. The court charges the jury, as bearing on the first defense, that, if B has proved the requisite possession of a right of way for fifteen years, his ownership is established, but, if he has proved such possession for fourteen years only, his ownership is not established; and, as bearing on the second defense, that, if the evidence admitted as relevant to the fact of a deed made ten years before by A to B granting the right of way satisfies the jury that such a grant was made, B has established his ownership by actual grant, although the deed has been lost, and that the fact that B actually used the way at the time of the alleged grant and afterwards might be considered, so far as that fact might be relevant to the actual making and terms of the alleged grant. Such a charge might be substantially correct, but it would be incorrect if the court should further charge that, if the jury cannot find a possession for more than fourteen years, and are not satisfied that A made a grant ten years before, by the evidence relevant to that fact, they may consider the evidence of possession for fourteen years and the evidence relevant to the unproved grant together, and from the whole evidence thus considered may presume an actual grant.

The error centers in the inaccurate use of the word "presume." Possession may confer title as truly as grant confers title. Each is a mode of acquiring ownership. But the potency of possession as a means of acquiring title, when insufficient for that purpose, cannot be used to effect the relevancy of one or more acts of ownership by the alleged grantee of a specified grant to the fact of the execution, contents, and validity of that grant. In discussing the ownership of intangible property or incorporeal hereditaments, it is often necessary to use the words "grant," "presumption," "possession," with differing meanings, indicated only by the context, and there is much excuse for the occasional confusion of things, related but really independent; but there is far less excuse for any confusion of this nature in discussing the ownership of land. Here the distinction between the acquisition of ownership through possession and its acquisition through a conveyance from a former owner to the present possessor is more clearly marked. Under the early English law, land, unlike property in intangible rights, was not the subject of prescription in any form. Twiss v. Baldwin, 9 Conn. 304; 2 Bl. Com. 264. Substantially the only mode by which ownership could be transferred from one owner to another was some form of conveyance. Bare possession, the apparent right of possession, and even the right of possession might be acquired without terminating ownership of land once acquired and not conveyed. This ownership might be asserted and established through the writ of right, and then the lost possession be recovered. The limitation of the writ of right to a definite period of sixty years (Stat. 32 Hen. VIII.) to a limited extent, and the adaptation of the action of ejectment to the trial of title with the limitation of the exercise of a right of entry to a period of twenty years (Stat. 21 Jac. I) to a greater extent, rendered the practical acquisition of ownership by possession possible in many cases. After the passage of the statute of James I. cases might arise where the writ of right would be available to the true owner; but since the enactment of Stat. 3 & 4, Wm. IV., for limitations of actions relating to real property, possession for twenty years as a mode of acquiring ownership of land has been more clearly recognized, and has sometimes been termed an acquisition of ownership through legislative conveyance.

In this state, however, possession as a mode of acquiring ownership of land has been recognized from earliest days; the only other method being some form of conveyance. The first settlers claimed to have acquired absolute ownership of lands within our limits mostly by purchase from the native Indians and partly by conquest, and their ownership in fact rested on these claims until the charter of 1662, which granted and confirmed to the charter government all land within its jurisdiction, to be holden of the King in free and common socage. Subsequently lands belonging to particular persons were held according to this tenure, but the land tenures of England were in no other way ever recognized as a force within our limits. The claims of ownership and purchase by conquest were never abandoned, and in 1793 our legislature declared that by the establishment of our independence the citizens of this state became vested with an allodial title to their lands, and therefore it declared "that every proprietor in fee simple of lands has an absolute and direct dominion and property in the same." Rev. 1796, p. 253. In 1639, substantially coincident with the establishment of civil government, it was enacted that all land allotted to any particular person should be recorded. Such record, as well as the record of any subsequent sale, was compulsory, and sale without record was of no value. A certified copy of the record served the purpose of a deed. 1 Col. Rec. p. 37. In 1660 it was enacted that all future conveyances should be made by deed duly recorded, and the requisites to the validity of such deed were prescribed. 1 Col. Rec. p. 358. In 1667 it was enacted that any person then standing possessed of land and so continuing uninterrupted for the space of one year should be the owner thereof as fully as if allotted to him, with the same right to enter it for record. 2 Col. Rec. p. 67. In 1684 it was enacted that any person who has had a right of entry or action in respect to land detained from him since 1667 until the 10th of the month following the passage of the act, and neglected to enforce such right, shall thereafter be utterly excluded and disabled from such suit or entry. It was further enacted that no person having an existing right of action or entry for land detained could exercise the same unless within three years from the 10th of the following month, and that no subsequently accruing right of action or entry for land detained could be enforced unless within fifteen years from the accruing thereof. 3 Col. Rec. 146, 147. The substance of this last provision has since remained unchanged, and is found in section 1109 of the General Statutes of 1902. In 1727 it was provided that no valid conveyance of land could be made by anyone ousted of possession thereof except to the present possessor. 7 Col. Rec. 105. The operation of these laws, most of which are still retained substantially in the form of their original enactment, was to establish by legislative authority possession for fifteen years as a distinct means and mode of acquiring ownership of land. One reason for this operation may be found in the wide differences between the English law of real estate and our own.

In Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 306, Judge Reeve says: "We have always considered ownership as giving a right to possession of real property, as much so as ownership of personal property. Ownership in the one case draws after it the possession as much as in the other case, and whenever a right of possession is lost all title and ownership are lost. So the statute of limitations respecting lands has always been construed. The statute, in the words of it, does not take from the original proprietor his title; it only tolls his right of entry; and yet this statute has been always considered as barring all claim of title, whilst the same words in the English statute have been considered, not as having any effect on the title, but only on the right of entry, and the lands may be recovered by a form of proceeding proper for such a case. The English law distinguishes betwixt a right of possession and a right of property, but our law does not. Wherever there is a right to real property, there is, of course, a right of possession, and the statute, which takes away the right of possession, takes away the right of property; and this is the reason that this statute has received a construction altogether different from the construction given to the English statute." The controlling reason is found in the fact that the legislation mentioned, extending from 1639 to 1684, must be regarded as one piece of work, whereby our system of acquiring ownership of land was developed and settled. Conveyance followed by record according to the forms prescribed for securing perpetual certainty is the normal mode of acquiring ownership. When these forms are neglected, or the owner abandons his land, occupancy or possession continued for fifteen years is a distinct mode of conferring a new ownership on the person in occupation at the end of the term. Eels v. Day, 4 Conn. 95; Sherwood v. Barlow, 19 Conn. 471-477; Price v. 60 L. R. A.

Lyon, 14 Conn. 279-290; Wright v. Wright, 21 Conn. 329-345.

It follows (1) that in establishing a legal title to land acquired through adverse possession, evidence is directed to the nature and extent of the occupancy, to the existence of any statutory disabilities, and to the unbroken continuance of the occupancy for fifteen years. Mere possession is in no sense evidence of a conveyance, real or fictitious; on the contrary, its efficacy depends on the assumption that the title by conveyance is in someone else. Possession of the requisite kind, for the requisite period, is the thing to be established by evidence, and, when established by evidence, this thing, viz., this fifteen years of adverse possession, directly extinguishes the former ownership, and directly invests the person in occupation at the termination of the statutory period, not with the title of the former owner, but with a new ownership acquired through this distinct mode. (2) In establishing a legal title acquired through conveyance, possession, occupancy, acts of ownership may or may not, according to the circumstances of each case, be relevant to some fact tending to prove the conveyance through which ownership is claimed. In no other way is there any substantial, evidential relation between the mere fact of an actual occupation of land and the fact of a deed validly conveying that land to the occupant. This is unquestionable, unless it be true that, when a person claiming to be owner of land, but unable to produce evidence of conveyance, is in possession for less than fifteen years, the natural inference is that he has received a deed of that land; but the natural inference in such case is precisely the opposite. In view of our law regulating the making and record of deeds, the probability that a man in possession of land without evidence of conveyance has not received a conveyance is strong.

Mere possession, therefore, cannot be relevant to the fact of a conveyance by deed, although it may become relevant to some one of the facts sought to be established in proving the deed, and its relevancy and weight for that purpose must be determined by the ordinary rules of evidence, and cannot be confused with the theory of an arbitrary presumption used in discussing prescription for incorporeal hereditaments. There is nothing in our decisions to justify such a confusion, although some suggestion of an excuse for it may be found in the individual opinions of Chief Justice Swift and Judge Gould, reported in Sumner v. Child, 2 Conn. 607, the case cited in the opinion of the majority of the court. The case is a peculiar one. From what appears to have been the substantially conceded facts, the case is this: William Dudley acquired ownership of the land in question. Upon his death his son, Joseph, entered into possession as heir, and remained in possession for twenty-eight years, when his title passed to the defendant through the levy of an execution. The same year administration was granted on the estate of William Dudley, and in due course of proceeding the land was sold to pay William's debts. It was purchased by the plaintiff, who shortly after brought the action of ejectment. Here was no question of conveyance or adverse possession. Joseph acquired ownership by descent subject to the paramount authority of the law to appropriate the land to the payment of debts in administering his father's estate. If the grant of administration and the proceedings under it were valid, the plaintiff had a legal title; if they were not valid, the defendant had a good title. The title depended solely on the validity of the administration proceedings. As the decrees of the probate court had not been appealed from, the defendant could not attack their validity in the ejectment suit. He therefore relied upon the claim that the long delay in taking out administration should have the same effect as a release from the creditors of William, and that the fiction of an imaginary grant, proved by immemorial usage or possession, was applicable to this case, and the court in substance charged the jury that they might presume a title in the defendant from length of possession alone. A majority of the judges of this court held that such instruction was erroneous. No opinion of the court was given. Three of the judges expressed their views. The chief justice, who tried the cause below, warmly defended his charge. Judge Smith argued that the charge was erroneous, because possession had nothing to do with the title, as that must depend wholly on the validity of the administration proceedings. Judge Gould directly attacked the general proposition of Judge Swift, arguing that the jury could not presume a conveyance of land from length of possession alone, and for this reason the charge was erroneous. He also expressed his own views as to the possible relevancy of mere occupation in proving the actual conveyance of land. It is this part of his argument which the opinion of the majority restates with an implication of too broad approval. We cannot be sure what number of the judges, in granting a new trial, acted on the views of Judge Smith or Judge Gould. The case is certainly not an authority upon any question except the proposition advanced by Judge Swift. Its interest lies in the academic duel between Judges Swift and Gould, as the individual utterance of either is entitled to the greatest deference. It is idle for present purposes to discuss their differences. Each, to a certain extent, was looking at a different side of the shield, and neither kept clearly in mind the application of his general statements to the real facts of the case in hand. The confusing nature of the discussion is indicated by the last retort of Swift, uttered in his "Digest," where, referring to Gould's opinion and the distinctions drawn by him, he says with his occasional unguarded vigor: "This is a new doctrine. It was never before promulgated. No such distinction can be found in any book. It is opposed to the decision of every case that has been determined, and the dicta of every judge upon the subject." 1 Swift, Dig. 167. The general trend of Judge 60 L. R. A.

Gould's opinion supports the views I have expressed, but there is uncertainty in the language used in discussing the occupation of land merely as evidence. If that language can fairly be treated as stating that, when a legal title to land through a deed of conveyance is to be proved, the mere fact of possession or occupation of that land by the claimed grantee has any probative force except as it may be relevant to some fact in the case in accordance with the general rules for determining the relevancy of one fact to another, then the statement seems to me clearly inconsistent with sound principle, and unsupported by authority.

Applying to the facts of the present case the ordinary rules of evidence, it seems clear that the rejected evidence was immaterial, and its rejection furnishes no ground for a new trial. The facts are these: The record title to the land in question is in Wallace & Sons, through a deed to them dated August 20, 1873, from the grantee of an admitted owner. Julia and Richard Cahill, one or both, were in possession from 1873 to the death of Julia, in 1885. From his wife's death Richard was in possession, using the land as his own, and mortgaging it as his own, until his death, in 1901. The defendants are in possession as devisees of Richard. The plaintiffs claim as heirs of Julia Cahill. Richard, at the time of his death, had acquired a complete title through adverse possession since his wife's death, unless his possession was through the right of another. The plaintiffs claim that Julia at her death was owner of the land, and Richard until his death, continued in possession as tenant by the curtesy. Their whole case rests upon maintaining this claim, for unless tenant by the curtesy, the title in Richard at his death is certain. Their claim that, Julia being in possession at the time of her death, and for a long time before, the court should presume, in the absence of countervailing testimony, a legal title in her, was properly overruled, and may be laid out of the case. They attempted to prove ownership in Julia through adverse possession, but, as there was no possession by either Julia or Richard for more than twelve years at the time of Julia's death, the court, for this reason, was compelled to find she had no ownership through adverse possession. Any rulings on evidence as applicable to her title through adverse possession are, therefore, immaterial. There remained the claim of title in Julia through a deed of conveyance, and the plaintiffs' case then rested solely on the fact of conveyance.

The fact in issue is further narrowed through the plaintiffs' introduction of evidence proving the possession by Julia at certain times between 1873 and 1885 of a document which they claim was a deed of conveyance of the land in question to Julia, and this document represented the only conveyance claimed. Unless this document is proved to have contained a valid conveyance to Julia, there is no foundation in the case for the claim of her legal title. The document was not produced, and its contents, to be proved by secondary evidence, constituted the ultimate fact which must determine the relevancy and materiality of the evidence rejected. Upon the trial Julia's son, one of the plaintiffs, was asked whether his father had ever done anything on or about the land during his mother's life. The question was excluded as immaterial. The ruling would seem unquestionably correct. It is claimed it was relevant to the fact of possession by Julia, but testimony of every fact tending to prove Julia's possession was admitted. Mere negative testimony that someone else did nothing about the place is too remotely related to the fact of her possession to be admissible.

It is claimed that the absence of acts of ownership by Julia's husband might characterize the nature of her possession as adverse to him. Possibly such negative conduct by the husband might be relevant if the question were whether an ownership by adverse possession inured to the wife separately, or to the husband. But, as such question was excluded from the case by want of possession of any kind for the requisite period, relevancy on this ground is wholly immaterial. Whether the actual occupation by Julia was adverse to her husband or not cannot affect its relevancy to the contents of the document which was operative as a conveyance to her, or not at all.

It is suggested that the court has found that the husband was in possession, and, by inference, that the wife was not, and might not have made this finding if an answer to the question had been permitted. I think a negation of Julia's actual occupancy is not a proper inference from this finding, and that it is controlled by a theory as to the legal effect of acts of ownership by the wife, and not at all by any actual acts of ownership by the husband which were not claimed by the defendants to have been proved. But I prefer to assume that the court did find that Julia was not in possession, and that such finding might possibly have been influenced by the negative testimony excluded; for this brings me to a consideration that renders all speculation as to the possible materiality of that testimony to the fact of Julia's possession unnecessary. The fact of exclusive possession by Julia was wholly immaterial in view of the facts proved, and claimed to be proved, in respect to the document in her possession. It appears from the finding of the court, the statement of the facts on which the plaintiffs' claims of law were based, incorporated in the finding, and the plaintiffs' proposed draft for a finding, that all the subordinate facts proved or claimed to have been proved by the testimony in respect to the deed of conveyance were these: Julia on two or three occasions held in her hand a document which she said was a deed of her land. On one occasion she handed some papers to Mr. Webster to keep for her. He kept them some years, and subsequently returned them. Among these papers was a document which Mr. Webster testified was a deed to Julia. Julia was in actual possession of the land from 1873 to 1885, claiming to be owner. These bald facts are all, and are clearly insufficient to prove a conveyance from the owner of the land to Julia Cahill. It is enough that there is absolutely nothing to prove that any particular person, or any unnamed person, being owner of the land, made any conveyance of any kind to Julia Cahill. Actual possession of the land by her is immaterial, and wholly incompetent to the proof of this fact; and without this fact, as well as others that are not proved, the acquirement of ownership by Julia through a valid deed of conveyance has not been proved, and therefore the plaintiffs have not established a legal title for themselves. It follows that upon all the facts in the case, together with the fact which it is claimed the excluded testimony would prove, the judgment of the trial court is the only one that can lawfully be rendered. Under these circumstances the exclusion of the testimony, even if theoretically erroneous, furnishes no ground for a new trial.

I dissent from the opinion of the majority because I fear it is liable to raise an unauthorized and unnecessary doubt as to the clear distinctions under our law in respect to the acquirement of ownership in land through conveyance and its acquirement through adverse possession, and which control the relevancy and materiality of mere possession in proving a legal title through either mode of acquisition. I dissent from the result because it seems to me clear that it grants a new trial for the exclusion of testimony, which, if admitted, could not lawfully have induced a different judgment.

I think there is no error in the judgment of the superior court.

ERROR to the City Court of Waycross to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's failure to protect plaintiff while a passenger on its train. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. E. Kay, for plaintiff in error:

The carrier is an insurer as to freights, but its responsibility, and consequent liability, in the carriage of passengers is much smaller.

Simmons, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Some time in June, 1901, Ponder boarded a passenger train of the Brunswick & Western Railroad Company at Fairfax, Georgia. He paid his fare to Waycross. When the train stopped at Waresboro, a station intermediate between Fairfax and Waycross, three men boarded the train, assaulted Ponder, and removed him from the train. After settling for a small sum his claims against the individuals who assaulted him, Ponder brought suit against the railroad company for its failure to protect him. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $500. The company moved for a new trial, the judge overruled the motion, and the company excepted. The evidence shows that when the train stopped at Waresboro the conductor stepped off to assist the passengers who were getting on or off. While he was so engaged, three men boarded the train to arrest Ponder; entering the train at a point other than that at which the conductor was standing. One of these men was marshal of the town of Waresboro, another was the deputy marshal, and the third was specially deputized by the marshal to assist in making the arrest. They had no warrant, and seem to have arrested Ponder for having failed to pay one of them a debt. They ordered him to get off the train with them, and, upon his refusal, began to strike and beat him. At this juncture the conductor came in, and discovered, for the first time, that the officers were on the train, making an arrest. He took hold of one of them, and remonstrated with them all; suggesting that they go on to Waycross, the train having already started. This they refused to do, ordering the conductor to stop the train. The conductor, when he came in, had heard Ponder tell the officers that he had paid them all he owed them; but the conductor made no investigation as to the charge against Ponder, and did not try to ascertain whether the officers had a warrant. He knew that the officers were such, and they had on former occasions arrested persons on his train, and taken them off. Upon their demand, he had the train stopped before it had left the corporate limits of the town. The officers and Ponder then left the train. The motion for new trial complains that the verdict is contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it, and that the court erred in certain charges and refusals to charge. Our idea of the law of the case, as given below, covers these assignments of error, and we will not deal with them separately.

1. A railroad company is bound to use extraordinary care and diligence to protect its passengers, while in transit, from violence or injury by third persons. If a third person boards the train and assaults a passenger, it is the duty of the railroad company to use extraordinary care to protect the passenger; and in this state the conductor of a train carrying passengers is invested with all the powers of a police officer. Pen. Code, § 902. At the same time, a conductor would not be justified in interfering with the lawful arrest of one who happened to be a passenger on his train. This much is clear. The present case, however, falls within an intermediate class. The arrest of Ponder was not a lawful one, but of this fact the officers of the railroad company had no notice. The arrest was made by officers of the law, acting under color of their office, and we think the company was under no duty to inquire into the legality of the arrest. The arrest was apparently regular, and, in the absence of any knowledge or notice to the contrary, the officers and agents of the company could assume that it was lawful. The conductor knew that the men making the arrest were officers, and he had previously had passengers on his train arrested by them and removed from the train. While the officers were attempting to arrest Ponder, the latter told them, in the hearing of the conductor, that he had paid them all he owed them. This was not of itself sufficient to put the conductor on notice that the arrest was for a debt. So far as he knew, it was a claim by Ponder that he had restored all of the money which he had acquired by the commission of some crime with which he was charged, or that he had attempted illegally to settle some criminal prosecution. The arresting officers had no warrant, but in this state an officer may arrest, without warrant, an offender who is attempting to escape. Further than this, the conductor did not know of the absence of a warrant, and Ponder did not raise that question, or represent to the conductor that the arrest was unlawful or unauthorized.

2. The conductor made a decided effort to quiet the disturbance on the train and to stop the assaults on Ponder. One of the plaintiff's witnesses testified that the conductor did all that he could have done. However this may be, we think the failure of the conductor to interfere with the officers and prevent the arrest did not give Ponder any cause of action against the company. It is essential to the maintenance of the law that its processes should be promptly executed, and its officers allowed to proceed without interference, except in cases where such interference is clearly justified. It would never do to allow a railroad conductor to interfere with officers of the law, and prevent arrest by them, merely because he did not know whether or not they were acting within their power and authority. If the conductor had knowledge that the arrest was unlawful, then it would be his duty to use extraordinary diligence to prevent it and protect the passenger, but even in that case the company would not be an insurer against such arrest. If the conductor had notice that the arrest was wrongful, it would be his duty to make inquiry into the matter. But where the arrest is by officers of the law, and is apparently regular, and there is nothing to put the company on notice that the arrest is illegal, the company cannot be held liable for a failure to interfere with the officers and prevent the arrest. It was argued that the conductor had also actively aided in the arrest by stopping his train to enable the officers to remove their prisoner. This is answered by what has been said above. The conductor was ordered to stop the train, and, as he had a right to presume that the arrest was legal, his obeying the 60 L. R. A.

command of the officers was no breach of duty to the passenger. An officer may stop a train to make an arrest of a person thereon. St. Johnsbury & L. C. R. Co. v. Hunt, 60 Vt. 588, 1 L. R. A. 189, 15 Atl. 186. And certainly an officer may, after having made the arrest, stop the train to remove his prisoner. It would have been an interference with the officers to have carried them on out of their town while they were endeavoring to make an arrest within it. In this particular case it further appears that, at the time the train stopped upon the command of the officers, Ponder had ceased resisting, and agreed to get off.

3. One other question remains: Was the railroad company liable for allowing the arresting officers to use more force than was necessary to make the arrest? Ponder appears to have been considerably beaten and bruised, and the evidence would warrant a finding that more force was used to make the arrest than was necessary, and that this was evident to the conductor, or to anyone else who was present. It was argued that, even if the company was under no duty to prevent the arrest, it was still liable for not seeing to it that no unnecessary force was used. In the first place, the conductor seems to have done what he could to prevent this, and but little force was used after he arrived upon the scene; the violent assaults having occurred before he discovered what was going on, or had time to take part. Nor is there any evidence of negligence on the part of the company's agents in not sooner discovering that the officers were on the train, endeavoring to arrest Ponder. Then, too, if our conclusion be correct, that the conductor could assume that the arrest was a lawful one, and was under no duty to prevent it, we think the company cannot be held liable for the excessive force used. Ponder became the prisoner of the officers as soon as they laid hold on him, and before he was removed from the train. He was taken out from under the protection of the conductor, as against the officers of the law. He was then in the custody of the law, and, whether or not the conductor or anyone else was authorized to prevent the use of unnecessary force in making the arrest, the railroad company was in this regard no longer under any duty to him as a passenger. See, in this connection, Jardine v. Cornell, 50 N. J. L. 485, 14 Atl. 590.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Idaho, Respt.,

v.

(.....Idaho.....)

- *1. Where an assistant prosecutor asks the son of the accused, on cross-examination, if he had not stated to A that he suspected his father of having committed a similar offense with other girls, one a member of his family, and that such conduct on the part of the accused caused the death of witness's mother, and that, if at such conversation witness did not cry, and say, "I can't go against my father, even if he is guilty;" and repeatedly asks substantially the same question,—such conduct of the prosecutor is reversible error.
2. Such questions are improper cross-examination, and should not be allowed under the guise of impeaching the witness.
3. It is the duty of the prosecutor to see that a defendant has a fair trial, and that nothing but competent evidence is submitted to the jury; and, above all things, he should guard against anything that would prejudice the minds of the jurors, and tend to hinder them from considering only the evidence introduced. He should never seek by any artifice to warp the minds of the jurors by inference and insinuations.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank Harris, for appellant:

Mr. A. A. Fraser also for appellant.

Mr. John A. Bagley, Attorney General, for respondent:

If there was any misconduct on the part of the prosecuting attorney or his assistant in this case it does not sufficiently appear that any prejudicial error was occasioned thereby to the defendant, or that he was thereby deprived of having a fair trial.

Ailshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, alleged to have been committed on one Dora Irwin, a female child, who at the time of the alleged offense was of the age of fourteen years and eleven months, and he was thereupon sentenced to serve a term of ten years in the state penitentiary.

The offense is alleged to have been committed at Meadows, in the county of Washington, on the 4th day of July, 1902. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and in this court the two principal questions, as presented for our consideration, are: "(1) That the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that it was necessary for the prosecution to prove that at the time of the alleged offense the prosecutrix, Dora Irwin, was not the wife of the defendant; and that the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial upon the ground that the evidence did not show that said Dora Irwin was not at the time of the alleged offense the wife of defendant. (2) Misconduct on the part of the assistant prosecutor in the repeated asking of certain questions on cross-examination of the witness Daniel Irwin imputing to the defendant other like crimes, and to the rulings of the court in permitting such questions to be answered."

Counsel for defendant contend that, under the provisions of § 6765 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, it is necessary for the information to allege that the female upon whom the offense is charged to have been committed was not at the time thereof the wife of the defendant, and that the court should have instructed the jury that it is necessary for the state to prove such fact the same as any other fact in the case. We are not called upon in this case to pass upon that question, for the reason that the information charges that the offense was committed upon "one Dora Irwin, a female, not the wife of him, the said William Irwin," and the court instructed the jury that such fact must be proved, and we think it was proved. In instruction No. 8 we find the following language: "To warrant a conviction of the defendant, therefore, of the crime charged in the information, to wit, rape, the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt: . . . (2) That at said time the said Dora Irwin was a female child under the age of eighteen years, and not the wife of the defendant." We have carefully examined the record in this case, and think the evidence as given by the defendant himself sufficiently establishes the fact that the said Dora Irwin was not the wife of defendant. We find in the record the defendant referring to the prosecutrix as

"Miss Dora" and "my granddaughter" and "the girl," and we find her, on the other hand, referring to the defendant as "my uncle Bill."

The second contention of the defendant, however, is a much graver question, and one on which we have examined many authorities before arriving at the conclusion which we are compelled to announce in this case. The defendant called his son, Daniel Irwin, as a witness, and examined him, and thereupon he was cross-examined by the assistant prosecutor, and, among other things, we find that in the course of such cross-examination the following questions were put, and answers, objections, and rulings by the court were made:

Q. Did you not, in the course of that conversation with Mary Phillips, say also, in substance and effect, that you suspected your father of having done the same thing with other girls, mentioning one of your family?

A. No, sir.

Q. You swear to that?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you not on that occasion cry bitterly?

A. I might have shed a few tears; but very few, I think.

Q. Did you not, in the course of that conversation with Mary Phillips, say also, in substance and effect, that your father's actions with the other girl — with the member of the family referred to — had caused your mother's death?

Mr. Irwin: We object to that as immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant, and not proper cross-examination of the witness. (Objection sustained.)

Q. Did you see Miss Phillips since you have been here in Weiser?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Irwin: At this time we wish to take an exception to the special counsel for the prosecution in propounding questions to the witness, as being an invasion of the rights of the defendant, and for the purpose of attempting to prejudice the rights of the defendant in this action, being a matter not relevant, and pertaining to no matter under discussion before the court.

The Court: The court sustains objections to such questions as the court deems improper.

Mr. Irwin: I am not making any objections as regards the court. I am taking an exception particularly to the conduct of counsel in that particular matter in embodying in his questions the same elements to which the court has sustained objections in the preceding question.

Q. I will ask you if you saw Miss Phillips in this town on the evening of March 12th of this present year?

A. I don't know. I believe I did. I have seen her several times since I have been in town. I am not positive of the date.

Q. I will ask you whether or not, on the evening of March 12, 1902, in room 19 of the Weiser Hotel, in this county and state, 60 L. R. A.

you said to Mary Phillips, in the course of a conversation had between you and Mary Phillips in that place and on that occasion, the conversation being directed to the question of your father's guilt or innocence upon this charge, in substance and effect as follows: "I can't go against my father, even if he is guilty." Did you so state?

Mr. Irwin: We object to that question as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent (Objection overruled, to which ruling of the court counsel for defendant excepts.)

Q. Did you so state in substance and effect?

(No answer.)

Q. Again I ask you whether you stated in substance and effect — I will repeat: "I cannot go against my father, even if he is guilty?"

A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Nothing to that effect?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you cry there on that occasion in talking to her?

A. No, sir.

Q. You didn't cry on that occasion in talking to her?

A. No, sir. She was there for the information she didn't get.

Q. You was playing detective again, was you?

A. No, sir; I was not. She was.

Q. How do you know she was?

A. I could tell from the lay of things from start to finish. She invited me to the room. I went there.

Q. Did she say on that occasion that she thought your father was guilty?

Mr. Irwin: We object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and as hearsay.

(Objection sustained.)

Q. Then you swear positively that you had no such conversation, in substance and effect, as that; that is, the conversation that you have denied?

A. Yes, sir; I do.

It is contended by counsel for defendant that the questions here asked repeatedly of defendant's son tended to prejudice the substantial rights of defendant before the jury, and to throw into the jury box the insinuation that the defendant had, prior to the commission of the act alleged, committed similar offenses, and that his conduct in that respect had caused the death of the witness's mother, defendant's wife, and that the witness himself believed in the guilt of the defendant, and that he had stated as much, and that he had cried and wept in his conversations with others over the conduct of his father.

We are cited to a great many authorities discussing the conduct of prosecutors and rulings of the courts upon questions very similar to the one at bar. In the case of People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 Pac. 1078, McFarland, J., speaking for the court in discussing the conduct of the prosecutor in asking the defendant on cross-examination if she had not committed a like offense in another state, says: "It would be an impeachment of the legal learning of the counsel for the people to intimate that he did not know the question to be improper and wholly unjustifiable. Its only purpose, therefore, was to get before the jury a statement in the guise of a question that would prejudice them against appellant. If counsel had no reason to believe the truth of the matter insinuated by the question, then the artifice was most flagrant; but if he had any reason to believe in its truth, still he knew that it was a matter which the jury had no right to consider. The prosecuting attorney may well be assumed to be a man of fair standing before the jury, and they many well have thought that he would not have asked the question unless he could have proved what it intimated if he had been allowed to do so. . . . Where the clear purpose is to prejudice the jury against the defendant in a vital matter by the mere asking of the questions, then a judgment against the defendant will be reversed, although objections to the questions were sustained, unless it appears that the questions could not have influenced the verdict." In People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752, the defendant was prosecuted upon the charge of murder. The supreme court of California, in discussing the conduct of the prosecutor in stating matters in the presence of the jury which were not borne out by the record, said: "Still more objectionable was the conduct of the prosecuting attorney. It is true, the court properly interfered, rebuking the attorney, and instructing the jury to pay no attention to the statements. But the statements were well calculated to influence the jury in a case of this character, and it is impossible for us to say that no injury resulted to the defendant therefrom." In People v. Mullings, 83 Cal. 138, 23 Pac. 229, the prosecuting attorney asked the defendant, while on the witness stand, the following questions: "What did you say to . . . your wife when you went home that night? Did you not tell your wife that you had killed a man?" The defendant objected to these questions, and the objection was overruled. The supreme court of California, in discussing this action of the prosecutor and ruling of the court, says: "Counsel for respondent contends that the questions asking defendant about conversations with his wife did not injure him, because his answers to them were mostly in the negative. But what answers were expected? After defendant testified that he did not kill John Moore, can any sane man think that the district attorney supposed for a moment that defendant would answer affirmatively a long list of questions framed upon the presumption that he did kill him? Why, then, did he ask them? And, if the questions and answers did not help to strengthen the case against defendant, why did not the prosecution consent to have them stricken out? It is quite evident that the questions, and not the answers, were what the prosecution thought important. The purpose of the questions clearly was to keep persistently before the jury the assumption of damaging facts which could not be proved, and thus impress upon their minds the probability of the existence of the assumed facts upon which the questions were based. To say that such a course would not be prejudicial to defendant is to ignore human experience and the dictates of common sense." The case of Leahy v. State, 31 Neb. 586, 48 N. W. 390, was a rape case, and in many particulars similar to the one at bar. There the prosecutor, upon cross-examination of the accused, asked him "if on the day succeeding that on which it was alleged he committed the crime he did not go to the residence of one B, and there, finding Miss B, daughter of B, alone, did not attempt to drag her to the lounge," etc., and then said to the court in the presence of the jury, "We intend to follow this matter up, and show that he went right over to B's, and there tried to kiss and hug Miss B, and drag her to the lounge." The supreme court of Nebraska, in commenting upon this conduct of the prosecutor, says: "It is the duty of the officer prosecuting to conduct the trial of a criminal case according to the established rules. He acts in a semi-judicial capacity, and is supposed to act alone from principle, and without bias or prejudice. The state has guaranteed to everyone a fair trial, and such trial cannot be had if the prosecution can resort to tricks to secure a conviction. If such practice was sanctioned, it would result in many cases in the conviction of innocent persons. The plaintiff in error was on trial for the crime charged in the information. So far as appears, he had not been charged with any other offense, and certainly was not on trial for the second. The statements of the attorney were improper, and in the highest degree prejudicial, and for those causes the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial." In Smith v. People, 8 Colo. 457, 8 Pac. 920, the defendant was charged with the crime of receiving stolen property. The prosecutor, in the course of his argument, stated "that he had further expected to prove, as stated in his opening, that the defendant had murdered Molly Gorman." The supreme court of Colorado, in discussing this action of the prosecutor, said: "The action of the prosecuting officer, as above set forth in the record, constitutes gross misconduct on his part, and a total disregard of the legal rights of the prisoner. It manifests a disposition to ignore the plainest principles of law in relation to the trial of criminal offenses, and exhibits contempt for the authority and dignity of the court of which he was then an officer. Such statements, coming from the acting district attorney at the time and in the manner made, must have been highly prejudicial to the cause of the defendant. They were not only made by an officer of the court, but they were made in the closing or last speech to the jury, when there was no opportunity for defendant's counsel to criticize or answer them. No such facts had been received in evidence, and they were not only wholly outside the evidence, but totally irrelevant to the subject-matter of the trial. The officer could have had but one motive in view in the course pursued by him, viz., to prejudice the jury against the prisoner by charging her with the commission of graver crimes than the offense for which she was being tried." In Holder v. State, 58 Ark. 473, 25 S. W. 279, the defendant was prosecuted on the charge of murder, and in the course of his cross-examination the prosecutor asked him, among other things: "Is it not a fact that you had committed rape in Texas, and left there for that reason?" Battle, J., speaking for the court, concerning this question, says: "The action of the attorney for the state was highly reprehensible. A prosecuting attorney is a public officer, 'acting in a quasi judicial capacity.' It is his duty to use all fair, honorable, reasonable, and lawful means to secure the conviction of the guilty who are or may be indicted in the courts of his judicial circuit. He should see that they have a fair and impartial trial, and avoid convictions contrary to law. Nothing should tempt him to appeal to prejudices, to pervert the testimony, or make statements to the jury, which, whether true or not, have not been proved. The desire for success should never induce him to endeavor to obtain a verdict by arguments based on anything except the evidence in the case, and the conclusions legitimately deducible from the law applicable to the same. To convict and punish a person through the influence of prejudice and caprice is as pernicious in its consequences as the escape of a guilty man. The forms of law should never be prostituted to such a purpose." The Missouri court of appeals, in the case of State v. Trott, 36 Mo. App. 29,—a gambling case,—in discussing the conduct of the prosecutor in cross-examining the accused, and asking him if he had not played cards for money before, said: "The question thus put to the witness by the state's attorney was not only not pertinent to the witness's direct examination or to the issues, but it was inadmissible as evidence against him on any theory, and it thrust into the minds of the jurors an irrelevant matter, which was highly prejudicial to the accused." In the case of the People v. Cahoon, 88 Mich. 456, 50 N. W. 384, the court, in commenting upon the action of the prosecutor in making remarks in the presence of the jury as to the purpose of the evidence he was offering, said: "Zeal in a prosecuting attorney is entitled to the highest commendation, but that zeal must be exercised within proper limits. . . . In criminal cases the prosecuting attorney is a public officer, acting in a quasi judicial capacity. Juries very properly regard him as unprejudiced, impartial, and nonpartisan; and insinuations thrown out by him regarding the credibility of witnesses for the defense are calculated to prejudice the defendant." To the same effect, see Gale v. People, 26 Mich. 156; 60 L. R. A.

People v. Devine, 95 Cal. 231, 30 Pac. 378; People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 327, 20 Pac. 719; People v. Ah Len, 92 Cal. 282, 28 Pac. 286.

It will be observed from the foregoing authorities that the courts do not look with favor upon the action of prosecutors in going beyond any possible state of facts which can be material as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant in a particular case for which he is upon trial. Prosecutors too often forget that they are a part of the machinery of the court, and that they occupy an official position, which necessarily leads jurors to give more credence to their statements, action, and conduct in the course of the trial and in the presence of the jury than they will give to counsel for the accused. It seems that they frequently exert their skill and ingenuity to see how far they can trespass upon the verge of error, and generally in so doing they transgress upon the rights of the accused. It is the duty of the prosecutor to see that a defendant has a fair trial, and that nothing but competent evidence is submitted to the jury, and above all things he should guard against anything that would prejudice the minds of the jurors, and tend to hinder them from considering only the evidence introduced. When he has submitted all the facts in the case to the jury he should be content, but he should never seek by any artifice to warp the minds of the jurors by inferences and insinuations. In the case at bar it is apparent at once that the questions of the special prosecutor were calculated to prejudice the jury, and lead them to believe that the defendant, who was then on trial, was a bad and dangerous man in a community, and that he had been guilty of a similar offense prior to the one alleged, and that his conduct with other young girls had brought about the death of his own wife; and this was sought to be made more forcible by asking the defendant's son if he had not made such statement himself,—facts which were wholly foreign to the case upon trial. It could not be material in any view of the case. It was not proper cross-examination, and upon no view or theory of the case was it admissible. In this case the objection to one of the questions was sustained, but counsel continued to ask practically the same question. The defendant's attorney objected to the conduct of the counsel, and finally the court overruled the objection of defendant's counsel to a very similar question, as will be seen from the portion of the record quoted. From this ruling of the court the jury had a right to believe that the evidence was competent for them to consider.

Another thing which appears in this case, and makes the error more prejudicial to the rights of defendant, is the fact that the evidence was of the most conflicting and unsatisfactory character; so much so that we cannot doubt that the conduct of counsel and the incompetent evidence admitted did actually prejudice defendant.

It is urged by the attorney general that an exception to the action of the assistant prosecutor and the rulings of the court was not properly saved. We are unable to agree with this contention. The record above quoted shows that defendant's counsel twice objected to the questions, and once took exception to the action of counsel for the state in persisting in substantially repeating the question. Attorneys should be careful in making their objections and saving their exceptions, but we think they have sufficiently done so in this case.

After the defendant had rested his case, the state examined the witness Mary Phillips in rebuttal, and asked her if she had had such a conversation with the witness

Daniel Irwin as had been set forth in the question asked of Irwin, and she answered in the affirmative. The defendant assigns the admission of this evidence as error. The record, however, does not show any objection made to the question, but it is well enough here to observe that the evidence was clearly inadmissible as against the defendant, and the fact that it was given under the guise of impeachment of the witness Daniel Irwin did not make it competent.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and cause remanded.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

B. F. LONG

v.

Nannie Belle WILSON et al., Appts.

(.....Iowa.....)

A judgment in a suit between the owner of property abutting on a highway and the municipality to establish the boundary of the highway is not conclusive on the owner of the property located on the opposite side of the street, who is not made a party to the suit, and whose access to and from his property will be interfered with if the boundaries so established prevail.

(January 28, 1903.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Dallas County in favor of plaintiff in an action to prevent the obstruction of a highway. Affirmed.

Statement by Ladd, J.:

The petition alleged that plaintiff acquired lots 5, 6, and 7 in block 3, abutting Fifth street, in Tyler's addition to Perry, in 1892, and shortly thereafter occupied them as a homestead for himself and family, and has continued to do so since; that said street is 70 feet wide, and the only one through which plaintiff has convenient access to said property. It also averred facts which, if true, indicate that said street, through dedication, had become a public street of the city before defendants acquired block 4 of said addition, in November, 1900, and that they have since encroached on said street by erecting a dwelling house, building a fence, and planting shade trees up to within 13 feet of the east line of plaintiff's lots, and threaten by other obstructions to prevent the use of all the said street, save said strip 13 feet wide along the east side of plaintiff's lots, and thereby interfere with his access to his property, and the comfort and enjoyment of it as a home, and greatly diminish its value. Plaintiff prayed that these obstructions be abated, and defendants enjoined from encroaching on said street. In the third division of the answer the defendants aver that they acquired said block 4 (describing it) of the Security Investment Company of Baltimore November 27, 1900; that prior to that time, December 19, 1899, said company commenced an action against the city of Perry to establish the boundaries of said block, and to quiet title against said city; that said city appeared and answered; that decree was entered, as prayed, confirming the boundaries of said block as claimed by defendants. Copies of the pleadings and decree in that case were set out as part of the answer. To this division the plaintiff interposed a general demurrer, and also that the adjudication was not binding on plaintiff, as he was not a party to the action. The demurrer was sustained, and defendants appeal.

Messrs. Giddings & Winegar, for appellants:

Plaintiff in this case being a citizen and property owner of the city of Perry at the time of the commencement and trial of the case of Security Investment Co. v. Perry, upon the trial of which case the issue was made and determined, as between said parties, as to whether or not the particular piece of property now in dispute constituted a portion of the public street, and that determination being adverse to the city, it is binding upon the city and upon all the residents and property owners thereof.

The fee title to all public streets and alleys is in the city. The purchaser of town and city property acquires no ownership or interest in the streets adjoining such property other than that which is given to the whole public.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For the purpose of this case, the averments of the petition and third division of the answer must be treated as true. If so, then defendants are encroaching upon and obstructing the only street by which plaintiff has convenient access to his homestead abutting thereon. The defendants justify this by a decree in an action wherein their grantor was plaintiff and the city of Perry, within whose limits the property is located, was defendant, awarding said grantor all of said street, save a strip 13 feet wide along the east side of plaintiff's lots, as a part of block 4 to the east, and belonging to them. Plaintiff was not a party to that action. Is he bound by the adjudication? As contended by appellant, the decree is binding upon all citizens of the city of Perry having 60 L. R. A.

no interest in the street, other than as individual members of the general public. The legally constituted authorities of the city stand for and instead of its citizens, and may be said to represent them in such litigation. Clark v. Wolf, 29 Iowa, 197; Lyman v. Paris, 53 Iowa, 498, 5 N. W. 621; Cannon v. Nelson, 83 Iowa, 242, 48 N. W. 1033; Dicken v. Morgan, 59 Iowa, 157, 13 N. W. 57. This is not questioned. What appellee contends is that, as owner of the property abutting on the alleged street, he has a right to, and interest in, the street, distinct and different from that of the general public. This doctrine has been expressly recognized in this state. Cook v. Burlington, 30 Iowa, 94, 6 Am. Rep. 649; Warren v. Lyons City, 22 Iowa, 351. The authorities are practically agreed to the same effect. Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 877. It may not be of importance to the general public whether a particular street is vacated or not. It is important to the individual owner of abutting property that he shall be able to get to and from his residence or business, and that the public shall have the means of getting there for social or business purposes. In such a case access to thorough-fares connecting his property with other parts of the town or city has a value peculiar to him, apart from that shared in by citizens generally, and his right to the street as a means of enjoying the free and convenient use of his property has a value quite as certainly as the property itself. If this special right is of value,—and it is of value if it increases the worth of his abutting premises,—then it is property, regardless of the extent of such value. Surely no argument is required to demonstrate that the deprivation of the use of property is to that extent the destruction of its value. Under the allegations of the petition, then, shutting off the approach to plaintiff's homestead was the taking of his property, and of this there has been no adjudication. Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 38; Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 31 Mo. 180; Bradbury v. Walton, 94 Ky. 167, 21 S. W. 869; Heller v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 Kan. 625; Heinrich v. St. Louis, 125 Mo. 424, 28 S. W. 626; Bannon v. Rohmeiser, 90 Ky. 48, 13 S. W. 444; Abendroth v. Manhattan R. Co. 122 N. Y. 1, 11 L. R. A. 634, 25 N. E. 490; Cincinnati & S. G. Ave. Street R. Co. v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 523; Anderson v. Turbeville, 6 Coldw. 150. As said in Heinrich v. St. Louis, 125 Mo. 424, 28 S. W. 626; "There is no doubt but a property owner has an easement in a street upon which his property abuts which is special to him, and should be protected." While the owner of a lot on a public street has the same right to the use of a street that rests in the public, he at the same time has other rights which are special and peculiar to him, and the right of ingress and egress is one of them. This right of access is appurtenant to his lot, and is private property. To destroy that right is to damage his property, and, when this is done for the public good, the public must make just compensation therefor."

We are not questioning the power of the legislature, through the municipality, to vacate streets. That has been fully recognized by this court. McLachlan v. Gray, 105 Iowa, 250, 74 N. W. 773, and cases cited. Conceding such power, it does not follow that it may be exercised without compensating abutting owners for the damages occasioned thereby. Paul v. Carver, 24 Pa. 207, 64 Am. Dec. 649, and McGee's Appeal, 114 Pa. 470, 8 Atl. 237, are often cited as announcing that compensation cannot be exacted in event of the vacation of a street. Although the opinions broadly state this, it is to be observed that they were causes in which the municipalities were sought to be enjoined from exercising the power to vacate, and did not necessarily involve the right of the abutter to recover damages. The power to vacate as we think, does not necessarily depend on the absence of the right to recover damages for the taking of private property. Damages might be awarded in a subsequent action. But these cases are to be further distinguished, in that the public had but an easement, and the vacation amounted to no more than a surrender of this to the owner of the fee. They seem in this respect to be in harmony with our own decisions relating to the vacation of a country highway. In deciding this question, the court, in Brady v. Shinkle, 40 Iowa, 576, said: "That a landowner may sustain damage, according to the common acceptance of the word, on account of a vacation of a highway, as stated in the question, cannot be doubted. It is equally true that inconvenience and damage may result to him by closing a road which is miles away from his land. A farmer may suffer serious loss and inconvenience by the vacation of a highway over which he is accustomed to travel and haul the productions of his farm to market, though his land abuts upon no part of it. All who use the road suffer in the same way. While one may be more largely injured than others, he yet sustains damages of the same character and nature which all who use the road—the public generally—suffer. While the road exists, he has a right to the easement. But this right is not different from that enjoyed by the public generally. His right, then, is such as is enjoyed by the public. His damages are those shared by the public, and no other." See also Grove v. Allen, 92 Iowa, 519, 61 N. W. 175; McKinney v. Baker, 100 Iowa, 302, 69 N. W. 683. This is the prevailing rule. Levee Dist. No. 9 v. Farmer, 101 Cal. 178, 23 L. R. A. 388, 35 Pac. 569; State ex rel. Johnson v. Deer Lodge County, 19 Mont. 582, 49 Pac. 147. See Contra, Pearsall v. Eaton County, 74 Mich. 558, 4 L. R. A. 193, 42 N. W. 77.

In the vacation of an ordinary highway, outside of a city or town, all that is done is to yield control of the easement in the land, and the right of exclusive possession passes to the owner, to be occupied as a private way, or otherwise, as he pleases. Its discontinuance does not of necessity cut off access to his property. The public merely ceases to keep up and repair the strip of land as a highway. The situation, although analogous in some respects, is different with a town or city street. The abutting lot owner cannot complain if the street be left in precisely the same condition as a country road. The municipality owes him no legal duty of improving it. Upon its vacation, however, the fee, remaining in the city or town, may be devoted to whatever purposes it may choose, and hence access be entirely cut off. It may be diverted absolutely from the purposes for which dedicated, and this brings us to the main distinction between a country highway and a street. The former is established by law for the public: the owner usually being paid value for a mere easement in his land, though there may be gratuitous dedication. Title to the streets of a city or town is acquired by grant, with the implied right of ingress and egress in the abutting lot owner; the grantor or the party making the dedication to the city or town saying to him: "This right of ingress and egress you shall have." Bradbury v. Walton, 94 Ky. 163, 21 S. W. 869. By accepting the street, the obligation to keep it open and afford the dedicator or his grantees, near or remote, access to abutting lots, is clearly implied; and though, under the plenary powers of the legislature over all streets and highways, it may be vacated, the damages occasioned thereby cannot be said to be those shared with the public generally, as in the case of a country road, but are in large part peculiar to himself. Anderson v. Turbeville, 6 Coldw. 150; Selden v. Jacksonville, 28 Fla. 558, 14 L. R. A. 370, 10 So. 457; Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 431, 7 L. R. A. 548, 10 S. E. 689; Rensselaer v. Leopold, 106 Ind. 29, 5 N. E. 761, and cases previously cited; People ex rel. Hart v. Marin County, 26 L. R. A. 659, and note in which decisions are collected (103 Cal. 223, 37 Pac. 203).

Damages incident to the occupation of the street by a railroad are denied, in the absence of statute, because the inconvenience occasioned thereby is shared in by the citizens generally. Nor do courts look favorably on claims based on the mere inconvenience arising from the closing of streets, when another approach remains. Kings County F. Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 101 N. Y. 411, 5 N. E. 353; Fearing v. Irwin, 55 N. Y. 486; Dantzer v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. 141 Ind. 604, 34 L. R. A. 769, 39 N. E. 223. And no consideration will be given the claims of owners of land not abutting thereon. Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254; East St. Louis v. O'Flynn, 119 Ill. 200, 59 Am. Rep. 795, 10 N. E. 395; Heiler v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 Kan. 625.

The point involved was touched in Barr v. Oskaloosa, 45 Iowa, 275. The ruling there affirmed sustained a demurrer to a petition that, while alleging the vacation of the street, also asserted that access to the dwelling house was greatly obstructed, not cut off. It was held that the city had the power to vacate, and that damages could not be recovered for the partial use thereof by the railroad; but in the course of the opinion, after referring to the statute, the court said: "This section clearly confers upon the city the power exercised in this case, and for an exercise of this legal right the city cannot be made to respond in damages." But the case has not been treated in subsequent decisions as disposing of the question. Thus, in Stubenrauch v. Neyensch, 54 Iowa, 567, 7 N. W. 1, it was mentioned and treated as open, but a decision of it expressly disclaimed; Barr v. Oskaloosa being cited. In Williams v. Carey, 73 Iowa, 194, 34 N. W. 813, the court said that the use of the street in Barr's Case had not been diverted, but was "still devoted to a public use, different, possibly, from the one intended by the proprietor who laid out the town." The writer of the opinion had spoken for the court in Cook v. Burlington, 30 Iowa, 94, 6 Am. Rep. 649, and quoted with approval language from an Ohio case which so clearly expresses our conclusion that it will bear repetition: "The lot owners have a peculiar interest in the street, which neither the local nor general public can pretend to claim; a private right in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament legally attached to the contiguous grounds and the erections thereon; an incidental title to certain facilities and franchises assured to them by contract and by law, and without which their property would be comparatively of little value. This easement appendant to the lots, unlike any right of one lot owner in the lot of another, is as much property as the lot itself."

Having determined all necessary to a decision of this case, the question of liability for damages ought to be deferred until directly involved. It follows that, as plaintiff had an interest in the street apart and distinct from that enjoyed by citizens generally, the adjudication against the city of Perry was not binding on him, and the demurrer was rightly sustained. Hine v. Keokuk & D. M. R. Co. 42 Iowa, 636.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

City of CAMPBELLSVILLE, Appt.,
v.

Jacob ODEWALT.

(.....Ky.....)

1. An ordinance subjecting one in possession of premises on which liquor is sold, disposed of, obtained, or furnished in violation or evasion of law, to fine, whether the act is with his knowledge or consent or not, violates a constitutional provision that absolute and arbitrary power over the lives, liberty, and property of freemen exists nowhere in the republic.
2. The burden of proving that the act was not with his knowledge or consent does not rest upon one on whose premises liquor is illegally sold, where the evidence of the prosecution shows merely that the liquor was procured in defendant's building from a person unknown.

(Hobson, O'Rear, and Settle, JJ., dissent.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Taylor County in favor of defendant in a proceeding to enforce a penalty for violation of a city ordinance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. W. Rives and H. C. Wood for appellant.

Paynter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee was arrested under a warrant which charged that "on the 22d day of September, 1900, in the county aforesaid, the said Jacob Odewalt was there and then in possession of premises on which liquor was sold to one Thomas G. Newton, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided." It was based upon an ordinance which reads as follows: "Be it enacted by the board of council for the city of Campbellsville, Ky.: That any person in possession of the premises in the city of Campbellsville, Ky., on which liquor is sold, disposed of, obtained, or furnished in violation or evasion of law, by any trick or method whatever, on conviction shall be fined not less than twenty dollars ($20.00) nor more than one hundred dollars ($100.00) for each offense, and each time such liquor is sold, disposed of, or furnished in violation or evasion of law is a separate offense." The ordinance does not denounce a penalty for selling liquor in violation of law. The warrant was obtained upon the affidavit of Thos. G. Newton, the party to whom it is alleged the liquor was unlawfully sold. It does not charge the appellee with selling liquor, but the charge is that "said Jacob Odewalt was then and there in possession of the premises on which the liquor was sold." The evidence offered is to the effect that Newton, in a back room of the appellee's store, bought from an unknown party some whisky and beer. There was no evidence showing that the party from whom Newton bought it had any connection whatever with the appellee in a business way or otherwise, or that the appel-lee even knew him, or that he had ever been in the store previous to or since that time. The court below gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the appellee, which was accordingly done. The case is not briefed by counsel for appellee, but in the brief for appellant it is stated that the court sustained the motion for peremptory instruction upon the ground that the ordinance in question was unconstitutional. This is a most unusual ordinance. It makes the party in possession of the premises responsible for an act that he never had an intention to commit; for an act that he did not do himself; for an act that might have been done by another, not in his presence, but without his knowledge or consent. No presumption of innocence can be indulged; no defense can be made to the prosecution; although he may not have had an intention to commit the offense, although he never was guilty of an act in violation of law, and although he had no knowledge that others were engaged in the violation of law upon his premises. Under this ordinance parties could enter upon the yard of a citizen at midnight, when he was asleep, sell liquor in violation of law, and in consequence of which a fine could be imposed upon the party in possession of the premises. A practical illustration of what might be done under the ordinance is furnished by this case. Newton testified that he bought it from a party unknown to him. He then swore out a warrant for the appellee. Appellee cannot contradict Newton, because he fails to give the name of the alleged seller. If the ordinance is valid, appellee must suffer the imposition of the fine with practically a denial of the right to defend himself against the charge. If a legislature or common council of a municipality can enact such a law as this, and it is valid, they could enact a law which would compel an occupant of premises to pay all kinds of fines and submit to all kinds of imprisonment for all kinds of offenses which might be committed upon his premises without his knowledge or consent. While a zeal to punish persons who sell liquor in violation of law is commendable, yet it must be confined to the enactment and enforcement of laws which do not arbitrarily deprive citizens of their liberty and property. Section 2 of the Bill of Rights reads as follows: "Absolute and arbitrary power over the lives, liberty, and property of freemen exists nowhere in a republic, not even in the largest majority." We cannot conceive of a greater attempt at the exercise of arbitrary power than in the enactment of the ordinance in question. Under that ordinance a citizen's liberty and property can be taken, although he has done no act in violation of law, or even had an intention to do so. The exercise of the same arbitrary power might deprive a citizen of his life, because, if this ordinance is valid, a law might be enacted of the same character that would deprive one of his life, although he was not present, and although he did not commit a wrongful act, or have any knowledge that one was about to be committed. The ordinance in question is quite different from one which would impose a fine upon one in possession of premises for suffering or permitting liquor to be sold thereon. To interpolate words to describe that offense would be, in effect, adopting a new ordinance. The offense under such an ordinance would not be for being in possession of premises upon which the wrongful act was committed, but for the act of suffering or permitting the wrongful act of another to take place on his premises. Such an ordinance would denounce a penalty for an act which the ordinance declares to be wrong, while the ordinance in question in effect makes one guilty of the wrongful act of another. Our opinion is that the ordinance in question is unconstitutional.

It is suggested that the peremptory instruction should not have gone, as the proof tended to show that appellee was in possession when the selling took place, and therefore the burden shifted to him to show that he had no knowledge of it. The ordinance was not enacted as a rule of evidence, and to determine its effect, but to define an offense. If it were proper to interpret the ordinance in question as we would one that complied with the constitutional requirements, then the peremptory instruction should have gone, because the evidence detailing the circumstances under which it was sold would rebut the charge that he suffered and permitted it to be sold. Bishop on Statutory Crimes, § 132, reads as follows: "A statute will not generally make an act criminal, however broad may be its language, unless the offender's intent concurs with his act, because the common law does not. Hence what is done from overwhelming necessity is construed as not violating a statute, however contrary to its general terms. And one who, while careful and circumspect, is led into a mistake of facts, and, doing what would be in no way reprehensible were they what he supposes them to be, commits what, under the real facts, is a violation of a criminal statute, is guilty of no crime, because such is the rule of the common law, and in construction it restricts the statute. Yet in some instances of this sort he incurs a civil liability." It is suggested that to follow the doctrine of this section would lead us to hold the ordinance valid. It is difficult to see what this has to do with the case under consideration. The first part of it is to the effect that at common law it was essential to show the intent of the alleged offender, and that statutes do not generally make a criminal offense, unless the offender's intent concurs with his act. To enforce the ordinance in question it is necessary to interpolate words describing an act for which a party may be prosecuted, as well as an intention to commit it. In the next clause of the section it is stated that, where an act is the result of "overwhelming necessity," it is construed as not violating a statute, however contrary to its general terms. This is not a case for the application of such a principle, because it is not contended that any act was done in this case as the result of "overwhelming necessity." Again, the section says: "And one who, while careful and circumspect, is led into a mistake of facts, and, doing what would be in no way reprehensible were they what he supposes them to be, commits what, under the real facts, is a violation of a criminal statute, is guilty of no crime." We are wholly unable to see the remotest application that this principle has to the case under consideration. There is no evidence here that the appellee was led to do an act as the result of a mistake of facts.

It is suggested that certain rules of interpretation, if followed, would lead to the holding of the ordinance in question as valid. One of these rules is that every statute ought to be expounded, not according to the letter, but according to the meaning; and another is that every interpretation which leads to an absurdity ought to be rejected; and, again, that a law ought to be interpreted in such manner as that it may have effect, and not be vain and illusive. There is no occasion for the application of the first rule of interpretation mentioned, because we have interpreted the statute according to its letter and spirit, and condemn it because in its spirit and letter it is violative of the Constitution. This is no occasion for the application of the second rule, because the interpretation we have given the ordinance does not lead to an absurdity. If it is enforced according to the word and spirit, it would be neither vain nor illusive, but it would be so drastic and effective as to deprive the citizen of his liberty and property. Again, it has been suggested that the reason of an enactment must enter into its interpretation, and that a case within the letter, but not within the spirit, of a statute, is not embraced by it. This is not a case for the application of that rule, because the party was in possession of the premises when the sale took place, and, if it is an offense, it is not only within the letter, but within the spirit, of the ordinance. Section 460, Ky. Stat., provides that "all words and phrases shall be construed and understood according to the common and approved usage of language." There is no question as to the words and spirit of the ordinance. No word is used of doubtful import, and no phrase is employed of uncertain meaning.

The logic of those who oppose the views herein expressed is to have the court enact an ordinance that would not be subject to a constitutional objection, give it a retroactive effect, and declare the appellee has violated it. The business of the court is to interpret, not enact, laws.

The judgment is affirmed.

Hobson, J., dissenting:

The by-law before us in this case is taken from § 2572, Ky. Stat., which is in these words: "The person in possession of the premises on which liquor is sold, disposed of, obtained, or furnished in violation or evasion of law, by any trick or method whatever on conviction shall be fined not less 60 L. R. A.

than twenty nor more than one hundred dollars for each offense; and each time such liquor is sold, disposed of, or furnished in violation or evasion of law shall be deemed a separate offense under this act against the person in possession of the premises on which said liquor is obtained, furnished, or disposed of." The by-law, merely following the statute, is not void, unless the statute is also invalid; for it cannot, of course, be maintained that the town authorities could not make a by-law similar to the statute, to secure its better enforcement. It is said that the language used is broad enough to make the owner of the premises guilty criminally if a tramp walking by should step off the highway and sell whisky on his land, and other similar illustrations are given. But the statute requires no such rigorous construction. It will be observed that the statute uses the words, "in violation or evasion of law;" also the words, "under this act." The act was approved February 24, 1894, and is entitled "An Act to Punish the Violation and Evasion of the Laws of This Commonwealth in Relation to the Regulation of the Sale of Spirituous, Vinous, or Malt Liquors." See Acts 1894, p. 33. Every section of the act strikes at tricks, subterfuges, or devices for the evasion of the laws against liquor selling. The legislature knew that in local option communities blind tigers were frequently run by irresponsible persons, here to-day and gone to-morrow; while the owner of the property could be more easily found; and the purpose was to prevent the evasion of the law. The statute was aimed at those who evaded the law, and not at those whose premises might be used for a moment by some tramp without their knowledge. This construction not only harmonizes the section quoted with the general intent of the act as shown by its title and other provisions, but is in accord with the principles of common law. In Bishop on Statutory Crimes, § 132, it is said: "A statute will not generally make an act criminal, however broad may be its language, unless the offender's intent concurred with his act, because the common law does not. Hence, what is done from overwhelming necessity is construed as not violating a statute, however contrary to its general terms. And one who, while careful and circumspect, is led into a mistake of facts, and, doing what would be in no way reprehensible were they what he supposes them to be, commits what, under the real facts, is a violation of a criminal statute, is guilty of no crime, because such is the rule of the common law, and in construction it restricts the statute. Yet in some instances of this sort he incurs a civil liability." In Bailey v. Com. 11 Bush, 691, this court said: "Words in a statute were always to be understood according to the approved use of language. But there are other rules of construction of equal dignity and importance, which must not be overlooked, and which, although not incorporated in our statutes, are as binding upon the courts as if embodied in it. One of these rules is that 'every statute ought to be expounded, not according to the letter, but according to the meaning;' and another, that 'every interpretation that leads to an absurdity ought to be rejected;' and still another, that a law ought to be interpreted in such manner as that it may have effect, and not be found vain and illusive." Following this principle, it has been held that the reason of an enactment must enter into its interpretation, and that a case within the letter, but not within the spirit, of a statute, is not embraced by it. Brown v. Thompson, 14 Bush, 538, 29 Am. Rep. 416. And to sustain a statute, and give it effect, the court read the statute as though the word "width" was the word "depth." Bird v. Kenton County, 95 Ky. 195, 24 S. W. 118. The case before us does not require us to go further than the common-law rule quoted above from Bishop on Statutory Crimes. The legislature had in mind evasions of the liquor laws, and was aiming to punish those who evaded them. Where the liquor is sold on the premises of another, without his knowledge or consent, or under circumstances beyond his control, or not reasonably to be anticipated by him, he is not to be punished. This gives the statute a fair effect. It remedies the evils the legislature had in mind, and it is the duty of the court, if it can do so, to enforce the legislative will, and not render the statute vain and illusive. By § 1130, Ky. Stat., a person convicted a second time of felony shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than double the time of the first conviction, and, if convicted a third time, during his life. Yet under this statute it was held that the increased penalties only applied to offenses committed after the former conviction. Brown v. Com. 100 Ky. 127, 37 S. W. 496. In holding this the court had only to guide it the legislative intent, without any expressions in the statute indicating it. The case here is much stronger, for the phraseology of the statute, as well as its title, shows that the legislature was aiming at only evasions of the law. It has been held a violation of the statute to carry a pistol concealed in a valise; but if a person, walking with a friend, carried his valise for him, not knowing there was a pistol in it, he would clearly not come within the purpose of the statute against carrying concealed deadly weapons. Similar illustrations may be given as to nearly all the statutes declaring certain specific acts misdemeanors. To say that the principle stated by Bishop applies to acts done by the defendant, but not to a case like this, is to ignore the principle on which the rule rests; which is that there is at common law no criminality where the defendant acts innocently, and there is no fault on his part, actual or constructive.

The evidence in this case proved the facts set out in the statute, and therefore made out a prima facie case against the defendant. It was one of those cases within the letter, but not within the spirit, of the statute, as above indicated. The burden of proof was on the defendant to show it, and the court should not, therefore, have instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant. In Bishop on Statutory Crimes, § 1022, it is said: "Where the statute is silent as to the defendant's intent or knowledge, the indictment need not allege, or the government's evidence show, that he knew the facts. His being misled concerning it is matter for him to set up in defense and prove." A number of authorities from other states are cited in support of this principle, and there are many familiar illustrations of it. A mistake of the person or ignorance of a subsisting marriage will, under some circumstances, be a defense to an indictment for adultery; but such things need not be anticipated by the state, and must be shown by the defendant. The same is true of the crime of incest, where the defendant may show ignorance of the relationship in defense. There being no proof here rebutting the prima facie case made out by the state, the court should, in my judgment, have submitted it to the jury. The question is not, therefore, presented how far the legislature, in the exercise of the police power, may, by small and reasonable penalties, provide for those things which tend to the repression of violations of law, as, in its discretion, the exigencies of the case require. See Purnell v. Mann, 105 Ky. 87, 48 S. W. 407, 49 S. W. 346, 50 S. W. 264. Of course, it is conceded that excessive fines and cruel punishment cannot be inflicted. Const. § 17. I therefore dissent from the judgment of the court.

O'Rear, J., concurs in this dissent. Settle, J., concurs in so much of it as construes the statute to cover only evasions of the law, but is of the opinion that the burden of proof in such cases as this is upon the commonwealth to show that the sale of spirituous liquor was made with the knowledge or acquiescence of the defendant; and, that fact not having been shown on the trial, the lower court did not err in granting the peremptory instruction in his favor.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

Edmond KIRD

v.

NEW ORLEANS & NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(.....La.....)

*To have its freight platform constructed so near to its track that the elbow of a passenger may come in contact with freight on the platform as the passenger is seated inside of a passing car, with his elbow resting for comfort on the sill of one of the windows of the car, and protruding but slightly, is gross negligence on the part of a railway company, rendering it responsible in damages to a passenger injured under the above circumstances.

(June 21, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Morehouse in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Jonathan N. Luce for appellant.

Mr. E. T. Lamkin, for appellee:

It is gross carelessness and negligence to construct a platform so near a railroad track that cotton piled properly upon it becomes an obstruction to passing trains.

Kird v. New Orleans & N. W. R. Co. 105 La. 226, 29 So. 729.

There can be no contributory negligence where there is no knowledge of the danger, nor sufficient reason to apprehend it to put a reasonable and careful person on his guard.

7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 391; Langan v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 72 Mo. 392; Thomp. Carr. of Pass. p. 446; Summers v. Crescent City R. Co. 34 La. Ann. 139, 44 Am. Rep. 419.

Negligence is not contributory where it was not the proximate cause of the accident.

7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 382.

Negligence on the part of the plaintiff does not relieve the defendant of liability in an action for damages for injuries, where it is shown that the defendant could have avoided the accident by the exercise of proper care and caution.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Collins, 2 Duv. 114, 87 Am. Dec. 486; McGuire v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 46 La. Ann. 1543, 16 So. 457; Rice v. Crescent City R. Co. 51 La. Ann. 114, 24 So. 791.

It is not unusual for passengers to ride with the arm resting in the car window, and railway companies are bound to have knowledge of it, and should exercise proper care and caution to avoid such accidents, particularly where an unusual and dangerous obstruction is plainly visible.

Summers v. Crescent City R. Co. 34 La. Ann. 139, 44 Am. Rep. 419.

Mr. W. F. Millsaps also for appellee.

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's wife boarded the defendant's train at Oakridge station on her way to Monroe. She took a seat next to a window, another woman of her own race occupying the other half of the seat at her left. The car moved on, and had gone about 150 feet, when plaintiff's wife's right arm was broken in two places, above and below the elbow, by coming in contact with a bale of cotton that stood on the freight platform of the defendant company, alongside of which the train was passing. Plaintiff sues in damages for the injury, and the defendant company answers that the accident was brought about by the negligence of the plaintiff's wife in putting her arm out of the car window.

The plaintiff's wife says that she and her seat companion were eating pinder candy, of which the supply was in a paper bag in her lap; that she was holding a piece of candy in her left hand, while her right was on her lap, her elbow resting on the window sill, when the window was darkened by the bale of cotton, and her arm was broken by being crushed against the jamb of the window; and that the broken arm dropped in her lap.

She is a talkative witness, given to details, and her testimony has about it an air of ingenuousness; but she says that she did not put her arm out of the window and wave good-by to her friend as the car was leaving the station, and that her arm at the moment of the accident was wholly inside of the car, no part of it projecting outside, whereas all the other witnesses who saw the accident testify that she did wave and that her arm was projecting.

Two of these witnesses testify that her arm was still extended out of the window in the act of waving at the moment of the accident; but the weight of the testimony is that she had ceased waving, and had drawn in her arm, and was merely resting it on the window sill.

The defendant's witness Brodnax, who had had his head out of one of the windows of the front car and had drawn it in just in time to avoid the cotton, testifies, as follows: "After she ceased waving, she placed her arm on the window sill, with the elbow sticking 6 or 7 inches out of the window. . . . A portion of the hand was out of the car window, I think, as best I remember."

The defendant's witness Drew, who was at the station looking at the train as it moved off, and watching the arm, and within 150 feet of it, testifies as follows:

Q. Is it not a fact, Mr. Drew, that Melissa Kird's elbow, at the time the injury was inflicted upon her, extended over the car window, or out of the car window, only a very short distance or space?

A. That's what I stated.

Q. Is it not a fact that the elbow did not project or extend over the window sill 2 inches?

A. I can't say that exactly. I say it extended over the window sill no further than the width of the arm. It was almost directly straight. Her arm was straight with the car when I saw it.

Q. Her arm was almost straight with the window sill upon which it was resting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. With the hand extending inward, or the inside of the car?

A. I could not tell whether the hand was inside the car or hanging directly down. I couldn't see the arm at all, but just the elbow. Either the hand was bent inside the car, or down. I couldn't tell which.

Drew was in the better position for observation, and his attention was concentrated on the arm at the moment of the collision; hence we adopt his statement that the elbow was extending outside no further than the thickness of the arm.

Our conclusion from this testimony, taken in connection with that of plaintiff's wife, is that when the accident happened plaintiff's wife had ceased waving to her friends and had turned her attention to her candy, and that her arm had been drawn in and was resting on the window sill merely for comfort. So much for the proof of the alleged contributory negligence.

The bale of cotton, on the other hand, was so close to the passing car that, if it had been set there on purpose to catch any protruding elbow, or hand, or head, it could hardly have been stationed closer. If we go by the testimony of the mechanic, who, after the accident, was employed by the defendant's agent to saw off a part of the platform, and who says that he was instructed to cut off 2 feet, and that he did so after exact measurement, the space between platform and passing train was $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches at the north end of the platform, $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches at the south end, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches at the middle; and the bale of cotton may well have grazed the passing car, especially if the same witnesses, Brodnax and Drew, are not mistaken in their statements that it projected beyond the edge of the platform, or if some allowance is made for the vacillation of the train. If we base ourselves on the inference that the planks of the curtailed platform were originally of the same length as those of the east platform, and that therefore the curtailment was of $15\frac{1}{2}$, instead of 24, inches, then the space between platform and passing train was from 9 to 10 inches, and between passing train and bale of cotton that same distance, less the projection of 60 L. R. A.

the bale of cotton, which projection was not less than 1 inch, and, according to the witness Brodnax, 4 inches. As the train pulled out the second time, it having backed to the station to put off the wounded woman, the two witnesses, Brodnax and Drew, observed closely to see how near it would pass to the bale of cotton. Drew was occupying his same position at the station, and Brodnax was on the train. According to the latter it passed very close, less than 6 inches; according to the former, it missed the bale of cotton by about 4 inches. Whether the collision had pushed the bale of cotton in, or had drawn it further out, is not known. Certain it is that this platform and this bale of cotton were close enough for their presence there to constitute on the part of the defendant company gross and culpable and inexcusable negligence.

And now the question occurs whether the defendant company is absolved from the consequences of this negligence by the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff's wife in letting her elbow project beyond the window sill.

Doubtless passengers should keep their persons within the car; there is abundant room for them to do so, and there is no necessity for them to stick their elbows outside; but the fact of the matter is that railway companies so construct their cars that the window sill at the passenger's side offers an inviting support to the arm, and in warm weather, when the sash is up, allures the arm to stretch along its airy surface, and notoriously passengers do yield to this temptation, and almost habitually do rest their elbow on the window sill, even at the risk of some part of it protruding beyond the line of the car. We do not think that an elbow protruding slightly under these circumstances ipso facto forfeits the protection of the law and becomes free game to the negligence of the railway company. We think that a passenger has a right to rely upon there being a clearance space for the train of at least the thickness of an arm, and that the question whether the exposure of the arm to that extent shall constitute contributory negligence must be left to be decided according to the circumstances of each particular case.

In the instant case, we are satisfied that the plaintiff's wife was unaware of the danger,—nay, perhaps, unconscious of the fact that her elbow was protruding; so that her fault, if any, was slight, and only such as any passenger might in a moment of forgetfulness lapse into, and, even if her act had been deliberate, she had a right to rely upon there being a clearance space for the train of at least the thickness of an arm, whereas the platform was thus dangerously near without necessity or reason, or even excuse, and the defendant has confessed that much by having it cut. The dangerous closeness was the result of the unmitigated negligence of the defendant,—was a constant threat and menace to the safety of the passengers. It maimed the plaintiff's wife, and on the same occasion came near proving a death trap to the witness Brodnax, and no telling how many like casualties it may have made imminent in the past. To absolve the defendant from responsibility under these circumstances would be to carry too far, we apprehend, the law of contributory negligence. In a recent case, where the negligence of the railway company was not near so direct or grave as in the instant case, this court held that the alleged contributory negligence of the passenger in permitting his elbow to protrude did not preclude recovery. Clerc v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. 107 La. 370, 31 So. 886.

As to the amount of the damages,—$1,500,—we have considered carefully the reasons adduced on one side for an increase, and on the other side for a reduction, and have come to the conclusion that, while the amount, perhaps, is somewhat scant, yet that, everything considered, justice has been done.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, at the cost of the appellant.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Amanda OPPENHEIMER et al., Appts.,
v.

Jacob LEVI.

(96 Md. 296.)

1. Possession is not necessary to enable a reversioner to maintain a suit in equity to remove the cloud from his title, where the term lessee, after having covenanted to pay the taxes, neglects to do so, and acquires title to the property at a tax sale.
2. Equity has jurisdiction of a suit by a reversioner to remove, as a cloud on his title, a tax deed acquired by a lessee for years, who has covenanted to pay the taxes, under the power to relieve from fraud and enforce trusts.

(January 16, 1903.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Baltimore County in favor of defendant in an action brought to set aside a tax deed. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Watson, Jr., for appellants:

The defendant, Levi, had possession when the tax sale was made, which was while he was still paying rent to the complainant Oppenheimer, and so held the premises for her and as her tenant. This is equivalent to actual possession by the landlord for the purposes of this case.

Messrs. Grason & Bacon for appellee.

Pearce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Samuel Ellinger and wife, in 1869, leased

see also Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Sparrow (C. C. W. D. Mich.) 1 L. R. A. 480; Wagner v. Law (Wash.) 15 L. R. A. 784, and cases in note to West v. People's Bank (Mass.) 8 L. R. A. 727.

the lot of land now in controversy, situated in Baltimore county, to Lena Sachs, for ninety-nine years, reserving to the said Ellinger and his heirs a yearly rent of $50, payable, one half February 1st, and the other half August 1st; and the lessee covenanted for herself, her personal representatives and assigns, to pay this rent and the taxes upon the lot. The leasehold estate therein, by deed of assignment made December 31, 1884, became vested in the appellee Jacob Levi, and his wife, Babet Levi, who, on February 16, 1887, assigned the same to Wm. H. Dryden. In 1890, the taxes for a previous year being in arrear, the fee in the premises was sold by the collector of Baltimore county to Jacob Levi, the appellee, to whom it was conveyed by said collector on January 23, 1891. This deed, however, was not placed upon record until June 13, 1896. Samuel Ellinger died July 6, 1891, and shortly thereafter his heirs conveyed to the appellant, Amanda Oppenheimer, the reversion in, and the ground rent issuing out of, said lot. On May 8, 1896, Levi united with Dryden in conveying to Henry Toner and wife a lot of ground designated as the lot described in the Ellinger lease, but which, through error, was made to embrace a lot but 50 feet square, instead of 50 feet by 150 feet, and this was conveyed subject to the annual rent reserved in the original lease from Samuel Ellinger and wife to Lena Sachs. On December 21, 1900, Toner, whose wife in the meantime had died, conveyed the lot to Jacob Levi, the appellee, subject to the payment of said annual rent. Levi paid the annual rent from the time he acquired the leasehold estate, December 31, 1884, down to the time of the conveyance by himself and Dryden to Toner, May 8, 1896, and Toner paid the same from May 8, 1896, to December 21, 1900, when he assigned to Levi, who has refused to pay the subsequently accruing rent, claiming the fee by virtue of said tax sale and the subsequent assignment to him. Thereupon Amanda Oppenheimer and her husband, on January 15, 1901, filed a bill alleging all the facts above recited, and averring that the tax sale mentioned and the various subsequent conveyances constituted a cloud upon her title to the reversion and rent, for the removal of which she was entitled to relief in equity. The bill also alleges that at the time of this tax sale this lot was assessed to Jacob Levi, and had been so assessed for several years, and that the tax sale was void for several reasons, not necessary to enumerate here. The bill further charges that, notwithstanding the assignment from Levi to Dryden in February, 1887, Levi remained, and continued to be, the real owner of the leasehold, and that he paid the ground rent continuously from 1884 to 1896 to Samuel Ellinger and those claiming under him; that the lot was assessed up to the time of the tax sale to Levi, and that notice that the taxes were overdue, and that sale would be made if they were not paid, was served upon him, who was the real owner of the leasehold, and as such bound to pay said taxes; and then 60 L. R. A.

specifically charges "that by his fraudulent acts and concealments he encouraged, promoted, and procured the said sale with the intention of acquiring the fee-simple interest in said lot for the trivial sum of $46, for which the same was sold; . . . and that the payment by him of the purchase money at such tax sale was but the payment of the taxes and expenses, which he was under obligation to pay." The prayer of the bill is: (1) That the tax sale may be declared void; (2) that the deed from the collector may be declared void, and be vacated and annulled; (3) that a decree may be passed declaring the appellant to be seised in fee of the reversion in said lot, and, to be entitled to collect the rent reserved in the original lease from Ellinger. The appellee demurred to the bill, and assigned the following grounds: (1) That the bill stated no sufficient case to entitle the plaintiff to relief; (2) that the court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter; (3) that the plaintiff's remedy, if any, was in a court of law; (4) that there was a full, complete, and adequate remedy at law; (5) that the plaintiff had neither the legal title to, nor the possession of, the property.

At the hearing the court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the bill, holding in the opinion filed that, as there was no allegation of possession by the plaintiff at the time the bill was filed, the case was governed by the case of Tector v. Shipley, 77 Md. 474, 26 Atl. 1019, 28 Atl. 1060, and those which preceded it, in all of which it is held that there must be such averment of possession, followed by proof, to warrant a decree for plaintiff. There can be no doubt that such is the general rule of equity, and that as such it is firmly established in this state by numerous decisions. In Heiden v. Hellen, 80 Md. 621, 31 Atl. 506, where a bill filed to remove a cloud upon the title failed to allege possession by the plaintiff, the bill was dismissed on demurrer; the court saying: "If the possession is in another, his remedy is by an action of ejectment. . . . Whatever may be the decisions elsewhere, no case in this state has gone so far as to maintain a bill in equity under the facts and circumstances of this case." And the rule was reaffirmed in Keys v. Forrest, 90 Md. 132, 45 Atl. 22, the latest case upon the subject in this court. But, while this is the general rule, there are some recognized exceptions to its application. In Crook v. Brown, 11 Md. 172, applying the general rule to the facts of that case, Judge Tuck said: "We know of no head of equity jurisprudence under which this [amendment to the bill] can be maintained. It would be substantially to give to a chancery suit the effect of an action of ejectment. . . . There are some circumstances under which courts of equity will remove a party in possession, and put in another, but these cases are of peculiar character." So, in Livingston v. Hall, 73 Md. 395, 21 Atl. 49, Judge Alvey said: "To maintain a suit of this character, it is, as a general rule, necessary that the plaintiff should be in the possession of the property." And in Steuart v. Meyer, 54 Md. 467,—a case arising under a tax sale of property subject to ground rent,—relief was granted notwithstanding the plaintiffs were not in possession; Judge Alvey saying: "They are interested only in the annual ground rents and in the estate of the reversion. They are not entitled to the possession, and could not, therefore, sue in ejectment for the recovery of the property. Under the circumstances of this case, without resort to a proceeding like the present, the parties would be without adequate remedy for relief against the effect of the prima facie title in the purchaser." In Textor v. Shipley, 77 Md. 473, 26 Atl. 1019, 28 Atl. 1060, it was argued that the decision in Steuart v. Meyer was in conflict with all the other cases in this court on that subject, and overruled the previous cases, but the opinion filed by Judge Robinson on the reargument in Textor v. Shipley, in which Judge Alvey concurred, explained what were the circumstances alluded to by him in Steuart v. Meyer, and showed that in that case, when the bill was filed, the property in controversy was in the possession of receivers appointed by the court, and that the plaintiff could not resort to the ordinary remedy by ejectment against Meyer as a disseisor, for the reason that he was not in possession of the property, and that, in maintaining the jurisdiction of equity under the peculiar circumstances of that case, it was not meant to question the general rule laid down in the earlier cases, "that those only who have a clear legal and equitable title to land, connected with the possession, have any right to claim the interference of a court of equity to give them peace, or dissipate a cloud on title." There are decisions elsewhere from courts of repute that actual possession by a tenant is equivalent to actual possession by the landlord for the purpose of such a bill; but these are not consistent with the decision in Steuart v. Meyer, as explained in Textor v. Shipley, and need not be referred to. There are, however, well-established legal principles applicable to the facts of this case, which, in our opinion, take it out of the general rule, and bring it within the exceptions in which equity has jurisdiction. These principles cannot be better stated than in the language of Judge Cooley, extracted from his Law on Taxation [2d ed. p. 500]: "Some persons, from their relation to the land or to the tax, are precluded from becoming purchasers, on grounds which are apparent when their relation to the tax and to the property is shown. The title to be given on a tax sale is a title based on the default of the person who owes to the public the duty to pay the tax, and the sale is made by way of enforcing that duty. But one person may owe the duty to the public, and another may owe it to the owner of the land, by reason of contract, or other relations. Such a case may exist where the land is occupied by a tenant, who, by his lease, has obligated himself to pay taxes. Where this is the relation of the parties to the land, it would cause a shock to the moral sense if the law were to permit this tenant to neglect his duty, and then take advantage thereof to cut off his lessor's title by buying in the land at a tax sale. . . . There is a general principle applicable to such cases, which may be stated thus: That a purchase made by one whose duty it was to pay the taxes shall operate as payment only; shall acquire no right, as against a third party, by a neglect of the duty which he owed to such party. This principle is universal, and is so entirely reasonable and just as scarcely to need the support of authority. Show the existence of the duty, and the disqualification is made out in every instance." A long list of cases illustrating the application of the principle thus stated under a great variety of circumstances is given in a footnote to the text, and a valuable note on the same subject will be found upon page 939 of 53 L. R. A., appended to the case of Smith v. Newman, 62 Kan. 318, 62 Pac. 1011, in which it is said that the cases are all agreed that a tenant cannot acquire a valid title, as against the landlord, by virtue of a tax sale during the tenancy for taxes which the tenant had agreed to pay. Among these may be cited the following: "At most the tenant could only become seised under the tax deed in trust for his landlord if living; if dead, then for his heirs or their assigns." Burgett v. Tahaffer, 118 Ill. 516, 9 N. E. 334. "Payment of taxes by a tenant at a tax sale will be considered as a redemption of the land for his landlord, and he will remain his tenant as before." Williamson v. Russell, 18 W. Va. 625. "In such case the tenant can acquire no valid title as against such owner, but would hold any title thus acquired in trust for such owner." Bertram v. Cook, 32 Mich. 519. "A tax purchase, made while such relation exists, is made in wrong; and the law, in circumvention of dishonesty, will conclusively presume that it was made in the performance of duty, and not in repudiation of it." Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Dulte, 45 Mich. 120, 7 N. W. 707. "A title so acquired would remain void in the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice." Blake v. Howe, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 306, 15 Am. Dec. 681. "Where a lessee covenanted to pay all taxes and assessments on the demised premises during the term, he was bound to pay a special assessment for planking and curbing the sidewalk in front of the premises; and where he disputed this liability, and permitted the lot to be sold to pay this assessment, and after the expiration of the term became the assignee of the purchaser, and took the tax deed, the lessor was held entitled to a judgment that the lessee quitclaim the premises to him, and that he be restrained from conveying or encumbering them." Shepardson v. Elnore, 19 Wis. 424. Some of these cases were actions of ejectment; others, and notably the last cited, were bills to remove cloud upon title. To the same effect are the cases of Stout v. Merrill, 35 Iowa, 47; Haskell v. Putnam, 42 Me. 244; Willard v. Ames, 130 Ind. 351, 30 N. E. 210; Reily v. Lancaster, 39 Cal. 354;

It is true that, in an action of ejectment, this plaintiff would be entitled to recover upon proof of the facts she alleges in her bill, but it does not follow that equity has not jurisdiction to grant the relief prayed; and we think an examination of the authorities will show that it is our duty to sustain this bill, and not to send the plaintiff to a court of law. In Hamilton v. Cummings, 1 Johns. Ch. 523, a bill was filed praying the delivery up and cancelation of certain bonds executed by the plaintiff's testator, which it was charged were given to indemnify defendant as bail in certain suits, but which were to be surrendered and canceled if defendant was not damaged or put to costs. The bill alleged that the suits were all settled, and that defendant had been put to no costs or damage. In considering the objection made to the jurisdiction of equity in that case, Chancellor Kent said: "I am inclined to think that the weight of authority and the reason of the thing are equally in favor of the jurisdiction of the court, whether the instrument is or is not void at law, and whether it be void from matter appearing on its face, or from proof taken in the cause."

But while I assert the authority of the court to sustain such bills, I am not to be understood as encouraging applications, where the fitness of the exercise of the power of the court is not pretty strongly displayed. Perhaps the cases may all be reconciled on the general principle that the exercise of this power is to be regulated by sound discretion, as the circumstances of the individual case may dictate; and that the resort to equity, to be sustained, must be expedient, either because the instrument is liable to abuse from its negotiable nature, or because the defense, not arising on its face, may be difficult or uncertain at law, or from some other special circumstances peculiar to the case, and rendering a resort here highly proper, and clear of all suspicion of any design to promote expense and litigation." In Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. 406, two devisees were in possession of lands under an imperfect title devised to them by their common ancestor, and it was held that one of these could not buy up an adverse title to disseise or expel his cotenant, but that such purchase would inure to their common benefit, subject to an equal contribution to the expense; and the same high authority said, "It is not consistent with good faith, nor with the duty which the connection of the parties, as claimants of a common subject, created, that one of them should be able, without the consent of the other, to buy in an outstanding title, and appropriate the whole subject to himself, and thus undermine and oust his companion. It would be repugnant to a sense of refined and accurate justice." Accordingly, the chancellor sustained a bill for an account filed by the devisee sought to be ousted under the adverse title bought by his codevisee. That case was relied on as conclusive by Chancellor Cooper in Harrison v. Winston, 2 Tenn. Ch. 544, in which it was held that a beneficiary under a trust assignment for the benefit of creditors, who is a party to the suit for the execution of the trust, consenting thereto, and accepting its benefits, cannot acquire a title to any of the property, under a tax sale free from the trust; and that one who joins with him in the purchase with knowledge of his fiduciary relations will stand in no better position; and that the complainant was entitled to a decree perpetually enjoining an action of ejectment brought by the purchaser of the tax title, and declaring that the tax title inured to the benefit of the trust.

Applying the principles thus declared to the case before us, we cannot say, as was said in Crook v. Brown, 11 Md. 172, "we know of no head of equity jurisdiction under which this can be maintained." We perceive at once that upon the allegations of the bill there was fraud in the acquisition by defendant of the tax title, and that, as a result of this fraud, the title is held by the defendant in trust for the plaintiff; and we know that fraud and trusts are independent heads of equity jurisdiction. In King v. Carpenter, 37 Mich. 366, it was held that, "where a party has an equitable cause of action against another, coming within any recognized rule of equity jurisdiction, such right can be enforced in equity, whether the complainant is in possession or not." In Sheppard v. Nixon, 43 N. J. Eq. 633, 13 Atl. 617, the court said: "The exception to the rule [that the plaintiff must be in possession] is where the case presents some special ground for equitable interposition, such as fraud, accident, or mistake, requiring the setting aside or reformation of deeds or instruments of conveyance. If these elements be wanting, a bill to establish the complainant's title is an ejectment bill, pure and simple." To the same effect is Essex County Nat Bank v. Harrison, 57 N. J. Eq. 91, 40 Atl. 211. And in Security Sav. Co. v. Mackenzie, 33 Or. 209, 52 Pac. 1046, it was held that the question of possession of real estate, as required by a statute of the state, in a suit for an interest therein, was immaterial, when the relief sought is such that an equity court has jurisdiction independent of the statute. This view of the law is sustained in 17th Enc. of Pleading & Practice, p. 309, where it is said: "Where there is any other distinct head of equity jurisdiction sufficient to support the action, possession by the plaintiff is not required, but equity will retain the cause, and grant relief by quieting the title or removing clouds." In the present case fraud in the acquisition of the tax title is distinctly charged; such fraud as would raise a trust in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant has demurred, and the effect of his demurrer is to admit all matters of fact well pleaded, and we think the fraud is well pleaded. Again, in 17th Enc. of Pleading & Practice, 311, it is said that "it would seem that ejectment is an inadequate remedy in all cases where, although the plaintiff might recover possession, a void instrument or muniment of title would be left outstanding and uncanceled;" and it was so held in Redmond v. Packenham, 66 Ill. 434. Here, if the plaintiff were to recover in ejectment, the tax title would remain outstanding, and would, after such recovery, still constitute an apparent cloud upon the title whenever the property might be upon the market. Consequently, we think the demurrer should have been overruled and the bill retained.

Nothing that we have said, however, is to be understood as overruling or impairing the authority of any of the previous cases in this court, none of which presented the question now before us. In Keys v. Forrest, 90

Md. 132, 45 Atl. 22, the case was not presented on demurrer, but was heard upon bill, answer, and testimony. The bill alleged, and the answer denied, fraud in the acquisition of the tax title; and it will be seen on reference to the record that the lower court considered the allegation of fraud and found it was not sustained, and this court concurred in that finding. Had the possession by the plaintiff been essential in that case, it would have been idle to determine the question of fraud. There is therefore no conflict or inconsistency between this case and any of the earlier cases in this court. For the reasons given, the decree of the circuit court will be reversed.

Decree reversed, with costs to the appellant above and below, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

v.

Peter OLSON et al., Appts.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. The plaintiff was injured in the saloon of the defendants by a third party pouring alcohol on his foot while he was asleep, and then setting it on fire. This is an action to recover damages for injuries caused thereby. Held, that the defendants were bound to use reasonable care to protect the plaintiff, as their guest, from injury at the hands of vicious and lawless persons whom they permitted to be in their saloon.
2. The evidence sustains the verdict, to the effect that the defendants were guilty of negligence in the premises, and that the plaintiff was not.

(January 16, 1903.)

APPPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Polk County denying a new trial after verdict in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendants were alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. A. Sorley and F. C. Massee, for appellants:

If the bartender gave the alcohol to the cook knowing that he was going to pour it on respondent's foot and set it afire, then it was a wanton act on the part of the bartender, and his principal would not be liable.

Granting that the bartender had no knowledge of the commission of this particular act, yet, the appellants would be liable for the reason that they permitted such a man as this cook to be about the premises, well knowing that he had perpetrated, and might again perpetrate, such a brutal act.

Even assuming that the respondent had placed himself in a place of danger, and had failed to use reasonable care in anticipating this injury, contributory negligence cannot be imputed to him in not anticipating that the appellants would act negligently as they did, and in not providing against the consequences of such anticipated negligence.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while in the saloon of the defendants, by reason of their alleged negligence in failing to protect him from an assault by a vicious and lawless person whom they permitted to be in and about their saloon. The answer was a denial. Verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $100, and the defendants appealed from an order denying their alternative motion for judgment or a new trial.

The question presented by the record is whether the verdict is sustained by the evidence. The defendants claim that it is not, because the evidence fails to show any negligence or wrong on their part, but that it does conclusively show that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The evidence tends to show that the plaintiff for some days prior to his injury had been a guest and a patron of the defendant's saloon at East Grand Forks; that, having spent all of his money therein, he went, on the night of February 10, 1902, into the saloon to sleep, and at about 1:30 A. M. he fell asleep in his chair; that a cook in a restaurant in the rear of the saloon, belonging to a third party, came into the saloon, got alcohol from the bartender in charge of the room, poured it upon the left foot of the plaintiff, and set it on fire, whereby he was seriously injured; and, further, that the bartender knew, or might have known by the exercise of the slightest care, what the alcohol was to be used for, and could have prevented the injury to the plaintiff. Neither of the defendants was present at the time. The defendants were bound to use reasonable care to protect their guests and patrons from injury at the hands of vicious or lawless persons whom they knowingly permitted to be in and about their saloon. If they delegated this duty to their barkeeper, they are responsible for his negligence in the premises. Mastad v. Swedish Brethren, 83 Minn. 40, 53 L. R. A. 803, 85 N. W. 913. The evidence is ample to sustain a finding by the jury that the defendants were guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

The claim that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence is based upon the facts that before the plaintiff was injured, and during the same night, the cook on two separate occasions came into the saloon, and, finding a guest asleep, he got alcohol, poured it upon the feet of the sleeper, and then set fire to it; that the plaintiff witnessed the orgies, and laughed and joked with the other guests over the discomfiture of the sleepers, and said nothing to the bartender about it; that he stayed awake as long as he could, so that alcohol could not be put on his feet and fired, but he at last fell asleep. The great weight of the evidence is to the effect that the bartender not only knew of these two cases of brutality, but furnished the alcohol which the cook used. The evidence does not establish the contributory negligence of the plaintiff as a matter of law. The verdict is sustained by the evidence.

Order affirmed.

Alexander CATHCART et al., Respts.

(.....Minn.....)

*An agent who is authorized by his principal to sell or exchange the property of the latter upon specified prices and terms is in duty bound, upon learning that a more advantageous sale or exchange can be made, the facts concerning which are unknown to the principal, to communicate the same to him before making the sale as expressly authorized, and his failure to do so amounts to a fraud in law

(January 9, 1903.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County directing a verdict in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for loss alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in an exchange of property through the failure of her agent to disclose facts material to her interests. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William G. White, for appellant:

Defendant Cathcart was guilty of positive fraud upon the plaintiff, and he induced her to consent to the proposed exchange of her property by a deliberate misrepresentation of the facts.

While acting in a fiduciary capacity as agent for the plaintiff, Cathcart accepted a commission of $500 from the Pioneer Apartment House Company. This acceptance of a commission by him was a fraud upon the plaintiff in the same manner and to the same extent as if Cathcart had been himself the actual purchaser of her property. For this fraud he is liable in damages to the plaintiff.

Even if the evidence in this action does not disclose positive and actual fraud on the part of Cathcart, it conclusively appears that he concealed from the plaintiff important and material facts which it was his legal duty to impart to her. This concealment on his part, and this omission to advise the plaintiff of important and material facts affecting her interest, was a fraud upon her which makes the defendant Cathcart liable in damages in this action.

Miller v. Miller, 47 Minn. 546, 50 N. W. 612.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case are substantially as follows: Plaintiff, who resides at Buffalo, New York, was the owner of twelve houses in the city of St. Paul, all of which were clear and free of encumbrance. The houses were somewhat out of repair, and, to render them habitable, certain expenses were necessary to be incurred; and, to avoid that expense, plaintiff was anxious to exchange the houses for other property. Defendant Cathcart was her agent, and acted for her in the care and management of the houses, collecting rents, making needed repairs, placing insurance on the property, and, in a way, her general representative at St. Paul. He undertook to make an exchange of the property, and at one time had under consideration a proposition which he thought might result beneficially to plaintiff; and he induced her to come on, with her husband, from her home in Buffalo for the purpose of an examination and inspection of the property proposed in exchange. The exchange did not take place, but later on Cathcart secured from one Horeish a proposition to exchange a brick block owned by him in the city of St. Paul, which was encumbered by a mortgage of $15,000, for plaintiff's twelve houses; but there were back taxes against the block and overdue interest on the mortgage to the amount of $1,600, which plaintiff would be required to pay to effect a trade. Pending the consideration of the proposition by plaintiff,—the evidence does not show that it had been rejected,—Cathcart procured from Horeish a further contract by which the latter agreed to accept two of plaintiff's houses, free and clear of encumbrance, and the sum of $200, for his property, subject to the mortgage and the payment of the back taxes and interest. At about this time—the precise date does not clearly appear—he entered into some sort of an agreement with the Pioneer Apartment House Company, by which that concern agreed to advance all money necessary to pay the back taxes and interest against the Horeish property, over and above the sum of $1,000, in consideration of which it was to receive ten of the houses. Cathcart then informed plaintiff that he could effect an exchange of her twelve houses for the Horeish block, subject to the encumbrance, interest, and taxes (plaintiff to pay $1,000, instead of $1,600, according to the previous proposition); and he subsequently informed her that the balance of the $1,600 necessary to pay the back taxes and interest in full would be advanced by a third party, who was to receive some of the houses. She was not informed that Horeish was willing to exchange the brick block for two of her houses and the sum of $200, subject to the mortgage and the taxes and interest. She understood all along that all of her houses were to be transferred and exchanged for that property, and she was not informed at any time that the apartment house company was to receive ten of her houses for the amount of money it was to advance. She finally accepted this proposition, deeded the houses to the Pioneer Apartment House Company, and paid the $1,000 toward the back taxes and interest. The balance necessary to pay the same in full was paid by the apartment house company. The precise amount paid by it is not shown by the record, but it was probably in the neighborhood of $1,200 or $1,400, including a commission to Cathcart of the sum of $500. A verdict was directed for defendants at the trial in the court below when plaintiff rested. Defendants were not required to offer any evidence, and the facts in defense of the action, or upon which they would rely if required to defend, do not appear. This action was brought against both defendants,—Cathcart, the agent, and the apartment house company,—on the theory that those parties were in collusion, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover against both for any damage she had suffered for the failure of her agent to disclose to her all the material facts in reference to the exchange of the properties. The evidence is insufficient, perhaps, to show a collusive agreement between the defendants, though it is somewhat strange, or at least not wholly clear, that the apartment house company should receive ten of plaintiff's houses for the nominal consideration of about $1,200, when they were worth at least the sum of $4,000. But at the trial below defendants joined in a motion to direct a verdict, which motion was granted; and, if the court erred in granting the motion as to either, a reversal must apply to both, and the case will be left as though no trial had ever been had, and must be tried again as to both defendants.

The theory on which the learned court below dismissed the action was that the plaintiff had not been injured by any act on the part of defendants, and she could not recover; that, as she was willing to part with all her houses in exchange for the brick block, it was immaterial to whom they were in fact deeded,—whether to Horeish or to the apartment house company; that she lost nothing by the transaction, and has no cause of action. We think the court was in error. It is not controlling whether plaintiff was willing, or not, to make the exchange on the terms proposed to her. The action involves the duty of an agent when acting for his principal, and whether he performed that duty in accordance with the law. The principal may authorize his agent to sell or exchange his property, but it does not necessarily follow that the agent, by carrying out the specific instructions given him, fully performs his duty, and is relieved from liability. He is bound to the exercise of the most perfect good faith, and to keep his principal informed of facts coming to his knowledge affecting his rights and interests. If, after receiving instructions to sell property on certain specified terms, the agent learns that other and more advantageous terms can be obtained, it is his plain duty, and he is under every legal and moral obligation, to communicate the facts to the principal, that he may act advisedly in the premises. As stated by Chief Justice Gilfillan in Hegenmyer v. Marks, 37 Minn. 6, 32 N. W. 785: "Upon this contract of agency [we] . . . are of opinion . . . that when . . . [the agent] learned a fact affecting the value of the property, and of which fact he knew . . . [the principal] was ignorant when she fixed the price, and if . . . [the agent] had reason to believe that, had she 60 L. R. A.

known the fact, she would have fixed a higher price, . . . then good faith towards his principal required of him, and it was his legal duty, to disclose the fact to her before he proceeded to sell, so that she might, if so disposed, fix the selling price in accordance with the actual condition of things. This being so, his selling upon the basis of the price first fixed, without disclosing to her the fact he had learned, was, of course, a fraud on her." That case is in accord with the unanimous voice of the authorities. Mechem, Agency, § 531; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1069; Arrott v. Brown, 6 Whart. 9; Devall v. Burbridge, 4 Watts & S. 305; Harvey v. Turner, 4 Rawle, 223; Tilleny v. Wolverton, 46 Minn. 256, 48 N. W. 908. Plaintiff was not informed at any time prior to the closing up of the transaction that she could obtain the brick block for two of her houses and the payment of about $1,600 in money, and the question arises whether defendant Cathcart should have communicated that fact to her. If, as now claimed by plaintiff, that bargain was a better one for her,—more beneficial in its results,—it was the clear duty of Cathcart to communicate the facts to her; and if, by his failure to do so, plaintiff was damaged, she is entitled to recover whatever loss she actually suffered. Whether defendant did fail in his duty in this respect is, of course, a question of fact, which we do not attempt to pass upon; but we do hold that the evidence offered by plaintiff on the trial was such as to require a finding on the question by the trial court, or the submission of the same to a jury. The measure of her relief would be the actual damage suffered in consequence of defendant's failure of duty. The case must therefore be reversed.

It was also claimed by plaintiff that she was entitled to the commission received by defendant Cathcart, her agent, and that the court erred in holding otherwise. It appears, without dispute, that Cathcart did receive from the apartment house company a commission of $500 for his services in effecting the exchange of properties. We do not concur with plaintiff's counsel, however, that plaintiff is entitled to any portion of it. The evidence disclosed by the record fairly shows that plaintiff contemplated that defendant should receive some sort of a commission, and this is clearly shown by the correspondence between the parties. As a condition to the acceptance of the final offer to exchange the properties, she distinctly stated that it must include all commissions to be received or claimed by Cathcart. It therefore appears from the record that Cathcart was entitled to negotiate for and accept and receive a commission for his services in the premises, and this with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff. And, having done so with her express consent, he is entitled to retain the same.

Order reversed and new trial granted.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

CITIZENS' STATE BANK of Newman Grove, Nebraska, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Lars I. NORE.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. In this state a statute will not be construed so as to make a negotiable instrument void in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, unless the act specifically so declares.
2. A note given for medical services by an unlicensed practitioner may be recovered by a bona fide purchaser, notwithstanding the provisions of article 1, chap. 55, of the Compiled Statutes, prohibiting the practice of medicine without a license.

(January 8, 1903.)

ERROR to the District Court for Boone County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Needham & Doten, for plaintiff in error:

Mere illegality of consideration, unless the note is declared void by statute, does not affect recovery thereon by a bona fide holder for value.

Smith v. Columbus State Bank, 9 Neb. 31, 1 N. W. 893; Wortendyke v. Meehan, 9 Neb. 221, 2 N. W. 339; Darst v. Backus, 18 Neb. 231, 24 N. W. 681; Coakley v. Christie, 20 Neb. 509, 31 N. W. 73.

Even in states where the statute expressly makes a note void where the consideration is illegal, a bona fide holder for value can recover where the note has nothing on it indicative of the illegality of the consideration.

Sondheim v. Gilbert, 117 Ind. 71, 5 L. R. A. 432, 18 N. E. 687; New v. Walker, 108 Ind. 365, 58 Am. Rep. 40, 9 N. E. 387; Crawford v. Spencer, 92 Mo. 498, 4 S. W. 713.

Even if the court should assume that fraud at the inception of the note has been proved, as the fraud alleged to have been practised upon the defendant was not in relation to the note he executed, such fraud would not prevent recovery on the part of the plaintiff as a bona fide holder for value.

Dinsmore v. Stimbert, 12 Neb. 433, 11 N. W. 872.

Before the defendant can interpose the defense of failure of consideration, it must first attack plaintiff's bona fides, which it failed to do in any particular.

Mr. H. C. Vail, for defendant in error:

The note and the contract constitute one and the same transaction. The agreement to pay for medical services, as evidenced by the note, was just as much part of the contract as though made in any other form, and must all be taken as one transaction.

Kittle v. De Lamater, 3 Neb. 325; Larson v. First Nat. Bank, 62 Neb. 303, 87 N. W. 18.

Notes made in violation of the provisions of chap. 55, Comp. Stat. 1901, regulating the practice of medicine, etc., in this state are absolutely void. When a statute expressly, or by necessary implication, declares an instrument void, it gathers no vitality by its circulation, in respect to the parties executing it, even though it be held by a bona fide holder, without notice.

Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 197, 807; Larson v. First Nat. Bank, 62 Neb. 303, 87 N. W. 18; Snoddy v. American Nat. Bank, 88 Tenn. 573, 7 L. R. A. 705, 13 S. W. 127.

Lobingier, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action on a promissory note payable six months after date, given by the defendant in error to one F. N. Brett, for medical services rendered to the former's wife. At the time of the execution of the note, and as a part of the same transaction, Brett executed and delivered to defendant in error the following instrument:

American Medical and Surgical Institute.
For the Treatment of All Chronic, Private and Nervous Diseases, both Medical and Surgical.

Albion, Nebr., Sept. 7, 1898.

Received of L. Nore twenty-two dollars, for which I hereby agree to treat L. Nore's wife for three months, until cured; to furnish medicine and apparatus deemed necessary by me to bring about the best possible results; and to return note at end of specified time if no cure is effected; and to give an extension of time if needed. ($22.00.)

F. N. Brett.

On the day after its receipt, Brett went to the banking house of plaintiff in error at Newman Grove, and negotiated a sale of the note, through the cashier, at a discount of 10 per cent. Brett was a stranger in the town, and the cashier had seen him only once before, but there is no evidence that the cashier or any of plaintiff in error's officers or agents had any knowledge or notice of the purpose for which the note was given. The note not being paid at maturity, plaintiff in error brought this action thereon; and defendant in error answered, alleging that Brett was not a licensed physician, that the execution of the note had been induced by fraud, and that the consideration had failed. On the trial the county clerk testified that his office contained no record, as provided by article 1, chap. 55, of the Compiled Statutes, of any certificate authorizing Brett to practise medicine, and no evidence was offered indicating that such certificate had ever been issued. After the introduction of evidence, plaintiff moved for a peremptory instruction, which was refused. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, upon which judgment was rendered, and plaintiff brings the case here by petition in error.

Defendant in error relies principally on Larson v. First Nat. Bank, 62 Neb. 303, 87 N. W. 18. In that case the statute under which a bona fide purchaser was denied recovery on a note provided that any conveyance of lands allotted to the Indians, "or any contract made touching the same, . . . shall be absolutely null and void." In the case at bar the statute contains no express declaration of this kind. The legislation which defendant in error invokes to support his position may be summarized as follows: Article 1, chap. 55, of the Compiled Statutes makes it the duty of all persons desiring to practise "medicine, surgery, or obstetrics" in this state to obtain a certificate from the state board of health, and to file the same with the clerk of the county in which they desire to practise. Section 15 provides: "No person shall recover in any court in this state any sum of money whatever for any medical, surgical or obstetrical services unless he shall have complied with the provisions of this act, and is one of the persons authorized by this act to be registered as a physician." Section 7 declares it to be unlawful for any person to practise in any of these lines without first obtaining and registering such certificate; and § 16 makes it a misdemeanor to so practise, and imposes a fine therefor. It will be seen that none of these provisions declares a contract for medical services, by an unlicensed practitioner, to be void. Indeed, while § 15 provides that "no person shall recover," the latter part of the section indicates that this prohibition is limited to the practitioner himself.

It is urged that, by making the unlicensed practice of medicine a crime, the legislature has, by implication, declared void all contracts growing out of such practice; and we are cited to Snoddy v. American Nat. Bank, 88 Tenn. 573, 7 L. R. A. 705, 13 S. W. 127. There a contract to deal in futures was held to be included within the statute against gaming, and the court said: "By the great weight of authority, notes given in consideration of a contract against morals, public policy, and public statutes are void in any hands;" and then added: "Perhaps there are no exceptions when, in addition, the transaction is also criminal." But in Sondheim v. Gilbert, 117 Ind. 71, 5 L. R. A. 432, 18 N. E. 687, and Crawford v. Spencer, 92 Mo. 498, 4 S. W. 713, the gaming statute was held not to apply to such transactions. There are, indeed, authorities elsewhere which tend to support the contention of defendant in error. More than two centuries ago, Lord Holt said, in the leading case of Bartlett v. Vinor, Carthew, 252: "Every contract made for or about any matter or thing which is prohibited and made unlawful by any statute is a void contract, though the statute itself doth not mention that it shall be so." In Cope v. Rowlands, 2 Mees. & W. 157, Baron Parke observes: "It is perfectly settled that where the contract which the plaintiff seeks to enforce, be it express or implied, is expressly or by implication, forbidden by the common or statute law, no court will lend its assistance to give it effect." See also Columbia Bank & Bridge Co. v. Haldeman, 7 Watts & S. 233, 42 Am. Dec. 220; Holt v. Green, 73 Pa. 198, 13 Am. Rep. 737; Johnston v. McConnell, 65 Ga. 129; Conley v. Sims, 71 Ga. 161. Were the question res nova therefore, in this jurisdiction, we might be inclined to regard defendant in error's argument as entitled to great weight. But the question is not res nova here. The precise question was before this court in Smith v. Columbus State Bank, 9 Neb. 31, 1 N. W. 893, and decided adversely to that contention. The case last cited was an action on a note whose consideration was the compounding of a crime,—an act forbidden and made a misdemeanor by § 177 of the Criminal Code. It was contended there, as here, "that, when a statute inflicts a penalty for doing an act, such act is unlawful, though not in terms prohibited or declared to be illegal. And any contract, the consideration of which is founded upon the doing of such act, is void." This court, however, adopted the contrary view, and in doing so overruled, on that point, Kittle v. De Lamater, 3 Neb. 325; and Cobb, J., in delivering the opinion, said: "In my view of the law, in order to prevent a recovery in the case stated in the above exception, the case must come within some statute expressly declaring notes given for such consideration void." This case was cited and followed in Wortendyke v. Meehan, 9 Neb. 221, 2 N. W. 339, and has not since been qualified or overruled. Indeed, we are not asked to overrule it now, nor would we be inclined to do so. After having stood for almost a quarter of a century as the law of this state, we think it far better to adhere to its doctrine than to unsettle the law by adopting a different rule, even though it might be more in accordance with the weight of authority elsewhere.

Much is said concerning the policy of the statute, and the evils which are likely to result from allowing contracts to be enforced which are contrary to its purpose and spirit. We fully recognize the importance of such legislation as the medical act. It embodies a fixed and time-honored policy, of the most vital concern to the state and its people. But it may well be questioned whether the evils consequent upon the free circulation of the notes given for services of unlicensed practitioners could be more serious than the derangement of business resulting from a rule that would make all such notes void in the hands of innocent purchasers. It must be remembered that instruments like these have no earmarks, and, when once it is understood that a limited and indistinguishable class of them is deprived of the virtues of negotiability, a step is taken toward casting the taint of suspicion upon all. Moreover, the medical act has never, so far as we have been able to ascertain, been construed to have that effect upon negotiable paper. Legislation of this character is not recent, or even modern. As early as 1511, Parliament passed an act requiring practitioners of surgery in London and vicinity to be examined and licensed by the college of surgeons, and imposing a penalty for non-compliance. In Gremare v. Le Clerc Bois Valon (1809) 2 Campb. 144, this ancient statute was set up as a defense to an action for surgical services, but it was held insufficient, even as between the parties, and recovery was allowed. From the standpoint of public policy, as well as that of stare decisis, we are of the opinion that the medical act furnished no defense as against plaintiff in error in this action. And, since the other defenses were such as would be valid only between the original parties, we think the court should have directed a verdict as asked; and we recommend that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

Hastings and Kirkpatrick, CC., concur.

Per Curiam: For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Hampshire

v.

Samuel H. JACKSON.

(71 N. H. 552.)

1. Whether or not a statute requiring the attendance of children at school is "wholesome and reasonable" is a legislative, and not a judicial, question, where the legislature has constitutional power to pass all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws as they may judge for the benefit and welfare of the state.
2. The natural right of parental dominion does not render unconstitutional a statute requiring children to be sent to school.
3. A parent cannot be required to procure the consent of the school board to his child's remaining away from school to protect himself from the penalty of the compulsory education law, if it is, apparently, reasonably necessary to the child's life that it be kept out of school.

(December 4, 1902.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Carroll County which resulted in his conviction for violating the school law. Sustained.

Defendant's daughter was in feeble health, and he took her from school, believing, in good faith, that her attendance at, and confinement in, school would seriously injure her reason and health, upon advice of a physician. He did not obtain the consent of the school board to such acts, although he informed some members of the board of his intention to keep the child from school.

The further facts appear in the opinion.

NOTE.—For another case in this series as to constitutionality of statute requiring attendance of children at school, see also, State v. Bailey (Ind.) 59 L. R. A. 435.

Mr. Arthur L. Foote for defendant.

Mr. Sewall W. Abbott, for the State: Section 14, chap. 61, Stat. 1901, is directly in line with the authority exercised by the legislature during the existence of the present Constitution.

In connection with the children of this state, only two things are to be considered; namely, what is for the best good of the child, and the welfare of the state. To these the rights and privileges of parents are secondary.

Mercein v. People, 25 Wend. 64; State v. Scott, 30 N. H. 274.

The first duty of a parent towards a child is that of education.

Schouler, Dom. Rel. 5th ed. § 235.

Remick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The motion to quash the complaint on the ground that the statute upon which it was founded is unconstitutional was properly denied. The statute is as follows: "Every person having the custody and control of a child between the ages of eight and fourteen years, residing in a school district in which a public school is annually taught, shall cause such child to attend the public school all the time such school is in session, unless the child shall be excused by the school board of the district because his physical or mental condition is such as to prevent his attendance for the period required, or because he was instructed in the English language in a private school approved by the school board, for a number of weeks equal to that in which the public school was in session, in the common English branches, or, having acquired those branches, in other more advanced studies. Any person who does not comply with the requirements of this section shall be fined $10 for the first offence, and $20 for every subsequent offence." Pub. Stat. chap. 93, § 14; Laws 1901, chap. 61, § 1. That education of the citizen is essential to the stability of the state is a proposition too plain for discussion. As a mere generalization of our own, it would command immediate and universal assent. But it rests upon a firmer foundation. The Constitution declares that "knowledge and learning, generally diffused through a community," are essential to the preservation of a free government. Const. art. 82. Nor does it stop with this abstract statement. It provides that "it shall be the duty of the legislators and magistrates, in all future periods of this government, to cherish the interest of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries and public schools." Const. art. 82. Showing that something more than a mere sentimental interest was intended by the injunction "to cherish the interests of literature," etc., this court has said: "The clause in the Constitution . . . in regard to the encouragement of literature, in connection with the early legislation on the subject, . . . shows conclusively, if any such evidence were needed, that the framers of the Constitution, as well as their contemporaries in the legislature, regarded the subject of education as one of public concern, to be cherished, regulated, and controlled by the state; and the great multitude and variety of acts passed since show that no different view has ever been entertained, . . . The Constitution enjoins the duty in very general and comprehensive terms on magistrates and legislators as one of paramount public importance." Ladd, J., in Farnum's Petition, 51 N. H. 376, 378, 379. It thus being the constitutional duty of the legislature to diffuse knowledge and learning through the community, it must be within the constitutional power of the legislature to enforce school attendance to that end. But the right is not left to implication. "Full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said general court, from time to time, to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, ordinances, directions, and instructions, either with penalties or without, so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution as they may judge for the benefit and welfare of this state, and for the governing and ordering thereof." Const. art. 5. Whether the statute in question is "wholesome and reasonable," within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution last referred to, is a question over which the court has no control. "The ample authority conferred upon the legislature to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, and statutes, which it shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the commonwealth, necessarily invests that department of the government with the right of determining conclusively upon the propriety and reasonableness of all provisions which are not in some way repugnant to the Constitution." Com. v. Williams, 6 Gray, 1, 3; Orr v. Quinby, 54 N. H. 500, 60 I. R. A.

608. "The judiciary can only arrest the execution of a statute when it conflicts with the Constitution. It cannot run a race of opinions upon points of right, reason, and expediency with the lawmaking power." Cooley, Const. Lim. 201. "We have not to inquire into the policy of the law, or, if the purpose be admitted to be public, whether the supposed public good to be attained was sufficient to justify the legislature. . . . All mere questions of expediency, and all questions respecting the just operation of the law, within the limits prescribed by the Constitution, were settled by the legislature when it was enacted. The court have only to place the statute and the Constitution side by side, and say whether there is such a conflict between the two that they cannot stand together." Ladd, J., in Perry v. Keene, 56 N. H. 514, 530.

Being without brief or argument from the defendant, we are not advised upon what ground he asserts the unconstitutionality of the act. Certainly, it is not unconstitutional, merely because, in obedience to the mandate of the Constitution, and for "the preservation of a free government," it interferes in some measure with the natural right of parental dominion. "When men enter into a state of society, they surrender up some of their natural rights to that society, in order to insure the protection of others" (Bill of Rights, art. 3), and subject themselves to innumerable restrictions and regulations for the common good (State v. United States & C. Exp. Co. 60 N. H. 219, 253, 254). But the surrender is not absolute. There are "certain natural, essential, and inherent rights" reserved by the Constitution, and of which the citizen cannot be deprived by legislative enactment; rights "paramount to all governmental authority," and which no legislation can invalidate or abridge (Wooster v. Plymouth, 62 N. H. 193, 200; State v. Jackman, 69 N. H. 318, 42 L. R. A. 438, 41 Atl. 347); rights higher and earlier in origin "than the Constitution or the common law, not superseded by those temporal and finite systems, but sustained and enforced by their declaration and sanction of the highest, primary, eternal, and infinite law of nature." (Aldrich v. Wright, 53 N. H. 398, 400, 16 Am. Rep. 339). Thus, "as a fundamental and essential right, the defense of life, liberty, and property is . . . put, by a special guaranty, above the altering and repealing power of the legislature." Aldrich v. Wright, 53 N. H. 398, 399, 16 Am. Rep. 339. And so it was held that one might lawfully kill a mink in defense of his geese, notwithstanding the existence of a statute providing that "no person shall in any way destroy . . . any mink, . . . under penalty of $10 for each animal so destroyed;" that the owner's "natural, common-law, and constitutional right of defense existed in full force and vigor, not repealed, nor in the slightest degree impaired or modified, by the statute;" that "he could exercise that right as fully and freely as if the statute had not been enacted." Aldrich v. Wright, 53 N. H. 398, 399, 400, 16 Am. Rep. 339. For the preservation and propagation of fur-bearing animals, in the interest of society at large, the legislature had the undoubted right to prohibit their destruction, within a certain season, for purposes of sport, profit, or the like; but they could not repeal the constitutional right of defense. Ibid.

If statutory prohibitions and penalties are thus impotent to take away the inherent right of defense when invoked in behalf of one's geese, surely they must be so when the right is resorted to in defense of one's own life, or that of his child. For the diffusion of knowledge and learning through the community, the legislature have the undoubted right, as against the mere will and pleasure of the parent, to require him to send his child to school; but they cannot repeal the natural, common-law, and constitutional right of the parent "to do whatever apparently is reasonably necessary to be done in defense" of the life of his child. If it was, apparently, reasonably necessary, in defense of his geese, that the owner should then and there destroy the mink, the legislature could not constitutionally require him to first get permission of the game warden. So, if, apparently, reasonably necessary for a parent to keep or withdraw his child from school, in defense of the child's life, without first applying for excuse by the school board, the legislature cannot compel him to first make such application. Of course, in case of complaint against a parent for withdrawing or detaining his child from school without excuse from the school board, the burden would be upon the accused to show that what he did was, apparently, reasonably necessary in defense of the child's life. Failing, he would be amenable to the statute. Succeeding, he would be exempt from its operation. But upon this question of reasonable necessity he would be entitled to the judgment of his peers. A parent cannot be required to imperil the life of his child by delays incident to an application to the school board, before he can lawfully do what is, apparently, reasonably necessary for its protection.

The letter of the statute in question prohibits the parent from keeping or withdrawing his child from school without consent of the school board, even when, apparently, reasonably necessary to do so in order to preserve the child's life. To this extent the statute, taken literally, contravenes the constitutional right of defense to which we have referred. But, "as the legislature could not abolish the right, they were not presumed to have attempted an impossibility, or to have intended to pass a void act; and the statute is held valid by giving it a construction compatible with the Constitution, making it applicable only to those cases to which it can be constitutionally applied." Aldrich v. Wright, 53 N. H. 398, 399, 16 Am. Rep. 339. To illustrate: One whose child is stricken by some malady, making detention from school reasonably necessary in defense of the child's life, breaks no law of this jurisdiction by hastening for doctors and nurses instead of to the board of education. On the other hand, if he keeps his child from school merely to suit his own or his child's pleasure, or for any other reason not within the exceptions provided by the act or guaranteed by the Constitution, he must suffer the penalty. Indeed, as thus limited, the law is a decided invasion of the parental domain; but, being repugnant to no provision of the Constitution, and being for "the benefit and welfare of this state, and for the governing and ordering thereof," the citizen, in fulfillment of the social compact, must yield submission and obedience. School Board v. Jackson, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 502; Burdick v. Babcock, 31 Iowa, 562, 568-571; Donahoe v. Richards, 38 Me. 379, 391, 395-397, 61 Am. Dec. 256; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 235. The statute requires attendance "all the time . . . school is in session," and, as would appear, makes no provision for excuse excepting on account of the physical and mental condition of the child. Literally construed, the parent incurs its penalty who keeps his child from school a single day for any other cause, however imperative, even though it be to attend the mother's funeral. It is inconceivable that the legislature intended the act to have such sweeping effect. Chapter 93, § 14, Pub. Stat., required the parent to cause his child, if between the ages of eight and sixteen years, to attend school twelve weeks in each year, six of which should be consecutive. Under this statute, we are not aware that it was suggested that mere occasional and temporary absences could not be permitted by the school board for other causes than the physical or mental condition of the child. The statute in question amended that statute by substituting the entire school year for twelve weeks as the compulsory attendance period, and made it apply to children between eight and fourteen instead of between eight and sixteen years of age. In this view, it is reasonable to suppose that the words "all the time such school is in session" in the present statute, like the words "twelve weeks" in the statute which preceded it, were used for the purpose of establishing a compulsory attendance period in a general sense, and had no reference to occasional and temporary absence, not inconsistent with the general design already indicated; but left such absence subject to any reasonable regulations the governing board might see fit to establish. Pub. Stat. chap. 93, § 6. See Laws 1901, chap. 16, § 7.

2. "The defendant offered evidence to show that Alice was in feeble health; that he took her from school believing in good faith that her attendance at and confinement in school would seriously injure her reason and health; that he so informed two members of the school board before he removed her from school, and offered evidence of a physician that her confinement in the school would greatly endanger her life; all of which evidence was excluded, and the de-defendant excepted." This evidence tended to show that the action of the defendant in withdrawing Alice from school was, apparently, reasonably necessary in defense of her life. It also tended to show an attempt by the defendant to comply with the law. The law is not adapted nor intended for formal action. Upon the evidence as stated, in the absence of objection or request for further action by the school officers, the defendant may have been justified in understanding that the school board did not object, and the jury may find that the child was in fact excused. It may also be found upon the evidence that the child was so unfit for school that the only reasonable result of any investigation by the school board must have been her excuse from attendance. The statute was intended to secure the attendance of children who were able, not to confer arbitrary power upon the school board. To require a parent whose child was confined in bed during the year to apply for and secure an excuse, would be an idle formality. Such was not the purpose or intent of the law. The evidence was competent, and its exclusion was error.

Exception sustained. All concur.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

J. Aspinwall HODGE et al.
v.

UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION
et al., Appts.

(.....N. J.)

- *1. At a meeting of the stockholders of a corporation, owners of shares are under no disability to vote because they are also directors of the corporation. They do not vote in their fiduciary capacity, but, like other stockholders, in the right of the shares held by them.
2. At a duly convened meeting of stockholders they may lawfully enter into, or authorize, a contract between the company and a third party, in which directors are personally interested, if it is done by them with notice of such interest.
3. The general doctrine is well established in this state that facts known, which are sufficient to put a party upon inquiry, are sufficient to charge him with all knowledge he would have acquired by a proper inquiry in the ordinary course of business.
4. The rule that directors cannot lawfully enter into a contract in the benefit of which even one of their number participates without the knowledge and consent of the stockholders is the settled law of this state.
5. Such a contract is voidable at the option of the corporation, but is not void per se. When the facts are disclosed to the stockholders, it may be subsequently ratified by them.
6. When the by-laws of a corporation, adopted by the stockholders in pursuance of authority given by the act of incorporation, provide that a majority vote at a stockholders' meeting shall be binding on the corporation, every shareholder will be bound by all acts and proceedings within the scope of the power and authority conferred by the charter, which shall be approved or sanctioned by the vote of a majority of such shareholders, duly taken and ascertained according to law.

7. The act of incorporation of the United States Steel Corporation requires the corporation to pay to the preferred shareholders a yearly dividend at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, in quarterly payments. By the terms of the act of 1902 said corporation cannot take advantage of its provisions, unless it shall have continuously declared and paid dividends at the rate of 7 per cent on the preferred stock for the period of at least one year next preceding a meeting called to avail itself of the act. The meeting was held May 19, 1902. A dividend of 1½ per cent was declared and paid for the quarter ending July 1, 1901, and a like dividend for each of the quarters ending October 1, 1901, January 1, 1902, and April 1, 1902. Held, that this was a compliance with the act of 1902.

APPPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court enjoining them from carrying out a scheme for the reduction of capital stock. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Francis Lynde Stetson, Charles L. Corbin, Richard V. Lindabury, and William D. Guthrie, for appellants:

The statutory period began on April 1, 1901, because that is the date when the dividend period of the steel corporation commenced to run, and the date from which the obligation with respect to the preferred and cumulative features of the stock must be calculated.

As the statute is silent as to the point or event from which the period must be computed, resort must be had to the principles of interpretation.

The language of the statutory condition covers "the period of at least one year next preceding the meeting" held on May 19, 1902. During this year the record shows that the steel corporation declared and paid four

It cannot be maintained that the statute requires five quarterly, three half-yearly, or two yearly, dividends to show one year's continuous solvency or the payment of one year's continuous dividends.

The bankers' contract was entirely separate and distinct, and was not made dependent upon the vote for the reduction or the issue of bonds. Whenever stock is to be increased or decreased, directors, who must necessarily be stockholders, are more or less personally interested; but such indirect interest does not affect their action upon the question of reduction or increase.

The contract is unequal and unfair to stockholders.

The bankers' contract provides for an equal opportunity to each preferred stockholder, for a period of thirty days after a date to be specified, to subscribe for bonds in preferred stock to the extent of 40 per cent of his holding; but in saying that such subscription shall not in any instance exceed 40 per cent, the qualification is introduced, "except at the discretion of the bankers." The scheme, by the mere existence of such a power in the bankers, violates the fundamental requirement of equality between stockholders.

It is not even alleged in the answer that the dividends had been continuously earned for a period of at least one year preceding May 19, 1902.

A director interested in the syndicate, as eleven out of twenty-four are admitted to have been, cannot be counted as a member of the board. Nor can an interested director take any part in the meeting, or be counted as part of a quorum.

Mr. J. Aspinwall Hodge also for appellees.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The subject-matter of this appeal is an order granted by the court of chancery at the instance of the complainants, restraining the defendants from executing, issuing, delivering, or receiving any bond or mortgage, under certain resolutions of the stockholders of the United States Steel Corporation, passed May 19, 1902, providing for the reduction of $200,000,000 of its preferred stock, and the retirement thereof out of bonds or the proceeds of bonds. Three of the complainants in the bill as originally filed voluntarily withdrew from the suit. The remaining complainants are Hodge, Smith, and Curtis. Hodge owns 100 shares, acquired by him before the contract in question was made. Smith owns 200 shares acquired since that time from a holder who assented to the contract. Curtis, so far as appears, owns no stock. The vice chancellor properly held that the case must be considered as based wholly upon the rights of Hodge as a shareholder. The steel corporation was organized under the general corporation act of this state (Revision 1896) on the 25th day of February, 1901, and the certificate of incorporation was filed on that day. On the 1st day of April, 1901, an amended certificate of incorporation was filed, which provided, among other things, for an authorized capital of $1,100,000,000, of which $550,000,000 was to be preferred stock, divided into 5,500,000 shares of the par value of $100 each, and a like number of shares of common stock of the par value of $100 each. As required by § 18 of the general corporation act, the amended certificate of incorporation stated that "the holders of the preferred stock shall be entitled to receive when and as declared, from the surplus or net profits of the corporation, yearly dividends, at the rate of 7 per centum per annum, and no more, payable quarterly on dates to be fixed by the by-laws." The by-laws of the company provide as follows: Article 5, § 5: "The dates for the declaration of dividends upon the preferred, and upon the common stock, of the company, shall be the days by these by-laws fixed for the regular monthly meetings of the board of directors in the months of April, July, October, and January in each year, on which days the board of directors shall declare what, if any, dividends shall be declared upon the preferred stock and the common stock or either of such stocks. The dividends on the preferred stock shall be payable quarterly on the sixth Wednesday next after the several dates of the declaration thereof."

The board of directors of said corporation, having resolved that it would be advisable to decrease the capital stock of the corporation to the extent of 2,000,000 shares, and to retire them by means of an issue of bonds, called a meeting of the stockholders to be held on the 19th day of May, 1902, in pursuance of and as required by § 27 of the general corporation law and by the act of 1902, for the purpose of voting upon the proposed plan for the purchase and retirement of that amount of preferred stock and the issue of 5 per cent bonds. Prior to the notice of this meeting the directors had entered into a tentative contract with Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co., bankers, under date of April 1, 1902, by which said bankers agreed with the steel corporation that \$100,000,000 face value of the new bonds would be taken and paid for, of which \$80,000,000 would be paid for by a like amount of preferred stock taken at par, and \$20,000,000 would be paid in cash. To guarantee the performance of this contract, a syndicate was formed by J. P. Morgan & Co., the members of which actually deposited with that firm \$80,000,000 of preferred stock to be used in the performance of the contract. The effect and purport of this agreement is that the bankers agreed to buy from the steel corporation at least \$100,000,000 of 5 per cent bonds, and to pay therefor \$20,000,000 in cash and \$80,000,000 in preferred stock at par, with an option to purchase the remaining bonds if the stockholders did not do so; and in consideration of this undertaking the bankers were to receive a commission of 4 per cent on \$100,000,000, and contingently a commission of 4 per cent on any additional amount that might be taken at par by the stockholders or the bankers. This contract with the bankers was to be subject to the approval of the stockholders. At the stockholders' meeting on the 19th of May, 1902, duly convened, the resolution to retire the preferred stock and the resolution to adopt the bankers' contract were separate and distinct, and were voted upon and passed as separate and distinct resolutions. The shareholders could have adopted the first and rejected the latter. There was in attendance at the meeting, in person or by proxy, over 73 per cent of the outstanding preferred stock, and over 78 per cent of the outstanding common stock. More than 99.83 per cent of the stockholders at such meeting, present either in person or by proxy, voted in favor of both resolutions and only $\frac{1}{100}$ of 1 per cent voted against them.

The by-laws of the corporation contained the following provision: "The board of directors, in its discretion, may submit any contract or act for approval or ratification at any annual meeting of the stockholders, or at any meeting of the stockholders called for the purpose of considering any such act or contract, and any act or contract that shall be approved or ratified by the vote of the holders of a majority of the capital stock of the company which is represented in person or by proxy at such meeting: Provided, that a lawful quorum of stockholders be there represented in person or by proxy, shall be as valid and as binding upon the corporation and upon all the stockholders, as though it had been approved or ratified by every stockholder of the corporation." This by-law can not amplify the powers of the corporation, or operate to validate any act ultra vires of the corporation, but it enabled the stockholders by a majority vote to ratify any contract which the entire body of stockholders or the corporation might lawfully make. Both resolutions therefore received more than the vote required by the 27th section of the corporation act and by the by-law of the company. If all the shareholders had intended to convert their preferred shares into 5 per cent bonds, they would, of course, have voted for the conversion resolution, and have rejected the bankers' contract. In a scheme involving such an enormous amount of capital, and affecting thousands of shareholders, it could not reasonably have been supposed that all would prefer to accept the 5 per cent bonds, and it was, therefore, the exercise of a prudent foresight that prompted them, in order to assure the successful execution of the plan, to secure the co-operation of bankers who could command millions of capital. When the subject-matter of this litigation was before this court at the June term, 1902, in the case of Berger v. United States Steel Corp. 63 N. J. Eq. 809, 53 Atl. 68, it was expressly declared: First. That the act concerning corporations, as revised in 1896, authorizes corporations formed under it to retire shares of its preferred stock purchased with bonds or the proceeds of bonds issued for that purpose, the provisions of §§ 27 and 29 being complied with. Second. The manner in which a duly authorized plan is to be carried through is part of the business of the corporation, and, in the absence of fraud or bad faith, is not the subject of judicial control to any greater extent than other business of the corporation. The court cannot substitute its judgment for that of the directors and majority stockholders, and say that a less expensive plan could be successfully adopted. These questions, therefore, are not open to controversy in this case, in so far as the cost or wisdom of the plan is concerned.

There is an entire absence in the case of anything to show a taint of fraud, or an attempt to conceal from the shareholders any fact which should have influenced their action. That the entire proceeding was conducted with good faith, without concealment, and with fairness to both parties, is evinced by the fact that during all the litigation which has ensued, under the promotion of a share owner who did not attend the meeting, not one of the vast number of shareholders who were present in person or by proxy, comprising men of great business capacity, interested to the extent of millions of dollars in the conversion plan, has questioned its propriety, or expressed a desire, so far as appears, to recede from it. The contract with the bankers was submitted to the stockholders without comment, and, as stated in the resolutions, of which a copy was tendered to the stockholders, "was not finally to become or to be operative until after approval thereof by the stockholders in special meeting assembled."

The first reason to be considered, upon which the complainants rely to maintain their injunction, is that the action of the directors in passing the resolutions for the plan of conversion and approving the bankers' contract was fraudulent and void, because fifteen or more of the twenty-four members of the board of directors were interested in the syndicate which was formed to assist in carrying out the bankers' contract, and to share its profits; and that the plan was never properly and legally ratified by the two-thirds vote of the stockholders required by the corporation act, inasmuch as the votes upon the stock held or controlled by the bankers' firm and members of the syndicate must be counted to make up the necessary two thirds, and without those votes 60 L. R. A.

the requisite number did not approve the reduction of stock. The insistence that the votes of members of the syndicate who were also directors of the company cannot be lawfully counted in order to constitute a two-thirds vote in favor of the resolution to reduce the amount of preferred stock is without any foundation in reason or in law. They voted upon that resolution, not as directors, not in their fiduciary capacity, but solely in the right of the shares of stock held by them. A most valuable privilege, which attaches to the ownership of stock in a corporation, is the right to vote upon it at any meeting of stockholders. As to that resolution, considered by itself, as stockholders, they owed no greater duty to their stockholders than those stockholders owed to them. Like other stockholders, they had a right to be influenced by what they conceived to be for their own interest, and they cannot lawfully be denied that right, nor can it be limited or circumscribed by the fact that they occupied the position of directors in the company. With respect to the bankers' contract a very different rule applies. The rule that directors cannot lawfully enter into a contract in the benefit of which even one of their number participates without the knowledge and consent of the stockholders is so firmly entrenched in our jurisprudence that it is not open to debate. It is emphasized and enforced in the following, among many other cases: Staats v. Bergen, 17 N. J. Eq. 554; State, Winans, Prosecutor, v. Crane, 36 N. J. L. 394; State, Stroud, Prosecutor, v. Consumers' Water Co. 56 N. J. L. 422, 28 Atl. 578; Gardner v. Butler, 30 N. J. Eq. 702; Guild v. Parker, 43 N. J. L. 430; Stewart v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 38 N. J. L. 505; State, West Jersey Traction Co., Prosecutor, v. Camden Public Works, 56 N. J. L. 431, 29 Atl. 163. The rule is imbedded in our jurisprudence, and it cannot be too strongly stated or too vigorously applied. But in the cases cited the contract was made by the trustee without the knowledge or consent of the cestui que trust, and without subsequent ratification or adoption by which the vice in it could be cured. The object of the rule is to prevent directors from secretly using their fiduciary position for their own emolument, and not to impair the right of stockholders to enter into any lawful engagement with a full disclosure of the facts. In Stewart v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 38 N. J. L. 522, Mr. Justice Dixon, in delivering the opinion of this court, says: "After an examination of all the cases cited, and such others as I have found, and a careful consideration of the principle, and the results of regarding and disregarding it, I have come to the conviction that the true legal rule is that such a contract is not void, but voidable, to be avoided at the option of the cestui que trust, exercised within a reasonable time. I can see no further safe modification or relaxation of the principle than this." It is a settled rule of corporation law that the personal interest of directors renders a transaction voidable at the option of the stockholders, and not void per se.

Under the declaration of this court in the case last cited the shareholders may, within a reasonable time after the disclosure to them of the interest of a director, elect to avoid the contract; but, if an unreasonable time is allowed to elapse without exercising such option, during which the position of directors becomes so changed that it would be inequitable to vacate the engagement, equity would refuse to interpose. A fortiori, when the contract is entered into by the stockholders with the directors, or when the stockholders expressly authorize the directors to enter into a contract, when the stockholders have notice of the directors' interest, the agreement will be unassailable in the absence of actual fraud or want of power in the corporation. In this case, not only was the bankers' contract made with J. P. Morgan & Co., and approved by a two-thirds vote of the shareholders, with knowledge that J. P. Morgan was one of the directors of the steel corporation,—a fact which they may be presumed to have known,—but also in the circular letter accompanying the call of the stockholders' meeting to be held on the 19th of May, it was expressly stated as follows: "To further the success of the plan, there has been formed a syndicate, including some directors, which will receive four fifths of the 4 per cent compensation to be paid under the contract with Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Company, mentioned in the notice of stockholders' meeting." The deliverance of this court with respect to the sufficiency of notice in Gale v. Morris, 30 N. J. Eq. 285, is as follows: "If the party notified make reasonable investigation, he obtains actual knowledge of these facts; if he choose not to make it, he is charged constructively with knowledge of them. The rule merely prohibits him from taking advantage of his own imprudence to the detriment of another. But as to the matters that lie within the notice, the principle assumes another form. It charges the party with knowledge of those matters so far as reasonable inquiry has not dissipated their credibility. If he is unwilling to act upon the facts as the notice presents them, then the law demands that he shall make proper examination, and upon the result of that examination he may safely stand. Williamson v. Brown, 15 N. Y. 354. But if he prefer not to examine, it must be because he is satisfied to act as if the matters disclosed in the notice were true; and he cannot afterwards complain if his rights are made to rest upon them so far as they are true. The information given by the notice is equivalent to that obtained by inquiry." In Haslett v. Stephany, 55 N. J. Eq. 68, 36 Atl. 498, Vice Chancellor Pitney said: "For these reasons I think that the facts above stated, which were clearly within defendant's knowledge, were sufficient to put him upon inquiry. The general doctrine that facts which are sufficient to put a party upon inquiry are sufficient to charge him with all such knowledge as he would have acquired by a proper inquiry in the ordinary course of business is, as I take it, thoroughly established in this state. It was 60 L. R. A.

so held in the court of appeals in the case just cited [Karitan Water Power Co. v. Veghte, 21 N. J. Eq. 463] and that case followed Hoy v. Bramhall, 19 N. J. Eq. 563, 97 Am. Dec. 687, in the same court. The doctrine of those cases has always been followed in New Jersey." The cases in England are to the like effect. Phosphate of Lime Co. v. Green, L. R. 7 C. P. 43; May v. Chapman, 16 Mees. & W. 355. The stockholders of the company are, therefore, chargeable with express notice that some directors were interested in the bankers' contract, and by reasonable inquiry at the meeting of May 19th they could have ascertained the names and number of such directors. They signified by their votes that they approved the contract with such full knowledge.

In Durfee v. Old Colony & F. River R. Co. 5 Allen, 230, Chief Justice Bigelow says: "It may be stated as an indisputable proposition that every person who becomes a member of a corporation aggregate by purchasing and holding shares agrees by necessary implication that he will be bound by all acts and proceedings, within the scope of the powers and authority conferred by the charter, which shall be adopted or sanctioned by the vote of the majority of the [shareholders of the] corporation, duly taken and ascertained according to law. This is the unavoidable result of the fundamental principle that the majority of the stockholders can regulate and control the lawful exercise of the powers conferred on a corporation by its charter." In the case of the steel corporation the right of the majority does not rest upon implication. In the by-laws adopted by the stockholders, in pursuance of authority given by the act of incorporation, such power is expressly given to the majority. In Leavenworth County v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 134 U. S. 688, 33 L. ed. 1064, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 708, it was held that the action of the stockholders validated the contract where nine out of thirteen directors were personally interested. In the cases of Nye v. Storer, 168 Mass. 53, 46 N. E. 402, and Bjorngaard v. Goodhue County Bank, 49 Minn. 483, 52 N. W. 48, a like infirmity in contracts was held to be eliminated by the vote of a majority of stockholders. The like view is expressed by the court of appeals of Maryland in Shaw v. Davis, 78 Md. 308, 23 L. R. A. 294, 28 Atl. 619, as follows: "It may be stated, as the result of all the authorities, that, whenever any action of either directors or stockholders is relied on in a suit by a minority stockholder for the purpose of invoking the interposition of a court of equity, if the act complained of be neither ultra vires, fraudulent, nor illegal, the court will refuse its intervention, because powerless to grant it, and will leave all such matters to be disposed of by the majority of the stockholders in such manner as their interest may dictate; and their action will be binding on all, whether approved of by the minority or not." The healing effect of the ratification by stockholders upon a voidable contract entered into by directors is fully recognized in Grant v. United Kingdore Switckback R. Co. L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 135. In the case sub judice the contract was, in effect, made between the stockholders themselves and J. P. Morgan & Co., and it cannot be successfully assailed, without maintaining that stockholders are without capacity to make a valid contract with the directors of their company. It would be manifestly contrary to fair dealing and good faith to permit stockholders to invite directors to enter into an engagement, and, after the directors had put themselves in a position in which the contract could be enforced against them, to permit the stockholders to deprive them of the benefits of it. In my investigation no case has been found which will justify such a result. In the proper application of a legal rule, it cannot be necessary, in order to do justice to one party, to do manifest injustice to the other. Such inequity would condemn the application of the rule, not the rule itself.

On the ground which has been discussed, upon the facts presented, the complainant's case is without support in law. He made no inquiry, did not attend the meeting, and now attempts to deprive the two thirds of the stockholders who did attend the May meeting of the benefit of a contract which they then approved, and which, as has been held in the Berger Case, the corporation had power to make. As was declared in that case (citing Ellerman v. Chicago Junction R. & Union Stockyards Co. 49 N. J. Eq. 217, 23 Atl. 287), individual stockholders cannot question, in judicial proceedings, corporate acts of directors, if the same are within the powers of the corporation, and in furtherance of its purposes, are not unlawful or against good morals, are done in good faith and in the exercise of an honest judgment. Much less can a shareholder challenge like action taken by a majority of his costockholders.

The remaining grounds upon which the complainant rests his claim to relief relate to the act of 1902. This act, as this court adjudged in the Berger Case, is a restraining act, and required a due observance of its provisions by the steel company as a condition precedent to the right to enter into the conversion scheme. The first alleged infirmity relied upon by the complainant is that dividends were not made in conformity with the requirement of the act of 1902, which is a supplement to the general corporation act. The language of the act with respect to this condition is: "Every corporation organized under this act . . . that shall have issued preferred stock entitling the holders thereof to receive dividends at a rate exceeding 5 per centum per annum, and that shall have continuously declared and paid dividends at such rate, on such preferred stock, for the period of at least one year next preceding the meeting." The amended certificate of incorporation of the company provided that "the holders of the preferred stock shall be entitled to receive, when and as declared, yearly dividends at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable quarterly on dates to be fixed by the by-laws." It is admitted that a dividend of 1½ per cent was declared by the company for the three months beginning on the 1st of April, 1901, and ending on the 1st of July, 1901; that a like dividend was declared for the three months beginning July 1, 1901, and ending October 1, 1901; that a like dividend was declared for the three months beginning October 1, 1901, and ending January 1, 1902, and that a like dividend was declared for the three months beginning January 1, 1902, and ending April 1, 1902,—all of which dividends were paid by the company to the stockholders within the time fixed by the by-laws and before the meeting of May 19, 1902. This provision in the act of 1902 was drafted in contemplation of the 18th section of the corporation act of 1896, giving power to create preferred stock, and prescribing that "the holders thereof shall be entitled to receive, and the corporation shall be bound to pay, thereon, a fixed yearly dividend to be expressed in the certificate not exceeding 8 per centum, payable quarterly, half yearly, or yearly, before any dividends shall be set apart or paid on the common stock, and such dividends may be made cumulative." The dividends on the preferred stock were, by the amended certificate of incorporation of the steel company and the by-laws, made payable quarterly, were cumulative, and to be paid before any dividend was paid on the common stock. A dividend on the preferred stock might have been passed, and it was, therefore, intended by the act of 1902 to require, in compliance with § 18, that, before its provisions could be taken advantage of, the company must have paid a dividend at the rate of 7 per cent for the full year next preceding the meeting to retire the preferred stock; and it was a compliance with that section whether the dividend was paid quarterly, half-yearly, or at the end of the year. The dividend required by the 18th section is a yearly dividend of 7 per cent, and it was paid in four quarterly payments.

The vice chancellor held, in construing this legislation, that, if the dividend had been paid annually, there must have been two dividends of 7 per cent each, covering two previous years, to make the payment continuous; that, if the dividends were paid half-yearly, there must have been three payments of 3½ per cent each, covering eighteen months, in order to make the payment continuous; that, if paid quarterly, as in this case, there must have been five payments of 1½ per cent each, covering fifteen months to satisfy the statute; and so, if the dividends had been paid monthly, there must have been thirteen dividends covering a period of thirteen months. The mere statement of this view is destructive of it. Thus interpreted, the law would provide no fixed, determinate, uniform time during which dividends must be paid, but would leave it optional with the corporation to get the benefit of the law by making dividends so payable that a period either of two years or only thirteen months need be covered. As to a corporation making dividends payable annually, one rule would prevail, while to a corporation paying quarterly a different rule would apply. The very essence of a law is that it is uniform and universal within the territory to which it relates. It must apply in the same way to everyone. It cannot be varied at the will of the corporation. The construction adopted in the court below is clearly erroneous, and gives a meaning to the word "continuous" which is wholly unwarranted. It, of course, must not be given its strictest meaning, which would require a never-ceasing payment of dividends, like the continuous flow of water. Applied to dividends, it means, "during one year," which is equivalent to the words of the act "for the period of at least one year." The act does not prescribe that 7 per cent dividends shall have been continuously declared and paid for the period of at least one year next preceding the meeting, but that dividends at the rate of 7 per cent shall be paid. The force of the word "continuously" evidently is that dividends at the rate of 7 per cent must be paid for a continuous period of one year, so that, where dividends are paid quarterly, a quarterly dividend cannot be passed without losing the benefit of the act. The payment of dividends is to be for the period of one year. The dividends are to be paid out of surplus over and above the amount of the capital stock and outstanding indebtedness, and are to be made for the "period." When a dividend is made, it is made as a dividend for the period of three months then previously elapsed. A dividend for a future period has not been known in the business history of corporations. When a dividend is paid, it is paid for the period then elapsed. In this case a dividend at the rate of 7 per cent was paid for the first quarter, and a like dividend for the second, third, and fourth quarters of the year next preceding the meeting of the stockholders. If that was not a payment continuously at the rate of 7 per cent for one year next preceding the meeting, for what year was it a continuous payment? The meaning of the draftsman of this provision may be further elucidated by dropping out of it the words "for the period of at least one year next preceding the meeting." The act will then read: "A corporation that shall have continuously declared and paid dividends at the rate of 7 per cent on such preferred stock." This language is ambiguous. It might be construed to mean a corporation that had paid three consecutive dividends at the rate of 7 per cent that would be a continuous payment. It might also be held to mean a corporation that had continuously declared and paid dividends during the entire period of its corporate existence. To exclude this uncertainty, the words were added, "for the period of at least one year next preceding the meeting." The dividend was required to extend over the entire preceding year, and the failure to pay the dividend for any one of the quarters would break the continuity, and require the company thereafter to make four consecutive quarterly dividends of 1½ per cent each to make the act of 1902 available.

The cases as to publications in newspapers, cited and relied on by the vice chancellor as his only authority, are not in point. Our laws require publication of notice of sale "at least four weeks successively, once a week, next preceding the time of sale." It has been uniformly and properly held to require a publication for four full weeks once a week, and that the publication must begin four weeks next before the day of sale, and that four full weeks must elapse between the first publication and the day of sale. The statute requires that there shall be four weeks' notice of sale, and, if sale can be made after four weekly publications, it might be made after the expiration of only twenty-two days. A publication has no relation to a previously elapsed period. It is a publication only on the very day it is made, while a dividend relates to and is for a time previously run. All that the act of 1902 requires with respect to payment of dividends is that the provision of § 18 of the general corporation law shall be complied with.

The other objections urged as to the want of conformity by the defendant corporation with the requirements of the act of 1902 have been duly considered, and are deemed to be without merit. There is no ground presented by the case or agitated in the briefs of counsel which will justify the interposition of a court of equity to arrest the proposed action of the defendants.

The decree below should be reversed, and the injunction dissolved, with costs in this court and in the court below.

available under that title if necessary, notwithstanding its attempted transfer to "An Act Respecting Conveyances" (Pamph. L. 1898, p. 876, § 19), and its inclusion in "An Act to Repeal Sundry Acts Respecting Conveyances" (Pamph. L. 1898, p. 711).

2. Such act may not extend so as to authorize transfer of a right of entry, for condition broken, after the breach; but, independent of statute, such a right is, in this state, transferable, after breach, because the policy that in England forbade a transfer, namely, the prevention of maintenance, is not in force here. The case of Schomp v. Schenck, 40 N. J. L. 195, 29 Am. Rep. 219, approved.
3. A right of entry for condition broken, held by two or more persons, will not support partition or alternative judicial sale of the land involved.
4. One of two or more persons holding a vested right of entry for condition broken may, without actual entry, maintain ejectment for the land involved. Quere, can the defendant effectually object to non-joinder of the other holders by giving notice under § 37 of the practice act?

5. Except as above modified, the case of this title in 65 N. J. L. 814, 47 Atl. 772, approved.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Collins, J.:

The plaintiff below recovered verdict and judgment in ejectment, and error is assigned upon exceptions sealed at the trial. Both parties claim title under the same deed, the defendant by reason of the conveyance, and of the right itself, and to the qualities that affect the question of its transferability.

In a well-considered article on Estates upon Condition, 1 Am. Law Rev. 265, the elementary principal is stated as follows: "The old, common-law limitation upon conditions required, only, that they should not be repugnant to the grant, and should be reserved to the grantor and his heirs. A reservation to a stranger, after creation of an estate in fee upon condition, would have violated the rule which prohibits the creation of an estate in fee upon a fee, and would be void. It was a necessary consequence that the possible future interest which, on breach of condition, would exist in the grantor, was not assignable or devisable, but remained in him and his heirs in strict privacy. The interest which remained after the creation of an estate in fee upon condition was not held to be an estate in the land, but only in the condition,—a future possible right of entry and action which the rule against maintenance prohibited to be assigned or devised."

A condition subsequent in a conveyance in fee can only be reserved for the benefit of the grantor and his heirs, and no stranger can take advantage of a breach of the condition. Fonda v. Sage, 48 Barb. 109; Roble v. Sedgwick, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 73; Skipwith v. Martin, 50 Ark. 141, 6 S. W. 514; Norris v. Milner, 20 Ga. 563; Boone v. Clark, 129 Ill. 466, 5 L. R. A. 276, 21 N. E. 850; Throp v. Johnson, 3 Ind. 343; Cross v. Carson, 8 Blackf. 138, 44 Am. Dec. 742; McElroy v. Morley, 40 Kan. 76, 19 Pac. 341; Warwick v. Andrews, 25 Me. 530; *Davis v. Memphis & C. R. Bartlett conveyed to Fox with covenant by Fox for himself, his heirs and assigns, that no structure should be erected upon the land whereby the view or prospect of the bay from any part of the premises of Green should be obstructed or impaired, and, in case of breach, the premises were to be forfeited to Bartlett for the use of Green. The consideration for the deed to Bartlett had been paid by Green. It was held that this was not merely a covenant, but a conveyance upon condition which was valid, Green not being a stranger. Gilbert v. Peteler, 38 N. Y. 165, 97 Am. Dec. 785.

Where Hogan made a contract with Mark to convey land to the latter upon condition that no part thereof "should ever be used or occupied as a tavern," and thereafter Hogan conveyed to trustees, subject to this agreement, and subsequently Hogan and the trustees united in a deed to Mark subject to the condition, and thereafter the trustees reconveyed to Hogan all the property that had not been transferred by them,—it was held that the condition was reserved to Hogan, and not to the trustees, and that Hogan was not a stranger to the title. Post v. Well, 8 Hun. 418. This judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals, but upon the ground that the clause in question did not constitute a condition subsequent, but was a covenant created for the benefit of adjoining property. 15 N. Y. 361, 5 L. R. A. 422, 22 N. E. 145.

A right of re-entry for condition broken "is not a reversion; nor is it the possibility of reversion; nor is it any estate in the land. It is a mere right or chose in action, and, if enforced, the grantor would be in by the failure of a condition, and not by a reverter. . . . When property is held on condition all the attributes and incidents of absolute property belong to it until the condition be broken." De Peyster v. Michael, 6 N. Y. 467, 506-507, 57 Am. Dec. 470.

"A mere failure to perform a condition subsequent does not divest the estate. The grantor or his heirs may not choose to take advantage of the breach, and, until they do so by entry, or by what is now made by statute its equivalent, there is no forfeiture of the estate. This was the common law, and it has not been altered by statute so as to give a right of entry to an assignee in any instance not coupled with a reversionary interest, as in the cases of estates for years and for life, except in cases of leases, or, rather of grants in fee reserving rent. . . . But where a fee simple without a reservation of rents is granted upon a condition subsequent, as in this case, there is no estate remaining in the grantor. There is simply a possibility of reverter, but that is no estate. There is not even a possibility coupled with an interest, but a bare possibility alone." Such an interest is not an "expectant estate" under the Revised Statutes of New York, which make expectant estates descendible, devisable, and alienable in the same manner as estates in possession (1 Rev. Stat. 725, § 35). "He [the grantor in a conveyance upon condition] has no present right or interest whatever, and no more control over it than a son has in the estate of his father who is living. . . . A voluntary reconveyance would be hardly more improbable than a reverter." Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 121, 131, 134.

The interest of a grantor in a conveyance

the plaintiff by reason of an alleged breach of its conditions.

The following are the salient facts involved: The Baltimore & New York Railway Company, the defendant below, was incorporated under the general railroad law on November 19, 1888, for the purpose of constructing a railroad about 6 miles long through Union county, from near where the Central Railroad of New Jersey crosses the Rahway river to the railroad bridge across Arthur Kill. Its filed route of 100 feet in width crossed for about a quarter of a mile a tract of about 100 acres of land, in the township of Linden, owned and possessed by Frederick A. Reichard and William H. Hume. On March 22, 1889, these landowners, in consideration of the covenants of their grantee and of $1,199, conveyed to the railway company, its successors and assigns, so much of their land as was within such filed route, and an adjoining triangle of 60/100 of an acre at the northwest end of the strip,—about 5½ acres in all. The deed of conveyance contained this provision: "And in consideration of the premises it is hereby mutually agreed and covenanted by the respective parties hereto that the grant of land herein contained is made and received upon the following conditions; that is to say: First, that the said party of the second part shall make, erect, and build, within three months after the completion of laying the tracks over the route of said railway company, and thereafter maintain, a passenger station upon the aforesaid piece of land, where the same at the northwesterly part thereof is more than 100 feet wide; second [provides that no building shall be erected on the land conveyed except for rail-upon condition" becomes a mere possibility of reversion." Towle v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 303.

"When a conveyance in fee is made upon a condition subsequent the fee remains in the grantee until a breach of condition and a re-entry by the grantor. . . . The possibility of reverter merely is not an estate in the land, and, until the contingency happens, the whole title is in the grantee." Vall v. Long Island R. Co. 106 N. Y. 283, 287, 60 Am. Rep. 449, 12 N. E. 607.

In Uplington v. Corrigan, 151 N. Y. 143, 37 L. R. A. 794, 45 N. E. 359, the court says, in describing the right of entry: "At common law it was only a possibility of reverter, and not a reversion." The interest of the heirs of the grantor is described as "the bundle or aggregate of the rights which resided in and survived the death of the grantor or ancestor."

In Ohio Iron Co. v. Auburn Iron Co. 64 Minn. 404, 67 N. W. 221, the court says: "The right of re-entry is not an estate or interest in land; nor does it imply the reservation of a reversion. It is a mere chose in action, and, when enforced, the grantor is in through the breach of the condition, and not by reverter."

Where, upon foreclosure of a mortgage, certain parties in interest subsequent to the mortgage claimed that the title of the mortgagor as to three fourths of his interest in the property was subject to a condition subsequent, the court says: "Such a condition, however, defeats the estate to which it is annexed only at the election of him who has a right to enforce it. No one entitled to enforce the condition has sought to defeat the estate granted to Francis Strong, and, until this is done, the mortgagee has a right to enforce his security to the same extent as if a condition were not contained in the deed." Hayward v. Kinney, 84 Mich. 591, 48 N. W. 170.

Counter to the weight of authority upon the principle stated in the case last cited would seem to be the case of Dolan v. Baltimore, 4 Gill, 394. There a grantor had conveyed land to trustees in trust for the erection of a Roman Catholic church upon part of the land, and for the use of the remainder of the lot as a burying-ground, with a condition subsequent that, if the church should not be built and the ground so used, the deed should be void. The whole of the land was used for a burying-ground, and the church was built upon other land at some little distance. After the death of the trustees the priest of the church and a member of his congregation brought an action against the city of Baltimore to restrain a sale of the land for default in payment of an assessment for paving the street. The court held that it appeared from the bill that there had been a breach of the condition subsequent, and that, in the absence of allegations and proofs of waiver by the grantee or his heirs, the estate would be held to have reverted to them, and that, therefore, plaintiffs had no standing in court for relief in equity.

The Massachusetts courts seem inclined to attribute more of substance to the grantor's right of entry than do the courts of most other states.

In a case where what was claimed to be a condition subsequent was held to be a conditional limitation, the court notes, as one of the distinguishing qualities of an estate on condition subsequent, that it "leaves in the grantor a vested right which, by its very nature, is reserved to him as a present existing interest, transmissible to his heirs," and says: "A grant of a fee on condition only creates an estate of a base or determinable nature in the grantee, leaving the right or possibility of reverter vested in the grantor." Church in Brattle Square v. Grant, 3 Gray, 142, 148, 63 Am. Dec. 725.

In Dunlap v. Bullard, 181 Mass. 161, it is held that the considerations laid down in Austin v. Cambridgeport, 21 Pick. 215, III. c. 4, infra, and Church in Brattle Square v. Grant, 3 Gray, 142, 63 Am. Dec. 725, supra, to the effect that where an estate is held by the grantee upon condition subsequent there is left in the grantor a contingent reversionary interest, "are equally applicable whether the estate subject to the condition subsequent is an estate in fee or an estate for life or years. They apply where, by the terms of an instrument which purports to be an underlease, there is left in the lessor a contingent reversionary interest to be availed of by an entry for breach of condition which restores the sublessor to his former interest in the premises." Accordingly, it is held in that case that, where a lessee for years sublets the premises for the entire remainder of the term, but with an increased rent payable to the sublessor, and, as the court says, "what is more in point, the right is reserved to the lessor to enter and expel the lessee for nonpayment of rent or breach of any of the covenants in the lease," it is a sublease leaving part of the "estate of the term" in the sublessor, and preventing that privity of estate between the original lessor and the sublessee which would have resulted in case of an assignment of the whole of the term.

To similar effect is the case of Patten v. Dedson, 1 Gray, 325.

Notwithstanding the strong current of au-road purposes]; third, that the said party of the second part shall forthwith, from the date hereof, begin to, and lay, make, construct, and keep in repair, and forever thereafter maintain, a double-track railway upon and over the said strip of land of 100 feet in width, hereinbefore described; fourth [provides for re-entry by the grantors, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, in case of refusal or neglect] to lay, make, construct, and keep in repair, and thereafter maintain, a double-track railway over and upon said lands [or] to locate, build, and maintain thereafter a passenger station upon the portion thereof, as above described and required." Shortly after this conveyance the grantee began the construction of a railroad upon its filed route, and on July 1, 1890, had laid over its whole length one continuous track, upon which trains were run, and a second track from its western terminus for a distance of about 3,900 feet. The roadbed was graded throughout of sufficient width for two tracks, except for about 4,000 feet from the easterly terminus, where a single-track trestle was built. Between July 1, 1890, and December 1, 1891, the second track mentioned was continued easterly about 2,200 feet, extending over about two thirds of the length of the strip acquired from Reichard and Hume; and within the same time there was also constructed a second track, from a point about 4,000 feet west of the bridge over Arthur Kill for a distance of 3,355 feet to the westward. Since then there has been no railroad construction except for increasing the storage yard at the western terminus, and for connecting near there with the Lehigh Valley Railroad. Since July 1, 1890, thority in New York to the effect that a reservation of a right of entry for condition broken leaves no fragment of the estate in the grantor, there are two cases in the court of appeals in that state which turn upon the distinction between a sublease and an assignment of the term of the lessee, which seem to be more nearly in accord with the Massachusetts doctrine than with that elsewhere maintained in New York. One of these cases is Collins v. Hasbrouck, 56 N. Y. 157, 15 Am. Rep. 407, where an instrument executed by a lessee, purporting to lease to another the whole unexpired term demised to the original lessee, was held to be a sublease, and not an assignment. The court says: "It is in the form of a lease. It reserves to the Bronners [the original lessees] rent at a new rate and at a new time of payment. It stipulates for a right of entry on nonpayment of rent and on the breach of certain conditions contained in it. It provides for a surrender of the premises to them on the expiration of the term. Thus, the Bronners did not part with their whole interest in the premises and in the lease thereof to them."

This doctrine is reaffirmed in Ganson v. Tift, 71 N. Y. 48. In this case it was urged that the original lessee by the execution of what purported to be a sublease to others had assigned his entire interest therein, inasmuch as the sublease was to terminate at the same time with the original lease. The court says: "The instrument referred to contained a provision reserving a right of re-entry for nonpayment of rent or a breach of other conditions, and that, at the expiration of the term, or other sooner determination of the demise, the lessee should quietly surrender and yield up possession of the demised premises to the lessor. This constituted a sublease of the premises, and not an assignment of the entire term which transferred any right of action against the defendant."

The comments of Judge Finch in a dissenting opinion in Stewart v. Long Island R. Co. 102 N. Y. 601, 617, 55 Am. Rep. 844, 8 N. E. 200, throw light upon the doctrine laid down in the two cases last cited. "The characteristic difference between an assignment of his lease and an underletting by the original tenant resides in the inquiry whether, as a result of the transaction, the primary lessee has transferred his whole and entire estate, and completely parted with his title, or has retained in himself some fragment or shred of his estate, either substantial, or even formal and technical. An underletting implies a constituted relation of landlord and tenant between the parties contracting; and that, in turn, the existence in the landlord of an estate superior to the leasehold and out of which the latter is carved; for there can be no tenure held of one whose title is utterly destroyed. This rule prevails over the apparent intention, not because that intention ceases to be the test and standard of interpretation, but because an impossible intention is never presumed in preference to one possible and operative between the parties. The rule in its origin under the feudal system had a substantial and beneficial force. To the superior lord a service of fealty was due from the tenant in virtue of his tenure, and, if the lessee could part with his whole estate to one holding only under him, the service of fealty was gone, and so, in that case, the new tenant was deemed to hold under the paramount title as an assignee of the lease, put in the place and room of the original tenant, and bound by his covenants to render his service. Of course, that useful result has gone out of the doctrine, and it remains with us simply a rule of legal logic, much less deserving the power to override and pervert the discovered intention of the parties. As a consequence, a plain tendency to enforce that intention, even upon very narrow and technical grounds, has been developed. Originally, a reversion in the primary lessee of some fragment of his estate was needful to support a sublease. It was said that it might be for a day, an hour, or even a minute, but must nevertheless be, and leave in the primary lessee a reversion having a tangible existence. But that reversion now may be purely technical, and the product of reasoning rather than of substantial fact. It has been held that where the original tenant transferred for the identical term of his own lease, but the transferee covenanted to surrender to him, a reversion was implied from that fact, although no man can measure it as a tangible thing, since both surrenders, that of the subtenant to the primary lessee, and that of the latter to the original landlord, are due under the contracts at the precise moment of time. (Collins v. Hasbrouck, 56 N. Y. 157, 15 Am. Rep. 407; Ganson v. Tift, 71 N. Y. 48.) Indeed, the cases cited seem to go further than that, and to hold that the reservation of a right of re-entry for breach of condition, and even the reservation of a new rent, makes the instrument a sublease."

The prevailing opinion, however, in Stewart v. Long Island R. Co. 102 N. Y. 601, 617, 55 Am. Rep. 844, 8 N. E. 200, denies that, as between the original lessor and the sublessee, or assignee, the mere reservation of a right of en-the company has continuously operated its railroad in carrying coal and freight. It has never operated it as a passenger road or carried passengers except upon excursions. It has never constructed any passenger stations. The portions of a second track constructed have been in constant use as sidings. On June 28, 1893, by deed of that date, Frederick A. Reichard conveyed to William H. Salter his undivided half part of the 100-acre tract first mentioned, subject to the conveyance to the railway company, and assigned to the grantee all his rights under that conveyance "of, in, and to all and every of the covenants, agreements, and conditions of the defendant therein specifically set forth, and the land therein described to which the same was subject." On October 16, 1894, William H. Salter conveyed and assigned to Edith M. Sergeant and A. Paluel De Marmon the premises and rights conveyed and assigned by the deed last stated. On October 9, 1896, under decree in chancery made June 9, 1896, on a bill of partition of the whole property, wherein Andre Paluel De Marmon was complainant, and Edith M. Sergeant and William H. Hume were defendants, Roderick Byington, a special master in chancery, after public sale, gave a deed purporting to convey to Edith M. Sergeant and Andre Paluel De Marmon the 5½-acre tract conveyed by Reichard and Hume to the defendant. On October 16, 1899, Edith M. Sergeant and her husband and Andre Paluel De Marmon gave a bargain and sale deed purporting to convey said tract and the grantors' rights therein to John Vernou Bouvier, Jr., the plaintiff below.

try in the original lessee for nonpayment of rent will have the effect to prevent the instrument from operating as an assignment of the entire interest in the original lessee, and therefore the case, while not distinctly overruling Collins v. Hasbrouck and Ganson v. Tift, tends to restrict their authority upon this point and to be more in harmony with the other cases already cited relating to the qualities of a right of entry.

The case of Sexton v. Chicago Storage Co. 129 Ill. 318, 21 N. E. 920, is to the same effect as Stewart v. Long Island R. Co. 102 N. Y. 601, 55 Am. Rep. 844, 8 N. E. 200, in holding that, where a lessee for years assigns his entire term, though it be by what purports to be a stipulation reserving a different rent from that in the original lease, and a right of entry in the assignor for nonpayment of rent, no estate is left in the assignor, only a right of action to enforce covenants.

The transfer by a lessee of the entire remainder of his term, though by an instrument in form a sublease, is in fact an assignment, and the assignee is liable to the original lessor on the covenants contained in the lease. Constantine v. Wake, 1 Sweeney, 239.

II. Rule against transferability.

The principle is stated in 2 Cruise, Dig. p. 44, as follows: "It is a rule of common law that no one can take advantage of the breach of a condition expressed but parties and privies in right and representation, as heirs, executors, or administrators of natural persons and the successors of bodies politic. So that neither privies nor assignees in law, as lords of escheat, nor privies in estate, as persons in remainder or reversion, could formerly enter for a condition broken."

This rule applies both before and after breach of the condition, and in most of the cases where the rule is held to be applicable no distinction, based upon the time of the breach, is made. But, as stated in Hare's note to Dumport's Case, referred to in Bouvier v. Baltimore & N. Y. Ry. Co., the reasons for the rule in the two cases are different, there being in the one case a mere possibility, no more coupled with an interest than the possibility that a son will inherit from his living father, and therefore in its nature not transferable, while in the other case the obstacle in the way of a transfer is the policy against maintenance. Therefore, in citing the cases, it will be convenient to separate them into the two classes.

a. Before breach of condition.

Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 121, was an action in ejectment. The grantor had conveyed to the Hudson & Delaware Railroad Company a strip of land running through his farm for the right of way of the railroad, the grant being upon condition that the company should construct its railroad within the time prescribed by the act incorporating the same. Before breach of this condition plaintiff took title to the farm subject, only, to such rights as the railroad company then had to a portion thereof sufficient for the track of its road. The defendant claimed under the Hudson & Delaware Railroad Company. In holding, as stated under I., supra, that the grantor had before breach only the possibility of a reverter, the court illustrated as follows: "Suppose A sell to a banking corporation in fee, by express words, a lot of land on which to build a banking house. If the bank does not sell that land, but retains it till the expiration of its charter, it will revert to him, or, if he be dead, to his heirs. Now, what estate had A after he had conveyed in fee to the bank? None whatever. He had only a possibility of a reverter,—a naked and very remote possibility, but nothing that he could convey to an assignee. He had sold his entire interest, and received the full value of it. The presumption was it would never return. The law would not favor its return, and the grantee, who enjoyed the entire estate and upon whose violation alone it could return, would not be likely to so far neglect his own interests as to permit its return. A voluntary reconveyance would be hardly more improbable than a reverter. Just such an estate, and no other, had Dederer in this land when he conveyed to the plaintiff. In both cases the estates granted were upon condition. In the case of the bank, the condition was implied in law. (Angell & A. Corp. 128.) In this case, the condition was expressed."

In Rice v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 13 Allen, 141, an action to recover land conveyed by the plaintiff's father to the defendant upon condition, the grantor had died before any breach of the condition. Before his death the grantor had conveyed to his son, the plaintiff, a large tract of land, the description of which included the premises in question, by deed of warranty. Plaintiff alleged a breach of the condition after his father's death, and brought the action, claiming a right of entry as his father's heir. The court held that, by reason of the conveyance from the father to the son, the possibility of reverter was extinguished. The court refers a written stipulation of the attorneys of the parties, produced and offered at the trial. The only additional evidence was testimony for the defendant, in attempted excuse for the noncompletion of the contemplated double-track railway. The trial judge was, among other things, requested to charge the jury that if they should find either of the conditions of the deed of March 22, 1889, was broken before Salter took his deed, or before his grantees took theirs, or before the master's sale and conveyance, or before the deed to the plaintiff was given, then, in either case, the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain his action; and, further, that the right of entry for condition broken was not subject to partition, and the land in possession of the defendant was not subject to be sold in such a suit. He refused so to charge, and directed the jury as follows:

to the rule as stated in Co. Litt. 214a: "Nothing in action, entry or re-entry can be granted over" and to the reason given for it, to wit: "For avoiding maintenance, suppressing of rights, and stirring up of suits," which would happen if men were permitted "to grant before they be in possession." It is held, moreover, that the deed from father to son was not simply void so as to leave the title in the grantor to descend to his heir, the plaintiff, but that, by virtue of the penal statutes against maintenance and champerty in England, the last of which, 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 9, expressly prohibited the granting or taking any such right or interest under penalty, both on the grantor and the buyer or taker, of their forfeiting the whole value of the land or interest granted, the right of entry itself was extinguished. Upon this point the court says: "Neither party to a conveyance which violates the rule of law can allege his own unlawful act for the purpose of claiming an advantage to himself. The grantor of a right of entry cannot be heard to say that his deed was void, and that the right of entry still remains in him, because this would be to allow him to set up his own turpitude in engaging in a champertous transaction as the foundation of his claim. His deed is, therefore, effectual to estop him from setting up its invalidity as the ground of claiming a right of entry which he had unlawfully conveyed. Nor can the grantee avail himself of the grant of the right of entry for a like reason. He cannot be permitted to set up a title which rests upon a conveyance which he had taken in contravention of the rules of law. Both parties are, therefore, cut off from claiming any benefit of the condition. The grantor cannot aver the invalidity of his own deed, nor can the grantee rely on its validity. Both being participators in an unlawful transaction, neither can avail himself of it to establish a title in a court of law."

The action in Denver & S. F. R. Co. v. School Dist. No. 22, 14 Colo. 327, 23 Pac. 978, was ejectment. There one Magnus had conveyed to plaintiff upon a condition subsequent that the property should not cease to be used for the purposes of a school. Before breach of the condition Magnus had conveyed to one under whom defendant claimed. The court says: "As Magnus had conveyed his entire estate, it is clear that nothing remained to him which he could convey to Peabody unless the limitation was such as to leave him vested with an estate in reversion which could be the subject of grant. Such reversion could not exist, however, unless, from the nature of the limitation, it ap-

"If you find that the company has failed to complete the laying of a double-track railway over the land in question in accordance with the conditions of the deed within a reasonable time, and that such reasonable time had elapsed before this suit was brought, your verdict should be for the plaintiff; otherwise it should be for the defendant." The jury rendered a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

Mr. Edward Q. Keasbey, for plaintiff in error:

Conditions subsequent, by which a vested right is defeated, are stricti juris, and must be construed strictly against the grantor; and the breach of the conditions must be clearly shown in order to obtain a judgment against the grantee in possession.

1 Sheppard's Touchstone, 133, § 8; Den

pears that the event upon which it was based in the nature of things must happen. That event was the abandonment of the use of the premises for school purposes. It is manifest that such an event might never occur. The premises might always be used for the purpose for which they were conveyed. This being true, Magnus was not vested with a reversion or an estate in reversion, and there was nothing left in him save the mere possibility of a reverter. No interest in the estate, therefore, could pass by his deed to Peabody, and, as a matter of course, as Peabody took nothing he could convey nothing either to McGavock or to the appellant. Whether these deeds might not operate as an assignment of the reversion or the possibility of reverter it is unnecessary to determine. It is sufficient to say that they did not convey the title, or vest the grantees named in them with any right or interest, either present or contingent, in the body of the land itself."

Where the city of New York had conveyed land on condition, with a proviso that such condition should not be released except on consent of a third party, and the grantee conveyed subject to the condition, and thereafter, and before breach of the condition, the city by ordinary deed without reference to the condition, conveyed to the grantee from the first grantee, it was held that the condition was gone. The court says: "It is well settled that where a deed of property in fee is made with a condition subsequent imposed and a right of re-entry reserved to the grantor, the right of re-entry is a mere right in action, and not an interest in the land; that it is not assignable nor grantable; that it descends to the grantor's heirs, and does not pass by a conveyance. And any deed by which the original grantor or his heirs undertakes to transfer, assign, or grant the land, or the reversion of it, while it may be ineffectual to convey title to the grantee, does operate to put an end to the rights of the grantor." Berenbrock v. St. Luke's Hospital, 23 App. Div. 339, 48 N. Y. Supp. 863, Appeal dismissed, 155 N. Y. 655, 49 N. E. 1093.

The owner of a tract of land conveyed one lot on the condition that the grantee should not neglect or refuse to maintain a boundary fence between the lot and the remainder of the tract. The grantor afterward conveyed the remainder of the tract to C., who himself removed the fence and mortgaged the land to his grantor, who entered for breach of condition in the original deed of the lot. The court seems to have treated the condition as in the nature of an easement for the benefit of the grantor's es-

The grantors are not entitled to be restored to the possession of the land without tendering back the consideration money which they received.

The conditions relate to two pieces of land severally, and the breach of the condition relating to one piece does not affect the other.

Horner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 38 Wis. 165.

The grantors have waived the exact performance of the conditions by acquiescence for many years in the existing conditions, and the plaintiff, a stranger, cannot now demand a forfeiture.

Lead. Cas. (Hare & W.) 112; Kenner v. American Contract Co. 9 Bush, 202.

The plaintiff has not acquired the right of re-entry for condition broken.

If the conditions have been broken at all, they were broken before the conveyance made by Reichard, one of the original grantors, to William H. Salter, June 28, 1893. The right of entry had then become a present right to bring an action of ejectment, and was no longer a future or contingent estate or right of entry for breach of condition that might occur thereafter. The right of entry for condition broken could only be exercised by the grantor and his heirs. The right was not assignable or devisable.

Co. Litt. 214c, 215a, 233b; 2 Cruise, Dig. 42; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 450; 4 Kent, Com. 124; Sheppard's Touchstone, Preston's ed. 120; Den ex dem. Southard v. Central R.

tate in the remainder of the tract, and held that, if it was a condition which vested in the grantor as owner of the tract, and not merely a personal covenant, it was attached to the land and passed to the grantee of the tract, and that such grantee, in removing the fence, had waived the condition, and that it could not be revived by the grantor. The decision, however, does not stand upon this ground alone, for it was held that without demand or notice to maintain the fence there had been no breach of the condition. Merrifield v. Cobleigh, 4 Cush. 178.

Where a grantor conveyed upon condition, and took back a mortgage, and in the usual form transferred the mortgage and "the real estate thereby conveyed," and thereafter entered for condition broken, his title was held to be superior to that of the assignee of the mortgage. Merritt v. Harris, 102 Mass. 326.

Where the owner of a tract of land divided it into lots, and conveyed these lots each subject to certain conditions subsequent, and afterwards attempted to release his right to enforce the conditions with reference to one of the lots, in an action brought by the owner of an adjoining lot to restrain violation of the condition, it was held that the condition and restrictions were inserted for the benefit of the purchasers of the lots from the original owner, and for the benefit of the grantees of such purchasers, and that, therefore, the restrictions could be enforced in equity by and against such trustees. The court says: "The right of entry on breach of condition cannot be assigned to a stranger, and, if the conditions and restrictions were for the benefit of purchasers and their grantees, these conditions and restrictions could not be released to a purchaser or his grantee without the assent of the other purchasers or their grantees for whose benefit they were imposed." Hopkins v. Smith, 162 Mass. 444, 38 N. E. 1122.

In the case of Locke v. Hale, 165 Mass. 20, 42 N. E. 331, one Johnson, who owned and occupied as a residence land on Pleasant street, conveyed land on the opposite side of the street to Taylor "upon the conditions that" only buildings of a certain class should be built thereon, and that dwelling houses should be set back a certain distance from the street line, "with reversion to the grantor, his heirs and assigns, in case of any breach of such condition." The grantee of this land holding by warranty deed from the grantee of Taylor brought the action for breach of the covenant against encumbrances. The court held that the provisions could not be construed as subjecting the lot conveyed to an easement or servitude in favor of the 60 L. R. A.

premises occupied by Johnson as a residence. The court says: "A more natural construction would be, it seems to us, that it was expected that other lots besides the one purchased by Taylor would be sold out of the tract of which that was a part, and that the condition or restriction which was inserted in the deed to him was one which it was expected would be inserted in other deeds for the common benefit and advantage of parties so purchasing, and their successors in title. Whether regarded as a condition or restriction, it constitutes an encumbrance. . . . The defendant has placed some stress on the use of the word 'assigns' in the provision creating the encumbrance. The right of entry for breach of condition subsequent is not assignable, and, if the provision is to be regarded as creating a condition subsequent, the word was inapt. (Hopkins v. Smith, 162 Mass. 444, 38 N. E. 1122.) We think that, if it is not to be rejected altogether, it is to be regarded as inserted rather to show that the condition or restriction was a continuing one, than with a purpose to establish an easement or servitude in favor of the premises occupied by Johnson as a residence."

Where defendant had conveyed to one Goddard upon condition that, if defendant, his heirs and assigns, should support Goddard and his wife the deed should be void, and there had been an assignment by Goddard to plaintiffs as security for any payments by plaintiffs for the support of Goddard and his wife, in an action to recover the land for breach of condition the instrument was held not to be a mortgage, not being given as security for a debt or liquidated damages. The court says: "If the condition of the deed was broken before the assignment to plaintiffs, and the grantee in the deed had regularly entered for the breach and revested the title in himself, it would seem that the deed to the plaintiffs would be sufficient to convey to them the title to the property, and that they might well maintain this action. . . . The right to enter for condition broken, and, much more, the right of entry in case a condition should be broken at a future time, is not an assignable interest." Bethlehem v. Annis, 40 N. H. 34, 77 Am. Dec. 700.

In the case of a deed to a son who gave back a mortgage conditioned for the support of the grantor and his wife, it was held that "the interest of the mortgagee is not assignable before breach of the condition, and no action at law can be maintained by an assignee unless where there has been an actual breach, and, perhaps, an entry for condition broken before the assignment." Bryant v. Erskine, 55 Me. 157.

This rule of the common law has been strictly maintained, except so far as it has been abrogated by statute.

At common law the right of entry for conditions broken, whether before or after a breach, created no estate or real interest, but a mere right of action; and it is now only assignable so far as it is made so by statute.

DePeyster v. Michael, 6 N. Y. 467, 57 Am. Dec. 470; Vail v. Long Island R. Co. 106 N. Y. 283, 60 Am. Rep. 449, 12 N. E. 607; Rice v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 12 Allen, 141; Dumpor's Case, 4 Coke, 119, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th Am. ed. 135.

The right of entry for condition broken was not subject to partition, and the land in the possession of the defendant was not subject to be sold in such a suit.

At common law, lands and other real es-

In Upington v. Corrigan, 151 N. Y. 143, 37 L. R. A. 794, 45 N. E. 339, premises had been conveyed upon condition and before breach of condition the grantor had died leaving a will containing a valid residuary clause. After breach of condition the plaintiff, as one of the heirs at law of the grantor, brought ejectment to recover the property, and a main question in the case was whether the right of entry descended to the plaintiff as heir, or passed to the residuary devisee under the will. It was claimed on behalf of the devisee that, although the right of entry was not devisable at common law, the Revised Statutes of New York had altered the law by the provision that "every estate and interest in real property descendible to heirs may be devised" (2 Rev. Stat. 57, § 2). The court held that this language was as comprehensive as it could be to cover real interests, but that a right of entry was not such an interest. The court says: "In chapter 1, part 2, of the Revised Statutes, upon the nature, qualities, and alienation of estates in real property, art. 1 of title 2 creates various estates in lands, and divides them into those in possession and in expectancy. The latter class is again divided, first, into future estates limited to commence in possession at a future day, either without the intervention of a precedent estate, or on the determination of a precedent estate; and, second, into reversions; which latter are defined to exist where the residue of an estate is left in the grantor, or his heirs, commencing in possession on the termination of a particular estate granted. By § 35 of the same article it is also provided that 'expectant estates are descendible, devisable, and alienable in the same manner as estates in possession.' If, therefore, there was any estate left in Mrs. Davey [the original grantor] upon her grant to Hughes [the original grantee], it was not one known to our statute on real property, and all expectant estates, within which class it would have to fall, are abolished by the article, except such as are therein defined, and which must be either estates limited to commence in possession at a future day, or reversions. The real interest contended for here would not satisfy the requirement of either class. The mere possibility of reverter, which was all there was in this case, could not be included within the 'reversions' spoken of by the statute, within its letter or spirit. The statute of wills, through the use of such precise words as 'every estate and interest in real property descendible to heirs,' obviously must have reference to such as are recognized by the Revised Statutes to be estates of inheritance. We would be without warrant in asserting the existence of any estate in Mrs. Davey in the premises granted to Hughes, whether at common law or under the Revised Statutes. She had an election to enter for condition broken, and she could release her right to do so. To those rights her heirs, after her decease, succeeded by force of representation, and not by descent." The court also says: "That which the grantor retained was never regarded as an interest in real property, or as an assignable chose in action, and cannot be deemed such through any construction of our statute. Until the law is changed by some legislation, it must be regarded as still the settled rule that no one can take advantage of the breach of a condition subsequent, annexed to the grant of a fee, but the grantor or his heirs; or, in the case of an artificial person, its successors. Every estate and interest formerly enjoyed by the grantor were vested by the deed in the grantee. He undertook and agreed to perform the condition which is annexed to the grant, and the presumption was that he would perform. If he, or those who succeeded in interest, failed to do so, within a reasonable time, then it became optional with the grantor to enter for a breach of the condition, and to have a forfeiture of the estate declared. The grantor having died, the right to insist upon a forfeiture for breach of the condition remained in the heir, as the person who occupies the place of the deceased."

In Branch v. Wesleyan Cemetery Asso. 11 Ohio C. C. 190, one Kirby, owning a tract of land, conveyed part of it to the trustees of a church upon condition subsequent that they should erect and maintain a church upon the property. Thereafter, and before breach of the condition, he conveyed his interest in the tract, subject to the former grant to the trustees, to the defendant. The land granted to the trustees was used for church purposes until long after the subsequent conveyance of the tract by Kirby. Thereafter the church was burned, and had never been rebuilt. In an action brought by the church the prayer for relief was "that defendants be required to set up their interest in said land that the same may be adjudged null and void, the plaintiff's title quieted, and for all proper relief." It was held that the deed from Kirby to the church vested in it an estate in fee subject only to be divested by breach of the condition, and that the right to take advantage of the breach was not assignable, and did not pass to the defendant by the deed to it.

Where a grant was made to the grantor's son upon condition that he support the grantor and tate which were capable of division were divided between coparceners upon a writ of partition, and set off to the coparceners by metes and bounds, and certain incorporeal hereditaments incapable of division were allotted to the elder sister, allowance being made to the others out of the rest of the estate.

Co. Litt. 164b; Cruise, Dig. 469.

At common law none but coparceners were compellable to make partition, and the plaintiff must be in possession when the suit is brought.

pay all his debts, and, after the death of the grantor, another son proved a debt against the estate, and, on failure of the grantee to pay, brought an action against him in ejectment to recover his interest in the property on the ground of a breach of the condition, it was held that he could recover. Jackson ex dem. Reeves v. Topping, 1 Wend. 388, 19 Am. Dec. 515.

b. After breach of condition.

Where a grantor on condition subsequent, after breach of condition, but before entry, conveys all his interest in the property, the condition is gone. The court says: "There is no person capable of making the entry or claim. The grantor cannot, for he has parted with his interest; the grantee cannot, because he is a stranger to the condition." Hooper v. Cummings, 45 Me. 359.

When the original grantor upon condition, without ever having entered for a breach of the condition, releases his claim to the estate by a deed to a stranger, the condition is extinguished. Craig v. Franklin County, 58 Me. 495.

A right of entry for condition broken after breach is not subject to levy on execution. Bangor v. Warren, 34 Me. 324, 56 Am. Dec. 657.

In an action in equity by one claiming as assignee to enforce a forfeiture for a breach of condition, the court says: "A right of entry for condition broken is not assignable at common law, and we have no statute which makes it so." Warner v. Bennett, 31 Conn. 468.

An assignee for the benefit of creditors cannot recover land for breach of condition contained in a deed by his assignor. Underhill v. Saratoga & W. R. Co. 20 Barb. 455.

A doctrine contrary to that of the case last cited is found in Stearns v. Harris, 8 Allen, 597. Under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 118, § 44, providing that, in case of a general assignment, there should vest in the assignee all the assignor's rights of action for any goods or estate, real or personal, it is there held that a right of entry for condition broken after breach passes to an assignee in insolvency, and therefore the grantor cannot enforce the right. It was so held in an action by the assignor in which the general assignment was set up by the defendant as a bar to the plaintiff's right.

In an action by the heir of a grantor upon condition to recover the property on the ground of forfeiture by breach of condition, it was held that, the grantor, after his conveyance upon condition, having conveyed a portion of the same land to another, though the latter conveyance was void as against the prior grantee, it was operative between the parties to it. The court says: "The land being a single parcel, the condition on which it was conveyed could not be apportioned by the grantor; and the reason given in the books for this rule is that a condition is 'against common right' (1 Greenleaf's, Cruise, Real Prop. 511). Whenever the reversion is granted by the maker of the condition the condition is gone." Tinkham v. Erie R. Co. 53 Barb. 393.

In an action of ejectment brought by one who claimed under a conveyance from the original grantor subsequent to what was claimed to be a breach of conditions in the prior grant to one under whom defendants claimed, it was held that the action could not be maintained, and that in New York the rule of the common law, based upon the doctrine of maintenance, was in force. Towle v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 303.

In Sedgwick v. Stanton, 14 N. Y. 289, it was held that in New York there is nothing of the law of maintenance left, except the provisions embodied in 2 Rev. Stat. 691, §§ 5, 6 (now found in §§ 129 and 130 of the Penal Code), which prohibit any person from taking any conveyance of lands from any person not in possession while such lands are the subject of controversy by suit, knowing the pendency of such suit, and also prohibit the buying or selling of any pretended title to lands unless the grantor and those under whom he claims shall have been in possession for the space of a year before the sale.

Where a grant of land had been made by the British government in 1763, subject to a condition that 5 acres in each 50 acres should be cultivated within five years from the date of the grant, and the right of the state of Vermont in the land was derived under the treaty of peace at the close of the Revolution, the court says: "The condition was, therefore, broken, and the forfeiture incurred before the state could pretend to claim any interest in the land, and it may admit of some question whether a mere right to enforce a forfeiture would result from the Revolution, and be transferred to the state. If title to the territory is derived under the treaty of peace, and the state of Vermont is to be considered as standing in the character of a grantee, it would seem to be at variance with the principles of the common law, which, for the purpose of discouraging maintenance and litigation, will permit nothing that lies in action, entry, or re-entry to be granted over. By the common law no grantee or assignee of a reversion could take advantage of a re-entry by force of a condition broken."

The denial of the title of the plaintiff by one of the defendants will defeat a bill for partition, and partition cannot be had until the plaintiff's title is established at law.

Lucas v. King, 10 N. J. Eq. 280; Hay v. Estell, 18 N. J. Eq. 251; Riverview Cemetery Co. v. Turner, 24 N. J. Eq. 18; Hoyt v. Tuers, 25 N. J. Eq. 360; Stoekbouser v. Kanouse, 49 N. J. Eq. 592, 26 Atl. 333.

It is a rule of almost universal application that proceedings for partition can be instituted and maintained only by one having an estate in possession, or entitled to immediate possession of the premises to be partitioned.

17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 694; Brownell v. Brownell, 19 Wend. 367; Striker v. Mott, 2 Paige, 387, 22 Am. Dec. 646; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 66 N. Y. 37; Rickard v. Rickard, 13 Pick. 255; Stevens v. Enders, 13 N. J. L. 271.

It was held, also, in this case that a forfeiture had been saved by the performance of the condition by those who had an interest in the land. Vermont v. Society for Propagation of Gospel, 2 Paige, 545, Fed. Cas. No. 16, 920.

Where the condition was, among other things, that the grantor might reside on the land during his life, and after breach of other conditions the grantor, being in possession, conveyed his right to another, who, after the grantor's death, brought ejectment, it was held that the estate reverted without re-entry, the grantor being in possession, and the court adds: "But it is said that, after the death of Edward Almond [the grantor] the plaintiff, his grantee, who never was in possession, might have entered. That could not be; for none but a feoffor or his heir could enter, and the reason why a right of entry cannot be assigned is, that a contrary doctrine would favor maintenance and promote litigation. 1 Inst. 214. As, then, neither the feoffor nor his assignee could enter, he would have been without remedy if the estate had not reverted in him by operation of law without any act done on his part." Hamilton v. Elliott, 5 Serg. & R. 376.

In Den ex dem. Southard v. Central R. Co. 26 N. J. L. 13 (referred to in BOUVIER v. BALTIMORE & N. Y. R. Co.), the plaintiff claimed as residuary devisee of a grantor who had conveyed to defendant's predecessor upon condition. The action was ejectment on the ground that the condition had been broken during the life of the devisior. It was held, in the first place, that there had been no breach of condition, and, in the second place, that the devisee could not take advantage of the breach, the court citing the common-law authorities, and holding that the rule was in force in New Jersey.

In Thompson v. Bright, 1 Cush. 420, it is held that the state cannot assign its right to enter for condition broken without first recovering possession, and that the case is analogous to the inability of the state to grant an escheat until office found.

One who claimed under a deed from the original grantor after breach of a condition in a prior deed of the premises sued in trespass, and it was held that no right of entry had passed to the plaintiff on the ground that the common-law rule against maintenance prevented. Guild v. Richards, 16 Gray, 309.

Where a tenant had done that which by statute was made sufficient to avoid his lease, and afterward the landlord had conveyed his interest to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff brought his action, claiming to take advantage of the breach, the court says: "The ancient doctrine

Either an actual entry, or the bringing of a suit in ejectment, is necessary to divest the title of the grantee.

Where, pursuant to a judgment in condemnation proceedings, the defendant obtained title to land for its railroad upon conditions subsequent, and before breach of the conditions the owner of the land of which the premises in question had been a part, and who had been a party to the judgment, conveyed her land to another, and he, after breach of the condition, conveyed to plaintiff, who brought ejectment against the defendant, the court says: "The right of a person who has created an estate upon condition to demand a forfeiture of the estate is not assignable." Piper v. Union P. R. Co. 14 Kan. 574.

A grantor conveyed to a railroad company "the right of way for its railroad, and the right to construct said railroad according to the provisions of the charter of said company over and through the tract of land held and owned" by the grantor. After the railroad had been graded plaintiff obtained the grantor's title, and, claiming a breach of condition, brought an action to restrain the use of the land by the defendant, a railroad company which claimed under the original grantee. The court refused to find that the original deed to the railroad company contained a condition, but held that, if it could be so construed, the right of entry could not be transferred, citing the common-law rule against maintenance. Paul v. Connersville & N. J. R. Co. 51 Ind. 527. Ft. Wayne, M. & C. R. Co. v. Gough, 51 Ind. 600, involves the same principle, and is decided in the same way.

Where one conveyed a portion of his land with restrictions upon the use of the granted premises, and with a condition that a violation of the rights of the grantor should work a forfeiture of the estate of the grantee, one who claimed by title from the grantor was held to be entitled to maintain, against one claiming under the grantee, an action in equity to restrain by injunction a violation of the agreement. It was held that jurisdiction in equity in plaintiff's suit was not affected by the existence of the condition subsequent, for the reason that a breach of that would create a forfeiture only in favor of the grantor or his heirs and their rights, and remedy at law did not pass by grant to the plaintiff. McMahon v. Williams, 79 Ala. 288.

had been broken. He claimed by assignment from the heirs of one of the dedicators who owned three eighths of the land. The court says: "If the conditions subsequent were broken, that did not, ipso facto, produce a reverter of the title. The estate continued in full force until a proper step was taken to consummate the forfeiture. This could be done only by the grantor during his lifetime, and after his death by those in privity of blood with him. In the meantime only a right of action subsisted, and that could not be conveyed so as to vest the right to sue in a stranger." Ruch v. Rock Island, 97 U. S. 693, 24 L. ed. 1101.

III. Exceptions to rule

a. Statutory.

The common-law rule against the transfer of a right of entry for condition broken applied as well to leases as to other forms of conveyance. The early statutory change relating to leases is thus explained in 2 Cruise, Dig. p. 45: "Upon the dissolution of the monasteries by King Henry VIII. most of the estates were granted to private persons who could not take advantage of the conditions contained in the leases which had been formerly made of them. This produced the statute, 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 34," giving to grantees of the King, or of others and their heirs, executors, successors, and assigns, "the like advantage by entry for nonpayment of rent, for doing waste and other forfeiture . . . as the lessors and grantors ought, should, or might have had at any time or times."

This statute of Hen. VIII. was generally adopted as part of the common law of the colonies, and has, in substance, been embodied in the statutes of most of the states. Taylor, Land, & T. § 439.

In Connecticut, New Jersey, and California there are statutory provisions permitting a transfer of the right to take advantage of conditions broken upon grants of fee, as well as upon leases. The Connecticut statute authorizes a transfer before breach, and is in terms as follows: "When, after an estate in real estate has been created by grant or devise upon express condition, the reversion shall, before breach of such condition, become vested in any person other than the grantor or his heirs, such person shall, on breach of such condition, have the same right of entry upon such real estate, and the same remedy for such breach by entry, suit, or otherwise, as the original grantor, or those who legally represent him, would have if 60 L. R. A.

ficient to present the questions argued, of which we will now dispose. It is conceded that by the deed of March 22, 1889, the grantee took an estate upon condition subsequent, and that upon a breach the grantors might re-enter the land conveyed as of their former estate. I will take up, in order, the contentions of the plaintiff in error:

1. That neither of the conditions imposed was in fact broken. It is plain that a failure to lay two railroad tracks for the whole length of the 100-foot strip within a reasonable time after the conveyance was a breach of the third condition. We are satisfied with what was said on this subject by Chief Justice Depue in the supreme court when the case was there on a special verdict held abortive because silent on essential matter. Bouvier v. Baltimore & N. Y. R. Co. 65 N.

still owning such reversion." Conn. Gen. Stat. 1888, § 1053; Gen. Stat. 1875, 471.

In Hoyt v. Ketcham, 54 Conn. 60, 5 Atl. 606, one Skiddy had conveyed to Robertson with a condition subsequent, and afterward had released to the husband of Robertson all his interest in the property. After Skiddy's death his administrator with the will annexed, having a power of sale, had conveyed to plaintiff, who also had the title of Robertson and her husband. It was held that, while a right of entry was not assignable by the common law, it had been made so by the statutes of Connecticut, and that, therefore, the conveyance by Skiddy to Robertson's husband had released the condition, and also, that, if any interest remained in Skiddy, it had been transferred by the deed of his administrator with the will annexed.

The New Jersey act of March 14, 1851, is discussed in BOUVIER v. BALTIMORE & N. Y. R. Co. It contains the following language: "Any person may devise, or may convey, assign, or charge, by any deed, or any such contingent or executory interest, right of entry for condition broken, or other future estate or interest in expectancy, as he may now, or shall hereafter, be entitled to, or presumptively entitled to, in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any part of such right, estate, or interest respectively, although the contingency on which such right, estate, or interest are to vest may not have happened; . . . and provided, also, that no chose in action shall by this act be made assignable at law, and that nothing in this act contained shall render any contingent estate or other estate or expectancy therein mentioned liable to be levied upon and sold by virtue of any execution."

As stated in BOUVIER v. BALTIMORE & N. Y. R. Co. it is not clear whether the case of Cornelius v. Den ex dem. Irons, 26 N. J. L. 376, applies to a devise before or after breach. If after breach the latter case seems to be overruled, so far as it holds the statute of March 14, 1851, to be applicable to such a case, by BOUVIER v. BALTIMORE & N. Y. R. Co.

By the California Civil Code "a right of entry or of reversion for breach of condition subsequent can be transferred" (§ 1046); and "any person claiming title to real property in the adverse possession of another may transfer it with the same effect as if in actual possession." (§ 1047.)

In New York state the early re-enactment of 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 34, was followed in 1805 by chap. 98 of the Laws of that year, extending the act to grants or leases in fee, reserving rents. In the early part of the nineteenth

J. L. 314, 47 Atl. 772. Whether a double track over the whole route would not have been needful for performance of such condition need not be decided. The verdict establishes that the time that had elapsed when the suit was brought was more than reasonable for the purpose. Without doubt, a much shorter time would have been unreasonably long.

2. That a tender back of the consideration money was a prerequisite to re-entry. No authority is stated for this proposition, and it seems entirely unsound. The conditions of the conveyance must be presumed to have entered into its consideration.

3. That a breach of the third condition gave a right of re-entry on the 100-foot strip alone. The contention is that the conveyance was of two separate parcels, and that a breach of the third condition could have no effect with respect to the triangle adjoining on the northwest the 100-foot strip that lay within the filed route of the railroad. We do not so interpret the instrument. The conveyance was of a single tract, describing it by metes and bounds. It was not even provided that the passenger station contemplated should be wholly within the northwest triangle. The conveyance was plainly an entirety.

4. That performance of the conditions of the conveyance was waived. There was no evidence of any waiver. Mere delay in asserting the right of re-entry cannot prejudice that right where the question of performance itself is one of reasonable time. Indulgence in such a case is no waiver.

5. That there was incidental error in the charge. An assumption of the trial judge of a purpose of the grantors, in imposing century many grants of this kind came under the consideration of the courts, particularly in the litigation over the validity of reservations of rent in grants included in the Van Rensselaer manor, and much learning is embodied in the opinions of the courts wherein these grants are under discussion. In Van Rensselaer v. Hays, 19 N. Y. 68, 75 Am. Dec. 278, it was held that an annual rent reserved by deed with clause of distress upon a grant in fee was valid as a rent-charge although there was no reversion in the person entitled to it, and that, by virtue of chap. 98 of the Laws of 1803, the devisee of the grantor might maintain covenant against the grantee; and in Van Rensselaer v. Ball, 19 N. Y. 100, it was likewise held that the devisee of the grantor might maintain ejectment under the right of re-entry devised to him as appurtenant to the rent-charge. The common-law rule and the statutory change applicable to the case are concisely stated by Judge Denio in writing the opinion of the court as follows: "But, assuming that the estate conveyed to William Ball [the grantee in the deed in fee reserving rent in question] was defeasible by the nonperformance of the condition to pay the annual rent; no one but the grantor or his heirs could, at common law, enter for the breach of a condition subsequent. (Litt. § 347; Co. Litt. 214b; 4 Kent, Com. 127; Nicol v. New York & E. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 121.) 'This was the consequence of a maxim of the common law, that nothing in action, entry, or re-entry, could be granted over; for, as Coke says: 'Under color thereof, pretended titles might be granted to great men, whereby right might be trodden down and the weak oppressed, which the common law forbiddeth, as men to grant before they be in possession.' (Co. Litt. supra.) The reason upon which this maxim was founded has, no doubt, become in great measure obsolete; still, the principle that a right of entry cannot in general be granted over is, I am inclined to believe, still a part of the law, notwithstanding the tendency of modern decisions and the provisions of the Code. This, then, is the first difficulty in the plaintiff's case. He brings this action as the assignee, by devise, of the grantor, and not as his heir; and he is disabled from maintaining the action, unless the act of 1803, and its different re-enactments, apply to the case. (Laws 1803, chap. 98; 1 Rev. Laws 1813, 364, § 3; 1 Rev. Stat. 748, § 25.) I have elsewhere stated the origin and history of the series of enactments in favor of the assignees of reversions, of which this forms a supplement, and have shown that it enabled the grantees of a perpetual rent-charge to maintain an action on the covenants for the payment of rent. But the original statute of 32 Hen. VIII. (chap. 34) gives to the assignee mentioned in it, not only a remedy by action, but the 'like advantages' 'by entry for nonpayment of the rent,' which the grantors might have had; and this feature is preserved in the re-enactments in this state (2 Jones & V. 184; 1 Rev. Laws 1813, 363, § 1); and, in the Revised Statutes of 1830, the expression is that the assignees 'shall have the same remedies by entry, action, or otherwise,' as their grantor or lessor had or might have had. (Vol. 1, 747, § 23.) Then follows the provision first introduced by the act of 1805, and continued in the revisions, that this provision shall extend to grants or leases in fee, reserving rents, as well as to leases for life or years. But in all the acts the expression is retained which is found in the statute of Henry VIII., 'as if the reversion had remained in such lessor or grantor.' In grants in fee, there being no reversion, these words are inapplicable, or, at least, incongruous; and, to make the provisions coherent, they should be read as though the language were, 'as if said right of entry had remained in the lessor or grantor;' or this particular expression in the statutes should be limited to the cases embraced in the provisions where the grantor had a reversion, and be dropped in the cases where it is made to relate to grants in fee, upon the rule of construction reddendo singula singulis. No one can for a moment doubt the intention of the legislature to confer upon the assignees of a grantor in fee reserving rent, the remedy by entry for the nonpayment of such rent, precisely as the grantor himself had it before he parted with the right. In other words, the design is plain to make the right of entry transferable, and thus to change, to this extent, in favor of this class of conditions, the rule of the common law. This is so manifest to my mind from the reading of the statutes, that anything I could further say would be likely to obscure, rather than to elucidate, it."

In Van Rensselaer v. Read, 26 N. Y. 558, the decision in Van Rensselaer v. Hays, is again examined, and the principle therein laid down is affirmed.

In Van Rensselaer v. Dennison, 35 N. Y. 303, it was further held, in reference to the character of the rent-charge, which carried with it when assigned the right of re-entry, that, while such rent was not an estate in the land, it was an incorporeal hereditament devisable and assignable. To the same effect are Van Rensselaer v. Barringer, 39 N. Y. 9; Hosford v. Bal conditions on their conveyance, that their remaining land should be made more valuable and accessible, is criticised. The idea seems to be that no such purpose was expressed, and that the remarks to the jury on that subject bore unfairly on the question of reasonable time of constructing a double-track railway over the strip conveyed. We see no ground for criticism. The purpose suggested was inherent in the premises.

6. That the plaintiff below showed no right in himself, (a) because a right of entry for condition broken is not transferable after breach, (b) or, if at all, not in partition proceedings. There seems to be no good reason why, even before June 28, 1893, the date of the deed given by Reichard to Salter, a double-track railway might not have been constructed over the 100-foot strip conveyed by the deed of March 22, 1889, which was made on condition of such a construction. Consequently, if a right of entry for condition broken cannot, after breach, be legally assigned, the trial judge should have complied with some or one of the requests to charge, above recited, that were based on that doctrine. I find nothing definite said by the old reporters or law writers on the subject of transfer of rights of entry for condition broken, until Littleton, treating of estates upon condition, after noting the requirement of the law as to the reserving of rent, wrote thus, as prefatory to a statement that the grant of the reversion of leased lands did not convey a right of entry for breach of condition to pay rent: Le second chose est, que nul entrie ou re-entrie (que est tout un) peut être reservee ne done a aucun person, forsque tantolement al lard, 39 N. Y. 147; Central Bank v. Heydorn, 48 N. Y. 268; Tyler v. Teidorn, 46 Barb. 439.

In Van Rensselaer v. Slingerland, 26 N. Y. 580, it was held that the Laws of 1846, chap. 274, § 3, abolishing distress for rent, recognised the assignable quality of a condition for re-entry for nonpayment of rent reserved in a grant in fee, and gave to the assignee of the rent the same right to maintain ejectment as to grants made prior to its passage as was given by Laws of 1806, chap. 98.

In People ex rel. Rosekrans v. Haskins, 7 Wend. 463, the court says: "A rent-charge,—that is, a rent reserved upon a lease in fee with right of re-entry and distress,—is an interest in lands which is bound by a judgment, and may be sold on execution as real estate." Contra, it is held in Payn v. Beal, 4 Denio, 405, "that rent reserved on a lease in fee is neither lands, tenements, nor real estate within the meaning of the statute authorizing the sale of lands on execution."

In Cagger v. Lansing, 64 N. Y. 417, in discussing the legal effect of a referee's report in an action in ejectment brought by the devisee of the first Van Rensselaer, the court says: "The report did find, then, as fact, that there was a grant in fee of the lands, with a charge upon them of a yearly rent in perpetuity, to the grantor, his heirs and assigns, with clauses for an entry and for distress for rent. The interest in the rent owned by the grantor, as matter of law from those facts, was an estate in it in fee simple. . . . It was such an interest in land as may be levied upon for the debt of him who owns it."

In Cruiger v. McClaughry, 51 Barb. 642, affirmed in 41 N. Y. 219, it was held that one of several heirs of a grantor of the fee reserving rent may maintain ejectment for his undivided share of the fee on proof of condition broken. It was held that, while a rent-charge cannot be apportioned by act of the parties, it can be by descent as act of the law, so as to enable each heir to sue upon the covenant for his share of the rent; and that the statute (1 Rev. Stat. 505, § 33) giving "the landlord" right to maintain ejectment on nonpayment of the rent was intended to give to each of several heirs the right to maintain ejectment for his portion of the estate.

b. After breach where the law against maintenance is not in force.

Another exception to the rule that the right of entry for condition broken is not transferable is set forth in BOUVIER v. BALTIMORE & N. 60 L. R. A.

Y. R. Co., holding that, as the reason for denying the quality of transferability after breach of condition is founded upon the law of maintenance, where the law against maintenance is not in force the reason does not exist, and the right is transferable.

The case of McKissick v. Pickle, 16 Pa. 140, cited in BOUVIER v. BALTIMORE & N. Y. R. Co., was as follows: The plaintiff in ejectment claimed as one of the grantees on condition. The defendant was in possession under purchase of the grantor's interest at a sheriff's sale under execution against the grantor. The court held that there was no breach of the condition, but adds: "On this point we think the judgment must be reversed. But, as the cause goes down for another trial, it becomes necessary to notice another point, and that is, Can the sheriff's vendee enter for a condition broken? The deed provides that the property shall revert to the party of the first part, and to his heirs and assigns. . . . That a grantor cannot reserve such a right will hardly be contended, as in Pennsylvania there is no policy of law which forbids it. The law against maintenance has never been adopted in this state. The reason assigned why a condition in England could not be assigned is because no title could be made to land held by another adversely, as that was against the law which forbade maintenance. And hence, the usual rule that none but the grantor or his heirs can enter for condition broken. This reason does not apply here, where the grantor expressly reserves the right. . . . This is a fair case for the application of the maxim Cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex."

It was also held, on the authority of Hayden v. Stoughton, 5 Pick. 528 (cited in the next following paragraph), that the right of the grantor before breach was subject to levy and sale under execution. The court adds: "The interest of Ferguson therefore, whatever it was, passed to the sheriff's vendee, and as such his vendee had a right of entry by the express terms of the deed. In a condition at law it is true that none but the grantor and his heirs can enter for condition broken. No assignee or stranger can do so. But I know of no rule of policy in this state where the ancient doctrine of maintenance does not prevail, which prohibits a grantor or deviser from directing otherwise."

c. As to devise.

The Massachusetts cases holding that a right of entry is devisable without a statutory change in the common law are at variance with the general rule. The case of Hayden v. Stoughton, feoffor ou al donor, ou al lessor, ou a lour heires; et tiel re-enter ne poyt estre grant a un auter person. The date of the publication of the Tenures is unknown, but Littleton died A. D. 1481. The statute of uses (27 Hen. VIII. chap. 10), passed A. D. 1535, gave opportunity for much amelioration in the transfer of rights in land, but beyond the introduction of conditional limitations, by which estates might be granted in remainder on breach of condition of the first grantee's title, there seems to have been no judicial modification of Littleton's doctrine, and no legislative relief, except that in 1540, by 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 34, the benefit of conditions in leases, for life or years, reserving rent, were allowed to pass with the reversion. On the other hand, in the same year, Parliament enlarged the pretended titles act of A. D. 1377 (1 Rich. II. chap.

9), by 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 9, forbidding bargain, sale, or purchase of rights or titles in land where the grantor was not in possession. Not long afterwards Montagu, chief justice, declared that this statute was largely affirmatory. Partridge v. Strange, 1 Plowd. 77, 88. Coke, writing before A. D. 1628, in his comment on Littleton's declaration, gives the reason of the doctrine as follows: "Que nul entrie, etc., . . . Here Littleton reciteth one of the maxims of the common law; and the reason hereof is for the avoyding of maintenance, suppression of right and stirring up of suits, and therefore nothing in action, entrie or re-entrie can be granted over; for so under colour thereof pretended titles might be granted to great men whereby right might be trodden downe and the weake oppressed, which the common law forbiddeth as men to grant before they

5 Pick. 528, decided in 1827, involved a devise of real estate to a town as a site for a school-house and with a provision that it should be built within 100 rods of the place where a meeting-house stood. It was held to be a condition subsequent, and that the right of entry passed to the residuary devisee under the will, and not to the heir. The right of entry was treated as a contingent interest, remaining in the deviser, and devisable by him.

In Harrison v. Foote, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 576, 80 S. W. 838, the instrument in question was held to create a conditional limitation, and not an estate upon condition subsequent; but the court adds that if it were the latter the result would be the same, "as we think," on the ground that the interest of the grantor on condition would pass to the defendants as his residuary devisees, on the authority of Hayden v. Stoughton, cited in the last preceding paragraph.

Hayden v. Stoughton, is approved, also, in Kenner v. American Contract Co. 9 Bush. 202; but in that case the devisee was held to have waived the condition.

The case of Doe ex dem. Wells v. Scott, 3 Maule & S. 300, cited as an authority in Hayden v. Stoughton, does not seem to be a parallel case. The will in that case contained a devise to J. M. provided that, within six months after the decease of the testator, he assured to R. M. and his children certain premises. The will contained a residuary devise. Both J. M. and R. M. died unmarried before the testator. The case simply held that it was not a lapsed devise resulting in intestacy as to the property designated, but that the contingency of a forfeiture of the devise to J. M. such as actually occurred must have been within the intent of the testator, and that in that event she intended the estate to pass by her residuary devise.

Brigham v. Shattuck, 10 Pick. 306, decided in 1830, is similar to Hayden v. Stoughton. That, also, was a devise of lands to a town upon condition with a general residuary clause, and it was held that the residuary devisee, not the heir, could take advantage of the breach of the condition. The court says: "Upon the hypothesis that the devise was conditional, here was a contingent reversionary interest to arise upon the happening of the forfeiture by a breach of a condition subsequent. This interest was capable of being devised, and the residuary devise is broad enough to embrace it."

It will be noted that the two cases last cited both depend upon a devise of real estate upon condition with a general residuary clause in the will. It is suggested by the learned author of the article on Estates upon condition, 1 Am. 60 L. R. A.

Law. Rev. 265, cited under I., supra, that these cases might be sustained as relating, in effect, to conditional limitations taking effect by way of executory devise, and therefore not exceptions to the rule now under consideration, inasmuch as by will a fee can be limited upon a fee. But the same writer admits that no such explanation can be given of the later case of Austin v. Cambridgeport, 21 Pick. 215. That was a grant on condition subsequent. The grantor made his will which included a general residuary clause. After the death of the testator a breach of the condition occurred. It was held that the right to take advantage of the breach passed to the residuary devisee, and that the heir of the grantor could not maintain an action to recover the property. The court says: "No difficulty exists in the case on the ground of any adverse possession at the time of making the devise, as the premises were held by a concurrent, and not an adverse, title. The interest of the testator and the tenants, united, composed only the entire fee-simple estate,—as much so as in the ordinary case of an estate for life to A, remainder to B. Nor does any objection arise on the ground of any change in the nature of the interest between the time of making the will and the death of the testator. The interest of the testator at both these periods of time was not a present right of entry, but a contingent possible estate. That such an interest is devisable in England seems well established by the case of Jones v. Roe, 3 T. R. 88, and the cases there cited." The case of Jones v. Roe, however, seems hardly an authority for the doctrine mentioned, as the court says in the latter case: "The short question is whether the interest which a person takes by virtue of an executory devise be or be not devisable." It was simply held that under the statute of wills, 34 and 35 Hen. VIII. chap. 5, such an interest was devisable as an interest in lands. The court expressly says: "This does not include a bare possibility or hope of succession, but a possibility coupled with an interest."

One Eaton, who was the owner of two adjoining lots of land, sold lot A, upon which there was a store building, to defendants, and retained lot B as a residence, the deed of lot A containing the words "upon the express condition that said W [the grantee], his heirs and assigns, shall never erect any building nearer the street line of said land than the store building now thereon." Plaintiff claimed by means conveyances from Eaton as the owner of B, and brought an action to restrain the defendants from extending the store nearer the street. It was held that the deed of lot A was upon con-be in possession." Co. Litt. 214a. About the same time, in his remarks upon Lampet's Case, 10 Coke, 46, 48, he wrote of "the great wisdom and policy of the sages and founders of our law, who have provided that no possibility, right, title, nor thing in action shall be granted . . . to strangers, for that would be the occasion of multiplying of contentions and suits, of great oppression of the people and chiefly of tenants and the subversion of the due and equal execution of justice." To the same effect is the declaration in Bacon's Abridgment, the foundation of which work is generally attributed to Chief Baron Gilbert: "A possibility, right of entry, or thing in action, or cause of suit, or title for a condition broken, cannot be granted or assigned over by law; for, if this were permitted, it would promote maintenance, and prove prejudicial to such as, being able to contend with those with whom the original contract was, dition subsequent, and did not create a restriction for the benefit of the owner of lot A. The court says: "It must be held, therefore, that the deed from Eaton to the defendants conveyed a conditional fee, and that the right of reverter remaining in the grantor up to the time of his death went to his heirs or devisees." Clapp v. Wilder, 176 Mass. 332, 337, 50 L. R. A. 120, 57 N. E. 692.

Where a grantor conveyed land upon condition, but remained in possession and devised the land to defendant, who continued in possession, it was held that the defendant could not enter upon her own possession for condition broken, but that she had an equity which was sufficient to defend her possession in an action by the plaintiff to recover the land. There had been a judgment for defendant, and the court granted a new trial for errors in instructions to the jury upon other points. Thompson v. Thompson, 9 Ind. 323, 68 Am. Dec. 638.

C. Easements on condition.

The rule against a conveyance of a right of entry seems not to apply where an easement is granted on condition, and the right to take advantage of a breach of the condition may be regarded as appurtenant to the servient tenement. A grantee of the fee of land which is burdened with an easement, the easement having been granted upon condition subsequent, may maintain an action in equity for specific performance of the condition, or, in default thereof, for a decree that the easement has been forfeited for condition broken. Pinkum v. Eau Claire, 81 Wis. 301, 51 N. W. 550.

In Reichenbach v. Washington Short Line R. Co. 10 Wash. 357, 38 Pac. 1126, plaintiffs and others had conveyed to one Mason a right of way across certain lots, the conveyance being upon condition subsequent. After a breach of the condition the other owners conveyed their interest in the lots to plaintiffs, and an action was brought to procure a cancellation of the deeds and possession of the land. It was held that the deed had conveyed merely an easement, and that the rule against an assignment of right of entry did not apply, and that the right to take advantage of an abandonment necessarily passed to the owner of the servient tenement, whoever he might be.

IV. Summary.

Where an estate in land is granted, whether for years, for life, or in fee, the existence of a condition subsequent in no way lessens the quantity of the estate granted. The grantor is divested of the entire estate of the term or the fee, and the grantee is invested with the same estate. The effect of the condition is simply that, if a breach shall occur, the grantor shall have a right to re-enter and thereby become re-vested with his former estate. Before breach this is regarded as a mere possibility, coupled with no interest in the land, and therefore no more transferable by act of the grantor than the possibility that he to whom he has conveyed an estate may voluntarily reconvey. The death of the grantor, however, does not extinguish the possibility, and the right to take advantage of it passes to his heir. After breach of the condition, what was before a mere possibility becomes a right to secure a reversion of the former estate by entry, or by action at law. Until such entry or action the quantity of the estate of the grantee is still unimpaired. If the right of entry is never exercised, the estate remains as before. The grantee still has possession with all the advantages which by the common law belong to possession. Under feudal conditions, he who was out of possession was likely to be tempted to part with his claim to those who might gain possession by force or favor, rather than by right. To avoid this, and to discourage maintenance, the common law forbade the transfer of rights of entry. Not only was a deed purporting to convey a right of entry ineffective to transfer the right to the grantee, but, by virtue of the forfeiture imposed in the early statutes as a penalty for an attempted transfer of such a right, the deed operated to destroy the right in the grantor. There was, however, nothing in the spirit of the law or the letter of the statutes to prevent a release of the right by the grantor to the grantee or one claiming under the grantee, and such a release operated to extinguish the possibility of a right if before breach, or the right of entry if after breach. In most of the states the common-law rule, as stated above, so far as applicable to grants in fee upon condition, is still in force.

The rule against transfers of rights of entry as applied to estates for years and for life was relaxed by statute 32 Hen. VIII., chap. 34, permitting the benefit of conditions to pass with the reversion. This statute has generally, and in substance, been re-enacted in this country. In New York, where grants in fee, reserving rent, were formerly in use, there was similar statutory authority for transfer of the benefit of conditions as incident to a transfer of the rent. In Connecticut and New Jersey statutes have been passed authorizing the transfer of the benefit of conditions in grants in fee before breach, and in California the right of entry itself after breach is made transferable by statute. In New Jersey and Pennsylvania the law against maintenance is held not to be in force, and, therefore, the transfer of a right of entry after breach of condition is without obstacle. In Massachusetts the decisions seem not to be entirely consistent with each other, and some of them to be at variance with the current of authority elsewhere. The rule against maintenance, with its penalty of forfeiture, is held to be in force, and a right of entry after breach of condition is held not to be assignable; but it is also held that, before breach, the right is "a contingent possible estate," and as such is devisable. Where an easement is granted on condition, the right to take advantage of the breach may be transferred with the dominant tenement as appurtenant thereto.

might find themselves depressed by a powerful adversary." Title Assignment, A, and substantially the same statement, title Grants, D. Mr. Hargrave, in note 212, Co. Litt., expresses the same view.

It is needless to quote other writers or judges. All who give a reason for the doctrine ascribe it to the judicial desire to prevent maintenance. A distinction not always clearly made should, however, be borne in mind. Before breach, as in case of any determinable fee, there is in the grantor only a possibility of reverter. 4 Kent, Com. *11, note; Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 121. After breach there is a vested right. Judge Hare in his note to Dumport's Case, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. *112, perspicuously states this distinction: "Before breach the reason why an assignee cannot take advantage of a condition really depends upon the inherent incapacity of the condition itself. But after breach the condition itself is gone, and there arises in its stead, whatever may be its terms, in the case of freehold estates, at all events when created by a common-law conveyance, a right or title of entry which is as little capable of assignment as the condition, although the obstacle to its assignment is of a different nature, arising out of the policy of the common law and the provisions of the statute of maintenance, which forbade the sale or transfer of claims or demands unsustained by possession and resting solely in entry or action." In most of the states of the Union it has been assumed that the English doctrine of nontransferability of rights of entry for condition broken is the law, and so it well may be as to attempted transfers before breach; but after breach it would seem that the test must be the existence or nonexistence of the English law as to maintenance. Judge Hare, after the passage cited, argues that even in those states like Pennsylvania, where it had been declared that the English statutes on that subject had never been adopted, an incapacity of transfer should still be maintained, for the reason that the title of the grantee on condition will endure until re-entry; but the argument is aside from the point. It is not the land, but the right of entry, that is the subject of the transfer. In Pennsylvania, after Judge Hare wrote, the question came before the supreme court for decision, and it was held, in a case where the condition was reserved to the grantor and his assigns, that the right of entry was subject to sale. Rogers, J., said: "This is a fair case for the application of the maxim, Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex." McKissick v. Pickle, 16 Pa. 140. In the case in hand it will have been noticed that the right of entry for breach of condition was reserved to the assigns, but I do not regard that as essential. I think that in any case, wherever the English law against maintenance is not in force, a right of entry for condition broken should be held transferable after breach of the condition. Before breach I think transfer, to be legal, must be authorized by legislation.

In England, as before stated, by 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 34, the benefit of condition in leases for life or years, reserving rent, was allowed to pass with the reversion. By the wills act of 1837 (1 Vict. chap. 26, § 3) all rights of entry for condition broken were made devisable, and in 1844, by 7 & 8 Vict. chap. 76, § 5, they were made assignable. This later legislation was the prototype of an enactment in this state approved March 14, 1851 (1 Gen. Stat. p. 881), by which, under the title "An Act to Authorize the Transfer of Estates in Expectancy," such rights were included within an authority to devise, convey, assign, or charge by deed contingent or executory interests and future estates, and interests in expectancy in lands, tenements, and hereditaments. An attempt was made in the recent revision of some of our statutes to transfer the provisions of this one to the "Act Concerning Conveyances," where it appears as § 19 (Pamph. L. 1898, p. 676); but as the repealer of the original act (Pamph. L. 1898, p. 711) has the similar title of "An Act to Repeal Sundry Acts Respecting Conveyances," we may disregard this attempt, which is very desirable, as the legislation is meant to embrace devises, assignments, and charges, and the new title may be deemed to be inadequate. The difficulty I find in relying in all cases on this statute inheres in the expression that it is only on the happening of a contingency that a right is to vest in the transferee. This language does not appear in 7 & 8 Vict., and it seems to me that its effect must be to limit the authority of transfer, as far as rights of entry for condition broken are concerned, to a transfer before breach of the condition, and that is the contention of the plaintiff in error. It is suggested, also, that the proviso in the act that no chose in action shall thereby be made assignable at law excepts rights of entry, after breach, from its operation; but I do not take that view. Some judges have spoken of the right, after breach, as a mere chose in action, but the designation is inaccurate. A right of entry is an interest in land. A chose in action is, perhaps, not definable with exactness, but it certainly is not that. It does not extend, even under modern legislation, beyond a right to recover debt or damages or some interest in personalty. The Victorian statute included personal property, and the proviso was appropriate. It probably was retained in our act through inadvertence, unless its application was intended to be to hereditaments having some characteristics of personalty. In Cornelius v. Den ex dem. Ivins, 26 N. J. L. 376, our statute was given effect in the supreme court in a case where it is not clear, from the opinion, whether the devise upheld was before or after breach. The decision, of course, is not controlling in this court.

But, although it may be that the statute only authorizes a transfer before breach, I think a transfer after breach is also valid for the reason that moved the supreme court of Pennsylvania to a like decision. I would not say, as did that court, that a right of entry can be levied on and sold in execution, but I think that in this state it may be transferred, at the will of the holder. In Schomp v. Schenck, 40 N. J. L. 195, 204, 29 Am. Rep. 219, it was rightly held in the supreme court that the English law against maintenance is not in force in New Jersey. The opinion of Chief Justice Beasley in that case makes this very clear. He says: "By the act of November 24, 1792 (Pamph. L. 794), Judge Paterson was authorized to collect and put in form all the statutes of England and of this state which then remained in force here, and Mr. Griffith, in referring to the revision that was the result of this authority, says that the compiler 'omitted, as inapplicable, the English statutes relative to the buying and selling of titles (1 Rich. II. chap. 9; 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 9), as he did also those against maintenance. 1 Edw. III. chap. 14; 20 Eliz. chap. 4, etc. Also of Champerty, 3 Edw. I. chap. 25; 28 Edw. I. chap. 11.' The question then arises, What was the meaning of this omission? I can perceive no other solution except the inference that Judge Paterson considered them neither a part of the statute law of this state nor as adapted to our circumstances. By the Constitution of 1776 it was declared, in article 22, 'that the common law of England, as well as so much of the statute law as have been heretofore practised in this colony, shall still remain in force, until they shall be altered by a future law of the legislature;' and when, therefore, this particular series of acts was not comprised in this accurate and authentic compilation of the laws in force, it seems manifest that such leaving out was a meditated exclusion. If it be said that such a rejection of the statute law did not affect the common law, and that by the common law maintenance was prohibited, my answer is that, since the publication of the body of selected laws just referred to, there is no trace of the prevalence of any part of such a doctrine, either in our practice, judicial dicta, or decisions. It is obvious that Mr. Griffith inferred that the entire doctrine of maintenance and champerty was thought by Judge Paterson to be 'inapplicable' to the polity of this state. And, although in some of the older legal digests and commentaries the doctrine of maintenance is said to be a part of the common law, nevertheless I am strongly of the opinion that it would be altogether impracticable to ascertain of what rules such doctrine consisted, as embodied in that ancient system." He then goes on, most eruditely, to show that there is the best reason for believing that, although often spoken of as appears above by the old writers as part of the common law, maintenance is entirely the creature of English statutory law, and of the judicial construction of such law, and that the consequence is that when this set of acts was designedly left out of our statute book there existed no rational ground for the contention that any part of the law of maintenance in any form remained in force in this state. He points out 60 L. R. A.

also the destructive effect on the doctrine of the act of March 17, 1713-14 (Paterson's Laws, p. 6; 1 Gen. Stat. p. 877, § 119), which gives to the grantee to uses "as full and ample possession" of lands as if he were "possessed thereof by solemn livery of seisin and possession." That statute alone seems to me to authorize a transfer after breach of a right of entry for condition broken. It differs from the English statute of uses in many particulars, being far more liberal in its provisions. Melick v. Pidcock, 44 N. J. Eq. 525, 542, 15 Atl. 3. I am aware that there is the weight of the opinion of Chief Justice Green in the supreme court in the case of Den ex dem. Southard v. Central R. Co. 26 N. J. L. 13, that except for the act of March 14 1851, there could be no such transfer, but this aspect of the case was not presented to his mind.

It is said that choses in action have always been held in this state to be "not assignable" at law, except by statute. Such is the expression used in an opinion in this court. Ruckman v. Outcater, 28 N. J. L. 571. Even taken literally, that would not preclude a different decision as to rights of entry for condition broken; for there are considerations other than the mere prevention of maintenance that have influenced the judicial attitude towards choses in action. The protection of the rights of the defendant against the assignor has been the main care of the courts, and is always afforded in enabling statutes such as that of this state. 2 Gen. Stat. p. 2591, § 340. But all that is meant by such an expression as that quoted is that a chose in action was not assignable so as to permit the assignee to sue in his own name in a court of law. Subject to that restriction, even in England, from a very early day, choses in action have been assignable in fact, and no consideration of the prevention of maintenance has been allowed to prevail. Dacey, Parties, 67; Wald's Pollock, Contracts, 202; Buller, J., in Masters v. Miller, 4 T. R. 321, 340. That there was no inherent nonassignability appears from the fact that the restriction was never imposed on an assignee of the Crown. Ibid. Chief Justice Hornblower in Allen v. Pancoast, 20 N. J. L. 68, cleared up the confusion that had existed on the subject, and Carpenter, J., in Parsons v. Woodward, 22 N. J. L. 196, 206, said that the ancient rule that choses in action were not assignable only remained to give form to legal proceedings to collect them, so that, ordinarily, it was necessary to sue at law in the name of the original claimant; the holder being treated rather as an attorney than as assignee. In equity any possibility, right, or expectancy may, for valuable consideration, be assigned. Bacon v. Bonham, 33 N. J. Eq. 614. I can see no reason to deny efficacy at law to a conveyance, devise, or other transfer of a vested right of entry. There seems to be no technical obstacle in the way of such a transfer, and there certainly is no other.

We are next to inquire if there can be compulsory partition of land in which the parties have only a right of entry for condition broken. If there can be no partition, then, of course, there can be no judicial sale, for that is a mere alternative, which must be resorted to where lands are incapable of actual partition. I am of the opinion that there can be no such partition. When this case was before the supreme court, Chief Justice Depue said that by the act of March 14, 1851, the mere right of entry at common law was "converted into an actual estate." With deference I must dispute that proposition. Whatever the scope of the act, it has no greater effect than to permit the transfer of the right; it does not and cannot affect its nature. In De Peyster v. Michael, 6 N. Y. 506, 57 Am. Dec. 470, the court of appeals of New York held that the enlargement of 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 34, by extending it to conveyances in fee reserving rent, "only authorized the transfer of a right, and did not convert it into a reversionary interest, or into any other estate." A division of the reversion destroys such a right, though assignable under that statute. Co. Litt. 215a; Taylor, Land. & T. § 296. A right of entry for condition broken is inherently indivisible. An entry by one of two or more joint grantors would inure to the benefit of all, and it is obvious that an attempt to sever the joint right before entry would be ineffectual although doubtless, where the right is assignable, one of the joint owners may assign his interest. The fact of such assignment simply puts the assignee in the place of the assignor. I find nothing in any statute of this state extending partition, or sale in lieu thereof, to a right of entry for condition broken. Furthermore, partition normally can be judicially compelled of such lands only as are in the possession of the parties to the proceedings. Stevens v. Enders, 13 N. J. L. 271; Re Burroughs, 13 N. J. L. 284, note. Our legislation extending the right of partition to remaindermen and reversioners depends upon the consent of the owner of the particular estate in possession. Smith v. Gaines, 39 N. J. Eq. 545. Entry, or its equivalent, is essential to the perfection of the right. Probably the beginning of a suit in ejectment will suffice. It was so adjudged in the supreme court in Cornelius v. Den ex dem. Ivins, 26 N. J. L. 376, and I do not question that decision, but until entry, or what is equivalent thereto, partition of the lands involved seems to me impossible. A right of entry for condition broken may be waived. The English statute of 7 & 8 Vict., above cited, was repealed in the year following its enactment. The present act of 8 & 9 Vict., chap. 106, extends only to "a right of entry," whether "immediate or after, and whether vested contingent, into or upon any tenements or hereditaments in England of any tenure." In Hunt v. Bishop, 8 Exch. 675, it was held that the new statute did not embrace rights of entry for condition broken; and in Jenkins v. Jones, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 128, 131, Jessel, M. R., suggests that the reason why a right of entry for condition broken is not assignable by virtue of that statute is that it was at the election of the person entitled to enter whether he would take advantage of the breach of the condition. It was not yet an estate. It was said in the supreme court in this case that the grantee of an estate on condition is not interested in the partition proceedings, and that a decree to which all persons in interest are parties is, as against him, effectual; but it must be remembered that the matter is jurisdictional, not as to persons only, but as to subject-matter. The doctrine laid down in the opinion of Chief Justice Beasley, in Munday v. Vail, 34 N. J. L. 418, which has become a classic on this subject, applies in full vigor.

There are cases holding that where a condition is imposed upon an estate for the benefit of other lands of the grantor it will pass with the title of the other lands. Merrifield v. Cobleigh, 4 Cush. 178, is such a decision. In the present case, had the sale been of the 100-acre tract, there would be room for argument that the benefit of the condition passed to the purchaser; but what was attempted was an independent decretal sale of the 5½ acres held by the railway company. I can find no support therefor.

But this conclusion does not dispose of the case adversely to the judgment. The purchasers at the sale in partition already held the right of entry in common with Hume. Although they took no title through such attempted sale, their previous right in the property remained. In their bargain and sale deed to Bouvier that right was embraced. Bouvier and Hume then held in common a right of entry or alternative suit. Either could exercise that right. One tenant in common may alone bring ejectment. 2 Gen. Stat. p. 1285, § 24. If the defendant had the right at all to object to non-joinder of the other, which is doubtful, he could only do so by notice, under § 37 of the practice act (2 Gen. Stat. p. 2539). Unless otherwise provided, the practice in personal actions is applicable in ejectment. 2 Gen. Stat. p. 1283, § 9. The direction to the jury was not erroneous.

It is assigned for error that the verdict was against the clear weight of evidence, but that is not assignable for error. Flanagan v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. 63 N. J. L. 647, 44 Atl. 762.

I shall vote to affirm this judgment.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York ex rel.
Louise NORTH, Appt.,
v.

James D. FEATHERSTONHAUGH et al.,
Respts.

(172 N. Y. 112.)

1. Whether or not the construction of a granite curb in place of an old one of bluestone is new work or the repair of old work is a question of fact, upon which the determination of the trial court is not reviewable on appeal.
2. The determination of a public improvement commission to construct a new curb, sustained by some evidence of its necessity, is not reviewable by the courts, where the commission has statutory authority to construct curbing whenever they deem the same necessary, and whenever, in their judgment, the public convenience requires it.
3. No illegal burden is placed on abutting property owners, who are required to bear the original cost of street paving, by a provision in the paving contract requiring the contractor to maintain the work for a period during which such a pavement, if properly laid, ought to wear, although the duty to repair pavements is by statute placed on the city at large.
4. Abutting owners subject to assessment for a street improvement cannot complain that the specifications required compliance with the labor law as to hours and wages, if, before the bids were received, the law had been declared unconstitutional, and the improvement commissioners announced that the requirements with reference to it would not be enforced, while the successful bidder testifies that the bid was not increased by reason of such law.
5. A provision in a contract for street improvement that laborers must be paid in cash, and not in store orders, will not be held to be unreasonable or illegal if it is authorized by statute.
6. That a notice of hearing as to a street improvement specified a brick pavement will not invalidate a determination to pave with asphalt and set a new curb, if the hearing covered those matters, and the statute empowered the commissioners to change or modify their original determination in reference to the improvement.
7. The proceedings of a public improvement commission in awarding a contract for street improvement are not reviewable by certiorari.

(October 7, 1902.)

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, confirming the determination of the public improvement commission of Cohoes in reference to a public improvement. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lewis E. Carr, with Messrs. MacLean & Doyle, for appellant:

Certiorari is the appropriate remedy, and brings up for review upon this appeal the entire proceedings had before, and taken by, the public improvement commission of the city of Cohoes in reference to the paving and recurring of Saratoga street, including the alleged illegal provisions contained in the specifications for such work.

N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2122, 2140; People ex rel. Ackerly v. Brooklyn, 8 Hun, 56; People ex rel. Mitchell v. Lawrence, 54 Barb. 580; People ex rel. Citizens' Gaslight Co. v. Brooklyn Bd. of Assessors, 39 N. Y. 81; People ex rel. Erie & G. Valley R. Co. v. Tubbs, 59 Barb. 401; People ex rel. Curtis v. Utica, 65 Barb. 9; Heywood v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 534; People ex rel. Cook v. Hildreth, 126 N. Y. 360, 27 N. E. 558.

The public improvement commission being a purely statutory body, the measure of its power is to be found solely in the legislative act which called it into being.

Schenectady v. Union College, 66 Hun, 179, 21 N. Y. Supp. 147.

The determination of the commission to construct granite curb along Saratoga street at the lot owners' expense was without legal authority. It was not new work, but a repair of old work.

People ex rel. Smith v. Brooklyn, 21 Barb. 484.

The requirements in the specifications that bidders must observe the provisions of the labor law were unwarranted and illegal.

People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 1, 52 L. R. A. 814, 59 N. E. 716; People ex rel. Treat v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 144, 59 N. E. 776; Meyers v. New York, 58 App. Div. 534, 69 N. Y. Supp. 529.

The requirements of the specifications that the contractor will be obliged to keep the pavement in repair without expense to the city for a period of eight years necessarily tended to impose upon property owners additional burdens, and were unwarranted and illegal.

People ex rel. Hall v. Maher, 56 Hun, 81, 9 N. Y. Supp. 94; Brown v. Jenks, 98 Cal. 10, 32 Pac. 701; Excelsior Paving Co. v. Leach (Cal.), 34 Pac. 116; Portland v. Bituminous Paving & Improv. Co. 33 Or. 307, 44 L. R. A. 527, 62 Pac. 28; McAllister v. Tacoma, 9 Wash. 272, 37 Pac. 447, 658; Boyd v. Milwaukee, 92 Wis. 456, 66 N. W.

NOTE.—For other cases in this series as to validity of guaranty of work or provision for repairs in contract for street improvement, see Portland v. Portland Bituminous Paving & Improv. Co. (Or.) 44 L. R. A. 527, and note; Robertson v. Omaha (Neb.) 44 L. R. A. 534; State ex rel. Wilson v. Trenton (N. J. L.) 44 L. R. A. 540; Seaboard Nat. Bank v. Woesten (Mo.) 48 L. R. Co. v. Hezel (Mo.) 48 L. R. A. 285; Alameda Macadamizing Co. v. Pringle (Cal.) 52 L. R. A. 264; Shank v. Smith (Ind.) 55 L. R. A. 564; and Blochman v. Spreckels (Cal.) 57 L. R. A. 218.

As to validity of statute fixing compensation which city must pay for labor or other service, see, in this series, People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler (N. Y.) 52 L. R. A. 814.

603; Fehler v. Gosnell, 99 Ky. 380, 35 S. W. 1125.

The requirement in the specifications in reference to the payment of the workmen is unreasonable and void.

Frorer v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492, 31 N. E. 395; State v. Loomis, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789, 22 S. W. 350; People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 19, 52 L. R. A. 814, 59 N. E. 716.

Mr. J. Newton Fiero, with Mr. Walter H. Wertime, for respondents Featherstonhaugh et al.:

The writ of certiorari will not lie, since the public improvement act, under which the action complained of was taken, provides another exclusive remedy.

The proceedings taken by the public improvement commission are neither judicial nor quasi judicial in their character, so far as their determination to curb and pave the street in question is concerned.

People ex rel. O'Connor v. Queens County, 153 N. Y. 370, 47 N. E. 790; People ex rel. Kennedy v. Brady, 166 N. Y. 44, 59 N. E. 701; People ex rel. Jamaica v. Queens County, 131 N. Y. 468, 30 N. E. 488.

Certiorari will not lie, since the proceeding is not completed, and no official determination or adjudication has been had.

People ex rel. Cuyler v. Palmyra, 3 Hun, 549; People ex rel. Dickinson v. Livingston County, 43 Barb. 232.

Where the relator has another remedy, even though that remedy is not exclusive, the writ of certiorari will not lie to review the proceedings of local public authorities with reference to public improvements.

People ex rel. Kimball v. St. Lawrence County, 25 Hun, 131; People ex rel. Dickinson v. Livingston County, 43 Barb. 232; People ex rel. Jamaica v. Queens County, 131 N. Y. 468, 30 N. E. 488; People ex rel. Gage v. Lohnas, 54 Hun, 604, 8 N. Y. Supp. 104; People ex rel. Kilner v. McDonald, 4 Hun, 187.

The public improvement commission has power to construct the curb along Saratoga street at the expense of the abutting property owners; and its action was legal, proper, and within the scope of its authority.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, pp. 335, 336, 413; Moran v. Troy, 9 Hun, 540; Re Furman Street, 17 Wend. 649; Denise v. Fairport, 11 Misc. 202, 32 N. Y. Supp. 97; Re Roberts, 25 Hun, 371; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 780, p. 959.

The specifications forming part of the contract requiring the contractor to keep the pavement in repair simply constitute a guaranty as to the character of the work, and not an agreement for subsequent repairs such as are required to be made by the city.

J. L. 599, 44 L. R. A. 540, 40 Atl. 575; Cole v. People, 161 Ill. 16, 43 N. E. 607.

An improvement contract is not invalid, as tending to increase the bids of contractors, and thereby impose upon abutting owners a burden properly resting upon the general public of the city, merely because it contains a stipulation that the contractor shall bear the expense of repairs during a certain period, if such stipulation is in effect a mere guaranty of the quality of the work and materials.

Schenectady v. Union College, 66 Hun, 179, 21 N. Y. Supp. 147; Brown v. Jenks, 98 Cal. 10, 32 Pac. 701; Osburn v. Lyons, 104 Iowa, 160, 73 N. W. 650; Fehler v. Gosnell, 99 Ky. 380, 35 S. W. 1125; Verdin v. St. Louis (Mo.), 27 S. W. 447.

Mr. Harry T. O'Brien, for respondent New York & Bermudez Co.:

The relator, by appearing before the public improvement commission and requesting that Saratoga street be paved with asphalt block, tacitly assented to the terms of the specifications under which the work would be done.

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court, upon the petition of the relator, issued a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings of the public improvement commission of the city of Cohoes in awarding a contract to the New York & Bermudez Company to curb and pave Saratoga street, in that city, from the south line of Newark street to the Mohawk river. On the 31st day of March, 1901, the public improvement commission of the city of Cohoes caused a map and general plans, with the specifications of the work to be done for the paving and curbing of Saratoga street in that city, to be filed in the office of the clerk of the city, together with an estimate by the engineer of the cost of the improvement. They then passed resolutions unanimously directing the improvement to be made, and that notice be given for a hearing of all persons interested. Thereupon a notice was published in the official paper of the city, in accordance with the provisions of the statute, of the determination made by the commissioners to pave Saratoga street between the points named with vitrified brick, and to construct a granite curb on each side of the street, with receiving basins, etc., and that a meeting of the commission would be held at their rooms in the city hall on the 4th day of April, 1901, to hear all persons interested in the improvement. On the day named for the meeting the relator and others appeared and filed a protest against the construction of the curbs with granite, and asked that the bluestone curbing, already in, be retained, and also filed a request that the pavement be made of asphalt blocks instead of vitrified bricks. Thereupon the hearing was, upon the request of the relator, adjourned until the 10th of April, 1901, at which time the testimony of several witnesses was taken, bearing upon the question of the necessity of the change from bluestone to granite curbing. At the conclusion of the testimony there was a further adjournment until the 24th of April, 1901, at which time bids were received, pursuant to a notice previously published, inviting bids for the proposed improvement with granite curbing, and with the paving of either sheet asphalt, asphalt blocks, granite, Medina sandstone, repressed vitrified brick, and pressed vitrified block. The relator then made further objections to the proceedings, covering all the points which we shall hereinafter consider. Thereupon the bids were opened, and subsequently the contract was awarded to the New York & Bermudez Company to pave the street with sheet asphalt and to construct the curbs of granite for the sum of $34,753.72.

The public improvement commission of the city of Cohoes was created by chapter 227 of the Laws of 1898, and derives its powers from the provisions of that act, as amended by chapter 550 of the Laws of 1899, chapter 213 of the Laws of 1900, and chapter 632 of the Laws of 1901. The amendment of 1901, having become a law after the contract herein referred to was issued, need not now be considered. The commission being a statutory body, we shall assume that the measure of its powers is confined to the legislative acts which called it into being.

The first contention on behalf of the relator is that the determination of the commission to construct a granite curb along Saratoga street at the lot owners' expense was without legal authority, and was not new work, but the repair of old work. We regard this contention as raising a question of fact, which was disposed of by the court below, and is not reviewable in this court. The evidence tended to show that the old curbing was of bluestone; that some portions of it had been in use for many years and were badly out of repair; that none of it was set in a concrete base, so as to prevent water from getting underneath; that the commissioners had determined to put the pavement and curbing upon a concrete base; that bluestone is composed of layers, some of which admit of the penetration of water, and when it freezes the stone is liable to crack; that in case of cracking it would necessitate the taking up of the curbing out of the concrete, and the insertion of new curbing, which would largely increase the original cost; that granite curb, when dressed and set in concrete, does not allow water to reach its base; and that it is not subject to cracking or deterioration by reason of the action of water or frost. After the conclusion of the testimony upon the subject, the commissioners made a personal examination of the existing curbing, and thereafter determined to construct the new curb of granite instead of bluestone. In their return they state that the reasons for the determination were "that in their opinion, for the pavement on a concrete base, it would be necessary to use a curb stronger than the bluestone, and a stone which is not a layer or sandstone; that, in their opinion, the water falling upon the top of bluestone curb frequently gets in between the layers, and a frost occurring under those conditions will separate the layers, and it is, in their opinion, impossible to distinguish between bluestone which will separate and one which will not." We think it cannot be held that there was not any evidence to sustain the determination of the commissioners. Under the statute the commission is given power to cause any street and highway in the city to be paved, "and to construct any and all curbstones at the curb line which it may deem necessary for properly paving or repaving." Section 4. Also the said commission shall have power to pave any street, highway, etc., and to construct all necessary curbstones for the purpose of such paving, "when and wherever the public convenience in their judgment requires the same." Section 6. It will thus be seen that the statute provides for the construction of curbing by the commissioners whenever they deem the same necessary, and whenever the public convenience in their judgment requires it; and the commissioners, as we have seen, have exercised their judgment upon the evidence to which we have alluded, and determined that it was for the best interest of the public that the curbing should be constructed of granite. No question of law arises thereon which we think is reviewable in this proceeding.

In the next place, it is contended that the requirement of the specifications that the contractor will keep the pavement in repair without expense to the city for a period of eight years necessarily tended to impose upon the property owners burdens which were unwarranted and illegal. Under the statute one half of the expense of paving the street was required to be borne by the real estate adjacent and contiguous to that part of the street which the commissioners determined to pave, and the other half was to be paid by the city at large. The specifications complained of are as follows:

Years Guaranty of Maintenance.

The contractor will be required to keep all his work in repair for the period of eight years from and after its acceptance by the city, without expense to the city. From the date of the acceptance of the work by the city the contractor guarantees the asphalt pavement, that he will keep it in repair for the period of eight years as a part of the cost of the work; that is to say, that, from a date commencing with the acceptance of the work by the city to a date eight years subsequent thereto, he will maintain the asphalt pavement. The maintenance consists in repairs, renewals, and furnishing materials necessary to maintain the surface of the street paved by the contractor, at all times, in a perfect state of uniformity; the uniformity of the street to be equal to that possessed by it when first accepted, and to be sufficient to present no marked hollows or projections, and not to admit of water standing in depressions either on the crown of the street or in the gutters. The surface of the street shall not show any cracks, scaling off, or other signs of disintegration by any action of the elements, and the pavement shall not show any wear greater than is usual with asphalt pavement of the best quality under equally heavy traffic. All imperfect work in the pavement, consisting of open joints, cracks, scaling off, or any other signs of failure, whenever found, are to be repaired in such manner as is prescribed heretofore for asphalt pavement.

Then follow provisions for restoring the pavement when the street has been opened by permission of the city or by water commissioners or abutting owners, but for such restoration the contractor is to be compensated.

In the case of People ex rel. Hall v. Maher, 50 Hun, 81, 9 N. Y. Supp. 94, the general term held that an ordinance of the city providing for the pavement of the street, containing a provision requiring the contractor to agree to keep the pavement in repair for seven years after its acceptance by the city without expense to the city, was in effect a charge of the cost of repairs upon the property of abutting owners, and was in violation of the provision of the charter which charges such expense upon the city at large. It will readily be seen that the question raised is one of considerable importance to the public, especially to the cities whose charters provide for the construction of pavement in streets at the expense of the abutting owners of real property, or the property benefited, and that the pavement, when constructed, shall be kept in repair at the expense of the city. Our attention has been called to no case in this court in which the question has been decided. In the case of Gilmore v. Utica, 131 N. Y. 26, 29 N. E. 841, the case of People ex rel. Hall v. Maher, 50 Hun, 81, 9 N. Y. Supp. 94, was distinguished, but the court apparently carefully refrained from approving of the conclusion there reached. In other jurisdictions the decisions appear to be in conflict. The cases of Brown v. Jenks, 98 Cal. 10, 32 Pac. 701; Excelsior Paving Co. v. Leach (Cal.) 34 Pac. 116; Portland v. Bituminous Paving & Improv. Co. 33 Or. 307, 44 L. R. A. 527, 52 Pac. 28; McAllister v. Tacoma, 9 Wash. 272, 37 Pac. 447, 658; Boyd v. Milwaukee, 92 Wis. 456, 66 N. W. 603,—may be said to be in accord with the doctrine of the case of People ex rel. Hall v. Maher, 50 Hun, 81, 9 N. Y. Supp. 94. The cases which may be said to entertain a different view are Kansas City v. Hanson, 60 Kan. 833, 58 Pac. 474; Latham v. Wilmette, 168 Ill. 153, 48 N. E. 311; Cole v. People, 161 Ill. 16, 43 N. E. 607; Allen v. Davenport, 107 Iowa, 90, 101, 77 N. W. 532; Osborn v. Lyons, 104 Iowa, 160, 73 N. W. 650; State, Wilson, Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 60 N. J. L. 394, 38 Atl. 635, 60 L. R. A.

In the case of Kansas City v. Hanson, 60 Kan. 833, 58 Pac. 474, the contractor agreed to maintain in good order the pavement for five years after its acceptance, and to make all repairs which may, from any imperfection in the work or material, or from any crumbling or disintegration, become necessary within that time. It was further agreed that whenever any repairs were made necessary, from the construction of sewers laying of pipes or telegraph wires, or from any disturbances of the pavement by parties acting under permit of the city engineer, the contractor should restore the street, and receive pay therefor. Under this contract, Doster, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "We feel quite clear that the instrument should be construed as an agreement to make such repairs only as became necessary on account of indifferent workmanship or defective material used by the contractor. In other words, it is a guaranty by the contractor of the quality of the material used, and the character of the work performed by him. The taking by the city council of such a guaranty cannot, in law, be held to increase the cost of the pavement, or to impose upon the property owners payment for future repairs." In Latham v. Wilmette, 168 Ill. 153, 48 N. E. 311, the specifications provided that the contractor shall, without extra compensation, keep in repair for a period of two years after its acceptance, by making good any settlement or derangement of lines or grades of curbs, gutters, and crossings, and by replacing defective materials or work in curbs, gutters, crossings, and pavements. It was held that "this specification is no more than a guaranty that the work has been properly done, and the contractor makes the agreement to repair if defective." In the case of Cole v. People, 161 Ill. 16, 43 N. E. 607, the provisions of the bond required the contractor, without further compensation, to "keep in continuous good repair all pavement laid under this contract for a period of five years." Justice Magruder, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The provision complained of, which is quoted above, is merely a warranty or guaranty of the fitness of the material for the use intended. There is nothing in the provision to indicate that any of the money raised by special taxation is to be applied to the purpose of maintaining the pavement and keeping it in repair." In the case of Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Ullman, 137 Mo. 543, 38 S. W. 458, the contract for paving included an agreement to maintain the pavement without further cost for five years. It was held that the contract did not thereby put upon the adjacent property owners any part of the cost of repairing; that the contract was a guaranty, and nothing more, for a sound pavement at the outset. In the case of Wilson v. Trenton, the contract guaranteed the endurance of the pavement for a period of five years, and the contractor agreed to maintain it in good condition, at his own expense, during that period. It was held that the repairs contemplated by the provisions of the contract were only those which arise from lack of durability of the pavement, and that such provision does not impose upon landowners abutting upon the street any burden other than that of having the pavement well constructed at the outset. We do not deem it necessary to specifically refer to the other cases above cited.

The paving companies, in their endeavor to induce municipal governments to adopt their pavement, are not slow in making representations as to its character and durability, and it would seem proper that some remedy should be preserved to the municipalities by which they can enforce their contracts and the representations of paving companies in this regard. It is true that the municipalities may employ inspectors to watch the pavement as it is laid, but this right has not proved to be an adequate protection to the cities. Contractors are anxious to make a large profit out of their contracts, and the temptation is strong to use cheap material and slight the work whenever it is possible for them to do so. In asphalt pavement, its durability depends very largely upon the character of the work, the condition of the foundation for the pavement, and the mixture of the material used; and it is not difficult on the part of the companies to deceive the inspectors in regard thereto. A guaranty on the part of the company as to the durability of the pavement affords a simple and complete remedy, which fully protects the public; and, when the time for which the guaranty continues is no longer than the ordinary durability of the pavement when laid with the best workmanship and material, it is not in contravention of the provisions of a municipal charter requiring repairs to be made at the expense of the city at large. Returning to a consideration of the specifications, we find them headed by the words, "Years Guaranty of Maintenance." Then follows a provision to the effect that the contractor will be required to keep all his work in repair for a period of eight years. Then, again, the contractor "guarantees the asphalt pavement," that he will keep it in repair "as a part of the cost of the work." Then, again, the specifications proceed to define what is meant by "keeping in repair,"—that he is to maintain uniformity of surface, and allow no hollows or projections that will admit of water standing in the depressions, and the surface of the street shall not crack, scale off, or disintegrate by the action of the elements, and shall show no wear greater than is usual to asphalt pavement of the best quality in equally heavy traffic; all imperfect work, consisting of open joints, cracks, scaling off, or signs of failure, is to be repaired. Then, again, the displacement or derangement caused by cuts or trenches made by others, or the authority of the city, shall be paid for. There does not appear to be any controversy that the asphalt pavement, properly constructed with proper material upon a concrete base, will remain in good condition for the period named in the specifications, or even for a longer time. And we think the repairs required by the contract have reference to making good the imperfect work done, or the defective material used therein,—in other words, that it is in effect a guaranty as to the quality and character of the pavement. If we are correct as to this construction of the specifications, it follows that no additional burden was imposed upon the abutting property owners by reason of the eight-year requirement.

It is further contended that the requirement of the specifications that bidders must observe the provisions of the labor law invalidates the contract. The specifications invite the attention of contractors to the public act relating to the limitation of the daily service of laborers and mechanics upon the public works of the cities of the state, and then quote various provisions of the labor law, among which are the provisions to the effect that "contractors will punctually pay workmen, who shall be employed by them upon the work under their contract, in cash currency, and not in what is denominated store pay or orders." The specifications then call attention to §§ 3 and 13 of the statute (Laws 1897, chap. 415), and state that the contracts will be void and of no effect unless these provisions are complied with. The provisions referred to fix eight hours as a legal day's work, and provide that the wages shall not be less than the prevailing rate for a legal day's work, and that preference of employment shall be given to citizens of the state. The specifications evidently were prepared before the decision of our court was rendered in the case of People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 1, 52 L. R. A. 814, 59 N. E. 716, in which it was held that the provision of the labor law requiring the payment of the prevailing rate of wages was unconstitutional and void. The bids, however, were not made up and handed in until after this decision. Before the bids were made, notice was given to the contractors that the commission would not enforce the provisions of the labor law which had been declared unconstitutional, and that the commission would not enforce any of the provisions of that law which may thereafter be declared unconstitutional. The bids were then made, and the superintendent of the New York & Bermudez Company, the company to whom the contract was subsequently awarded, swears that in the bid of his company, submitted to the public improvement commission, no item was included by reason of the specification providing for an observance of the provisions of the labor law, nor was the price set for the work increased in any wise by reason of such provisions. The contract entered into only provides that the contractor will faithfully comply with all the provisions of the labor law of the state which may now be in force. The decision of this court in the Rodgers Case having been previously rendered, the provision of the labor law with reference to the payment of the prevailing rate of wages was not in force at the time the bids were made or the contract executed. The fact that the commissioners gave notice that they would not attempt to enforce the labor law, which the court had held unconstitutional, and the further fact that the bid made by the company to whom was awarded the contract was not increased by reasons of the provisions of that law, indicate very clearly that the taxpayers of the city, or the abutting owners upon the street sought to be improved, have suffered nothing by reason of the provisions of the labor law to which attention was called in the specifications. Some of the provisions of the labor law are undoubtedly constitutional and are still in force, and consequently the provisions of the contract to the effect that the contractor will observe those provisions which may now be in force furnish no ground for just complaint. A contract, the consideration of which is based upon a statute which is unconstitutional, is doubtless void. But the contract in this case does not depend upon the labor law for its consideration. The provisions of that statute incorporated into the specifications are extraneous matters which have no material effect upon the main provisions of the contract, and cannot affect those provisions unless it may tend to increase the cost of the work. The contractors must be presumed to have known the law, and consequently to have known that the provision with reference to the rate of wages was unconstitutional. They are deemed, therefore, to have made their bid with this understanding, even independent of the notice which was given to them by the commissioners. Their bid was not in fact increased by reason of the labor law, as appears from the testimony to which we have alluded. We think, therefore, that the provisions of the labor law which have been held unconstitutional may be eliminated from the specifications, and that the contract may stand unimpaired and in full force and virtue. This was, in effect, held in the case of People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 1, 52 L. R. A. 814, 59 N. E. 716. In that case the contractor sought a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the comptroller to deliver to him a warrant on the chamberlain for the amount due him upon the contract, which was a contract in all essential features like the one now under consideration. The comptroller refused to deliver the warrant for the reason that the contractor had not complied with the provisions of the contract, which required him to pay the laborers employed by him the prevailing rate of wages. It was held that that provision of the labor law which had 60 L. R. A.

been incorporated into the contract was unconstitutional and void, but that the remaining part of the contract was in full force, and the mandamus was ordered to be issued.

The provision of the specifications to the effect that laborers must be paid in cash, and not in store orders, is a requirement of the statutes which as yet has not been condemned in this state. The objection taken to this specification was that it is erroneous, unreasonable, illegal, and unauthorized. It is not unreasonable or illegal if authorized by a statute. Our attention has been called to no provision of this or any of the charters of the cities of this state which permits the treasurer or other financial officer of a municipal government to keep a store, and pay the employees of the city with orders on the store. It may be different, however, with contractors; but, as we have seen, this specification is required by the statute, and no objection was taken upon the ground that the statute was unconstitutional, and it is not the practice of this court to determine the constitutionality of statutes unless the question is distinctly raised by the record.

Finally, it is contended that the determination of the commissioners to pave with sheet asphalt and to curb with granite was made by the commission without an opportunity of the abutting property owners to be heard on such determination. It is true that in the notice given for a hearing it was stated that the commission had determined to pave with vitrified brick, and a hearing was had upon that notice. The hearing, however, covered all matters pertaining to the improvement, the kind of pavement to be used, as well as the kind of curbing. The statute makes provision for the hearing, and then concludes: "Said commission shall have the power to change, alter, add to or modify their first and original determination in reference to such improvement, and shall also have the power and right to change their opinion in reference to what portion of the whole expense should be paid by local assessment." Laws 1899, chap. 550, § 4. After the hearing it appears that the commission did change their determination as to the character of the pavement it would adopt, and finally concluded to use sheet asphalt instead of brick.

Other questions have been discussed in the briefs of counsel, which we have considered, but they present no error that requires a reversal of the proceedings, and we do not deem it necessary to specifically refer to them.

In view of the fact that a large number of persons will become interested as taxpayers when an assessment is made to pay for the improvement contracted for, we have thought it wise to consider this case upon the merits. We are, however, of the opinion that the proceedings sought to be reviewed are neither judicial nor quasi judicial, and therefore, under the well-settled rules, are not subject to review by certiorari. People ex rel. Jamaica v. Queens County, 131 N. Y. 468, 30 N. E. 488; People ex rel. O'Connor v. Queens County, 153 N. Y. 370, 374, 47 N. E. 790.

The appeal should therefore be dismissed, with costs.

PEOPLE of the State of New York ex rel.
Charles E. CORKRAN, Appt.,

v.

(172 N. Y. 176.)

1. The power which independent nations have to surrender criminals to other nations as a matter of favor or comity is not possessed by the states of the Union, and no person can be surrendered by one state to another unless the case falls within the provisions of the United States Constitution.
2. A person who was not corporeally present in the demanding state at the time of the commission of a crime with which he is charged is not a fugitive from justice in another state within the meaning of the United States Constitution requiring the delivery up of fugitives from justice for punishment.
3. The presence of an alleged criminal in a state for a single day after the alleged commission of the crime, and nearly a year before the institution of any proceedings against him, is not sufficient to require his surrender by another state, in which he is found, as a fugitive from justice.
4. The determination by the governor that a person whose rendition for trial on a criminal charge is sought by another state is a fugitive from justice is reviewable by habeas corpus.
5. A crime will not be presumed to have been committed on a day when accused was in the state, for the purpose of upholding extradition proceedings against him as a fugitive from justice, if the indictment charges its commission on an earlier date, and no claim or suggestion is made of error in the charge.

(October 7, 1902.)

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Albany County dismissing a writ of habeas corpus which sought relator's discharge from custody to NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that the constructive presence of an accused in the state where the crime is committed is not sufficient to make him a fugitive from justice from that state, see State v. Hall (N. C.) 28 L. R. A. 289.

On the general subject as to who are fugitives subject to extradition, see note to the case of State v. Hall (N. C.) 28 L. R. A. 289, and the later cases of Re Sultan (N. C.) 28 L. R. A. 294; Drinkall v. Spiegel (Conn.) 36 L. R. A. 486; Ex parte Tod (S. D.) 47 L. R. A. 560. 60 L. R. A.

which he had been committed in extradition proceedings. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Moot, Sprague, Brownell, & Marcy, for appellant:

The constructive presence of Charles E. Corkran in the state of Tennessee, or his constructive participation in the alleged crimes, is not sufficient to sustain the governor's warrant, or require that he be delivered to representatives of the state of Tennessee, to be carried to that state for trial.

The fact that the relator went to the state of Tennessee July 2, 1901, for lawful business purposes, and was there during that day, and then went to the state of Tennessee again on the 16th or 17th day of July, 1901, and remained one day, and then returned to his home, does not furnish evidence of guilt, or evidence that he was fleeing from justice.

2 Moore, Extradition, § 584.

An alibi, like the absence of accused from a state when a crime is committed, is a perfect legal defense.

Callen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator was arrested and held under a mandate or warrant of the governor of this state issued on the requisition of the governor of the state of Tennessee for the delivery of the relator as a fugitive from justice. The mandate of the governor recites that it has been represented to him that the relator stands charged in the state of Tennessee with having committed the crime of larceny and false pretenses in the county of Davidson, and that he had fled from said state and taken refuge in the state of New York. By stipulation between the parties it was conceded that the indictments attached to the requisition papers under which the governor issued his warrant were found on the 26th day of February, 1902, and that the alleged crimes charged in the indictments were committed on May 1, 1901, May 8, 1901, and June 24, 1901, respectively. At the hearing had on the return of the writ of habeas corpus it was further stipulated between the parties that the relator was not in the state of Tennessee at the time of the commission of any of the offenses charged against him, but in the state of Maryland, which was his residence. It appeared by his testimony that he went to Nashville, in Tennessee, on the 2d day of July, 1901, to accept the resignation of one Albright, the president and treasurer of the American Hardwood Company, in which the relator was interested, and was then elected president of the company in said Albright's stead; that that evening he left Nashville, and never was again in the state of Tennessee, except passing through there on the 16th or 17th of July. It is not claimed that the offenses for which the extradition of the relator was sought were committed when he was in the state of Tennessee, but it is contended that, though not corporeally present at the time of the commission of the offense, he may nevertheless be properly surrendered as a fugitive from the justice of that state where it was committed.

It is to be premised that the power of a government to punish for extraterritorial crimes is a very different question from that of its right to require the surrender to it from foreign countries, for trial and punishment, persons alleged to have committed such offenses. Some governments assume to impose the obligations of their penal laws, either in whole or part, on their citizens, no matter where they may be. We have a notable example of this rule in the recent punishment of a British peer for an alleged bigamy committed in the United States. Some governments assume to go even further, and punish an alien for an offense committed against their citizens, though the offense is committed in a foreign jurisdiction. Publicists and writers on international law differ greatly as to the right of the government to punish for offenses committed without its territory. A full review of this subject is to be found in the work of Mr. John Bassett Moore, late assistant secretary of state of the United States, on "Extraterritorial Crime." The power of any government to punish for such an offense necessarily depends upon its ability to obtain possession of the defendant; and, though each government assumes to define its own powers, still it may be restrained by the action of the government of which the offender is a citizen, invoked on his behalf, as was the case in the controversy between this country and Mexico in relation to which the report of Mr. Moore was written. Not so with extradition between the states of the Union. It is not governed by international law, but depends solely on the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the act of Congress made from it. The power of a state to punish a fugitive from justice after obtaining custody of his person depends in no way on how that custody was obtained. Even if the offender has been kidnapped in another state and brought within the territory of the prosecuting state, that fact does not affect the jurisdiction of the latter to punish him for the offense. Ker v. Illinois, 119 U. S. 436, 30 L. ed. 421, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 225; Cook v. Hart, 146 U. S. 183, 36 L. ed. 934, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40. Nor will a person be relieved from prosecution at the intervention of the state from which he was abducted by violence. Mahon v. Justice, 127 U. S. 700, 32 L. ed. 283, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1204. In Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U. S. 537, 37 L. ed. 549, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 687, it was said: "If the fugitive be regarded as not lawfully within the limits of the state in respect to any other crime than the one on which his surrender was effected, still that fact does not defeat the jurisdiction of its courts to try him for other offenses, any more than if he had been brought within such jurisdiction forcibly and without any legal process whatever." It was there held that interstate rendition did not depend on comity or contract, but on the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. It will thus be seen that the condition of a citizen of one state, surrendered to another for criminal prosecution, has not the safeguards which exist in international extradition, for the surrendering state is without any standing to intervene in his behalf, however much its process may have been abused. Therefore, it necessarily follows that no person can or should be extradited from one state to another unless the case falls within the constitutional provision, and that the power which independent nations have to surrender criminals to other nations as a matter of favor or comity is not possessed by the states.

The provision of the Constitution of the United States (art. 4, § 2, subd. 2) is: "A person charged in any state with treason, felony or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime." Under this, Congress has enacted (Rev. Stat. § 5278, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3597): "Whenever the executive authority of any state or territory demands any person as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any state or territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit . . . charging the person demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the state or territory from whence the person so charged has fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the state or territory to which such person has fled to cause him to be arrested . . . and to cause the fugitive to be delivered . . ." It will be seen that, to authorize or require a state to surrender to another state an alleged offender, it is necessary, not only that such person stand charged with crime, but that he has fled from justice. What constitutes a fugitive from justice has been the subject of much discussion by eminent text-writers, and of many decisions by the courts and by the governors of the several states. There seems to be substantial unanimity in all the authorities on one proposition,—that, to be a fugitive from justice, a person must have been corporeally present in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the alleged crime. "The case, and the only case, for which the Constitution provides, is that of a person who is charged with crime in one state, and who flees to and is found in another state. This is the whole of the case." Spear, Extradition, 311. "The question of constructive presence at the commission of a crime has frequently arisen in the case of obtaining money or goods by false pretenses, and it has been held that such presence in the demanding state is not sufficient as a basis for a requisition for the surrender of a person as a fugitive from justice, although, if the person charged were to come within the jurisdiction of that state, he might be arrested and punished for the false pretenses there committed while he was corporeally elsewhere." Moore, Extradition, § 584. In Ex parte Reggel, 114 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 250, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1148, it was said by Mr. Justice Harlan: "Undoubtedly, the act of Congress did not impose upon the executive authority of the territory the duty of surrendering the appellant, unless it was made to appear in some proper way that he was a fugitive from justice. In other words, the appellant was entitled, under the act of Congress, to insist upon proof that he was within the demanding state at the time he is alleged to have committed the crime charged, and subsequently withdrew from her jurisdiction, so that he could not be reached by her criminal process." In Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 29 L. ed. 544, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 291, it is said by Mr. Justice Matthews: "To be a fugitive from justice, in the sense of the act of Congress regulating the subject under consideration, it is not necessary that the party charged should have left the state in which the crime is alleged to have been committed, after an indictment found, or for the purpose of avoiding a prosecution anticipated or begun, but simply that, having within a state committed that which by its laws constitutes a crime, when he is sought to be subjected to its criminal process to answer for his offense he has left its jurisdiction, and is found within the territory of another." In Re Voorhees, 32 N. J. L. 141, a fugitive is designated as one "who commits a crime within a state and withdraws himself from such jurisdiction." In Wilcox v. Nolze, 34 Ohio St. 520, it is said, referring to the constitutional provision: "These words, taken, as they must be, in their natural and obvious sense, do not include a case of constructive presence in the demanding state, and constructive flight therefrom, but relate only to a case where the accused is actually present in the demanding state at the time he commits the act of which complaint is made." The same principle has been held in Hartman v. Aveline, 63 Ind. 344, 30 Am. Rep. 217; Jones v. Leonard, 50 Iowa, 100, 32 Am. Rep. 116; Re Mohr, 73 Ala. 503, 49 Am. Rep. 63; Re Jackson, 2 Flipp. 183, Fed. Cas. No. 7,125; Ex parte Smith, 3 McLean, 121, Fed. Cas. No. 12,968. It is stated in a note found in Mr. Moore's work on Extradition (p. 948) that "the interstate extradition conference held in New York City in August, 1887, refused to adopt a recommendation to the governors of the various states and territories that no demand be complied with where the fleeing was constructive, on the ground that the decisions of the courts already covered the case." Hibler v. State, 43 Tex. 197, is not in conflict with these authorities, for there a fugitive from justice was defined to be "a person who commits a crime in one state, for which he is indicted, and departs therefrom, and is found in another state." The only case cited as authority for a contrary doctrine is Re Cook, 49 Fed. 833, reported in the Supreme Court as Cook v. Hart, 146 U. S. 183, 36 L. ed. 934, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40; In the opinion there delivered by the district judge it is said: "One may commit an offense against a state upon whose soil he has never set his foot." I have already said this may be true, but it does not determine the question whether the offender is a fugitive from justice. In that case the petitioner was under arrest in Wisconsin, having been extradited by the governor of the state of Illinois. He sought relief from imprisonment by writ of habeas corpus from the United States circuit court for Wisconsin. The question of the propriety of his extradition was therefore not properly before the court, and the decision of the circuit court remanding the relator was affirmed by the Supreme Court on the express ground that it was immaterial how the relator's presence in Wisconsin had been secured; that it was sufficient that at the time of the writ he was subject to its territorial jurisdiction. Nor did the case in fact require from the learned judge the statement cited. The relator was charged with having, as a banker, fraudulently received deposits. He had been in the state of Wisconsin a few days before, and, knowing the bank to be insolvent, gave his clerks directions to receive deposits. His subsequent departure from the state, under all the authorities, made him a fugitive from justice.

The question discussed has never been passed upon by the courts in this state, but has been considered by several of our governors. In Re Mitchell, 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 596, will be found an opinion by Governor Hill on an application for the extradition of Thomas Mitchell. Mitchell was charged with having committed manslaughter in Jersey City, by reason of his ownership of an unsafe building in that place, which fell and killed four persons. It appeared that Mitchell had not been in New Jersey for some weeks prior to the accident. The governor refused to extradite him, holding that "the actual presence of the accused party in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the alleged offense is a jurisdictional fact." This view has been accepted by the governors of Massachusetts, of Maryland, of Tennessee, and of Illinois. See Moore, Extradition, § 579 et seq. It is claimed that this court has held a contrary doctrine in Adams v. People, 1 N. Y. 173. The defendant, Adams, was indicted and convicted for obtaining money under false pretenses under a fraudulent warehouse receipt, which he transmitted from Chillicothe, in Ohio, to the prosecutors, merchants in New York City. The case in no respect involved the question of the constitutional obligation of the governor of Ohio to surrender the defendant to the authorities of the state of New York, but only of the power of this state to punish him after having secured jurisdiction of his person. Under the authorities already cited from the Supreme Court of the United States, it was of no importance how the jurisdiction of his person was obtained. If the relator was not otherwise subject to extradition to the state of Tennessee, because he was not personally present in that state at the commission of the alleged offenses, his subsequent presence in the state for a single day, nearly a year before the institution of any prosecution against him, could give that state no right to require his surrender. The question is whether he is a fugitive from justice, not whether the courts of the state of Tennessee have jurisdiction of his alleged offenses. That jurisdiction they had at all times, if at all, provided they could secure his person. I am at a loss to imagine how a man's voluntary visit to a state can constitute him a fugitive from the state, when he was not such before. 1 Cong. 60 L. R. A.

sider it as having exactly the contrary effect. If there be any force in this occurrence, it must be, not in his going into the state, but in his failing to remain there. It is not, however, suggested that he in any respect offended against the laws of Tennessee while present there. He went there for a specific purpose, and, his business accomplished, immediately left. It is not pretended that his stay was curtailed or that he left the state on account of any suspicion of a prosecution. Would he have been liable to extradition because, on a journey to New Orleans, his route passed through the state of Tennessee? Such a result seems to me utterly unreasonable. No distinction can be drawn between the two cases. In the Case of Adams, already referred to, the prisoner sought discharge from arrest by habeas corpus; and the opinion of Judge Vanderpoel, of the superior court of the city of New York, denying the application, is found in 7 Law Rep. 386. Adams came voluntarily into the state, and, after making an engagement to meet one of the prosecutors, suddenly left the state, and failed to keep his engagement. The decision proceeded on the ground that the evidence justified the inference that the prisoner prematurely departed from the state with the view of avoiding arrest and prosecution for his crime. The case has not escaped criticism, though its doctrine may be correct when limited to the facts of the case; that is to say, a departure from the state to avoid prosecution, of which there is no suggestion in the case before us. In truth, however, the questions discussed by the court were not properly before it at all. They could have been raised in the state of Ohio, but not in New York.

It is urged that this doctrine of the necessity of corporeal presence in the state where the offense is alleged to have been committed will render the several states asylums for criminals, the effect of whose offenses is injury to property or persons in other states. There is no practical danger of the kind. It may be safely stated that nearly every state, as well as our own, punishes crimes committed within the state, although the results of the crimes are effected without its territory. The relator would be properly surrendered to the state of Maryland, where he was at the time of his alleged offense, if that state made demand for him. On the other hand, there is great danger that citizens may be carried into other states to be punished for acts which are not criminal in the jurisdiction in which they were committed. The case of false pretenses is a notable example. By our Penal Code (§ 544) it is provided that "a purchase of property by means of a false pretense is not criminal, where the false pretense relates to the purchaser's means or ability to pay, unless the pretense is made in writing and signed by the party to be charged." This was doubtless dictated by the knowledge that criminal charges of false pretenses are often instituted in reality to compel the payment of debt, and are easily fabricated. It may be that this provision of the Code has no extra-territorial effect, and that a citizen of this state, if found in another state, may be punished there for alleged oral pretenses made here. But neither the Constitution nor the Federal statute requires this state to surrender him for prosecution in another jurisdiction. These considerations equally apply to prosecutions for libels alleged to have been committed in newspapers published here and circulated throughout the country. The real evil of the day is not the insufficiency of the criminal laws, but the excessive multiplication of statutory crimes.

It is suggested (though not by counsel) that I have construed the stipulation of the counsel for the state of Tennessee too broadly, and that it was intended to admit only that the defendant was not in Tennessee at the particular dates alleged in the indictment, not that he was absent from Tennessee at the commission of the offenses charged against him. The brief of the learned counsel entirely disposes of this suggestion. He makes but two points: (1) "A person charged with crime may be extradited, although he was not within the demanding state at the time of the commission of the alleged offense." (2) "The supreme court is limited, on habeas corpus, to review but one question, namely, the question of identity." I have, therefore, but followed the counsel's own construction of his admission.

We now reach the question whether the action of the governor can be reviewed on habeas corpus. It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Robb v. Connolly, 111 U. S. 624, 28 L. ed. 542, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 544, that the governor of a state, in the execution of the duty of surrendering fugitives imposed by the Constitution and the statute of Congress, does not act as a United States officer, and that a writ of habeas corpus may be issued by the state courts to test the validity of an arrest under his warrant. In Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 95, 29 L. ed. 549, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 300, it was said: "How far his [the governor's] decision may be reviewed judicially in proceedings in habeas corpus, or whether it is not conclusive, are questions not settled by harmonious judicial decisions, nor by any authoritative judgment of this court." In Cook v. Hart, 146 U. S. 193, 36 L. ed. 939, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 43, it was held: "We have no doubt that the governor upon whom the demand is made must determine for himself, in the first instance, at least, whether the party charged is in fact a fugitive from justice, . . . but whether his decision thereon be final is a question proper to be determined by the courts of that state." The Constitution and laws of the state of New York, therefore, control the decision of the question we are now considering. While doubtless to a certain extent the action of the governor is executive or ministerial, it is not so in the broad sense in which the general functions of the office are conferred upon him by our Constitution. In Re Guden, 171 N. Y. 529, 64 N. E. 451, we have held that the power given to the governor to remove a sheriff upon charges and after a hearing was executive, and the exercise of that power not subject to review by the courts. But the question here is of an entirely different character. It involves the liberty of the citizen. Speaking of the division of powers among the three great branches of the government, Parker, Ch. J., in the Guden Case, said: "There resides in the people of this and every state an absolute power to prescribe rules of action, through legislation; to enforce rules of action and to transact generally the affairs of government, through executive acts; and to determine controversies between, enforce rights belonging to, and redress wrongs done to, citizens of the state, through the courts." The liability of the citizen to arrest and detention, and the grounds therefor, therefore, necessarily present a judicial question, though the arrest and detention are effected by an executive or ministerial officer. The act of Congress provides that a copy of the indictment or the affidavit before a magistrate shall be proof of the charge of crime against any person whose extradition is sought, but it does not prescribe what shall be evidence that he is a fugitive from justice. The fact that he is a fugitive is therefore a matter of proof. While the warrant of the governor is presumptive evidence of the fact, there is no reason on principle why it should be conclusive. It was said by Judge Jenkins in Re Cook, 49 Fed. 833, referring to the case of Roberts v. Reilly: "That decision, by its very terms, implies that the action of the governor is only presumptively regular, and can be reviewed by the courts. Surely, it cannot be claimed that such action is conclusive upon personal right, and may not be inquired of by judicial tribunals. Surely it cannot be that the right to personal liberty hangs upon so slender a thread as the arbitrary will of the authorities of the demanding and surrendering states. 'No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.' That is the fundamental law of the land, coming to us from Magna Charta. It is not due process of law which condemns without hearing, which convicts without trial. . . . It is essential to compliance with such executive demand that the person whose surrender is demanded should be adjudged a fugitive from the justice of the demanding state. The decision of the executive is not conclusive of that fact." The writ of habeas corpus is in this state available to every person imprisoned or deprived of his liberty, unless he is restrained under the authority of the Federal government, or unless he is committed by virtue of a final judgment or decree of a competent tribunal of jurisdiction, or the final order of such a tribunal punishing him for contempt. The warrant of the governor is not a final judgment nor a decree, and, even were it such, it would be the duty of the court to see whether the jurisdictional facts exist which are necessary to authorize the action of the governor. The provision of § 827 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, directing that any person arrested on the governor's mandate shall be brought before a judge of a court of record, and informed of his right to a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into his identity with the person named in the warrant, does not assume to limit the inquiry on a writ of habeas corpus to the question of identity. It was enacted for the benefit of any person arrested under such a warrant, and solely as an additional safeguard against illegal removal from the state. As was held in People ex rel. Tweed v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 560, 19 Am. Rep. 211: "This writ cannot be abrogated or its efficiency curtailed by legislative action. . . . The remedy against illegal imprisonment afforded by this writ, as it was known and used at common law, is placed beyond the pale of legislative discretion, except that it may be suspended when public safety requires, in either of the two emergencies named in the Constitution." If, therefore, on the return to the writ it is clearly shown that the relator is not a fugitive from justice, and there was no evidence from which a contrary view can be entertained, which is the fact in this case, as appears by the stipulation and concession of the parties, there is no reason why greater efficacy should be given to the warrant of extradition than to the warrant of any other magistrate by which a citizen is imprisoned or deprived of his liberty. In People ex rel. Lawrence v. Brady, 56 N. Y. 182, this court discharged the relator, who was held under a warrant of extradition issued by the governor of the state, on the ground that the affidavit on which the surrender was asked did not state a crime. In People ex rel. Draper v. Pinkerton, 77 N. Y. 245, the only question decided was whether the warrant of the governor recited the facts necessary to confer authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and was sufficient justification for holding the prisoner to be brought up on habeas corpus, without producing the papers or evidence upon which the governor acted. It was held that the recitals were to be taken as prima facie true, no proof to the contrary having been introduced by the prisoner. In People ex rel. Jourdan v. Donohue, 84 N. Y. 438, again the only question was the sufficiency of the executive warrant on its face. Referring to criticisms that had been made on the decision in the Lawrence Case, the court said: "And hence we have held that where the preliminary papers upon which a warrant of extradition has been granted are produced, and are before us, it is our right and our duty to examine them, and judge and determine, when our process is invoked, whether they are sufficient, under the law, to justify the warrant of extradition. . . . Our ruling in this respect has not escaped criticism; . . . but an opposite conclusion, which would make the determination of the executive final, even though the papers produced clearly showed that the essential preliminaries of the law were unfulfilled, does not yet commend itself to our judgment." In all these cases the question related to the sufficiency of the charge against the prisoner, not to his being a fugitive. But if the 60 L. R. A.

courts can review the action of the governor or on one prerequisite for extradition, it is difficult to see why they cannot equally review his action on the other. The great weight of authority in other states is in favor of such a review. It was so held in the cases of Jones v. Leonard, 50 Iowa, 110, 32 Am. Rep. 119; Wilcox v. Nolze, 34 Ohio St. 524; Hartman v. Aveline, 63 Ind. 344, 30 Am. Rep. 217; and Re Mohr, 73 Ala. 516, 49 Am. Rep. 70. In the Wilcox Case it is said: "Whether or not the accused committed the acts complained of while actually present in the demanding state is jurisdictional; and it is clearly competent, in such case, to show by parol evidence a defect in the executive power, however regular the extradition papers may be in matter of form." In the Jones Case it is said: "The governor of this state is not clothed with judicial powers, and there is no provision of the Constitution or laws of the United States or of this state which provides that his determination is final and conclusive in the case of the extradition of the citizen. In the absence of such a provision, we hold that the decision of the governor only makes a prima facie case; that it is competent for the courts in a proceeding of this character to inquire into the correctness of his decision, and discharge the prisoner." In the Mohr Case the learned court said: "We are of opinion that the probate judge did not err in discharging the petitioner, and that it was competent for him to hear oral evidence in order to establish the fact that the petitioner was not a fugitive from justice. Any other conclusion than this would establish a doctrine very dangerous to the liberty of the citizen. It would greatly impair the efficacy of the proceeding of habeas corpus, which has been often characterized as the great writ of liberty, and may be regarded, not less than the right of trial by jury, as one of the chief corner-stones in the structure of our judiciary system. It might justly be considered as alarming to announce that a writ which has so frequently been used for centuries past to prevent the encroachment of kings upon popular liberty is inadequate for the just purposes for which it has been invoked in this case."

There is little to be added to what has been so well said by the jurists of other states. The further suggestion, however, may be made, that no law gives a person sought to be extradited the right to a hearing before the governor, or to submit evidence in his behalf. Whatever in these respects may be accorded by the governor to the accused is a matter of favor, not of right. Therefore, unless he may review his extradition on habeas corpus, a citizen, on the fiat of an executive officer, without a hearing, may be transported a prisoner to the utmost confines of the country. It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that in the case of foreign extradition there must be some competent evidence before the magistrate, to authorize the surrender of the accused. Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U. S. 502, 40 L. ed. 787, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689.

But if the orders made below are upheld, in the case of interstate extradition a citizen may be surrendered without the slightest evidence either of his guilt or that he is a fugitive.

The guilt or innocence of an alleged fugitive from justice is not to be determined on requisition proceedings, nor on the writ of habeas corpus. Therefore, if the charge was such as to necessarily require the presence of the accused within the state at the time of the commission of the offense, mere proof of an alibi would not in every case require or justify his discharge. But the question in the present case is not one of alibi, for the stipulation of the parties admits that the defendant was not personally present in the state of Tennessee at the commission of the alleged offenses.

For these reasons the orders of the Special Term and the Appellate Division should be reversed, and the relator discharged from custody.

O'Brien, J., concurring:

I agree with Judge Cullen in his exposition of the principles applicable to this case. It may possibly be useful to add to this very clear and able exposition of the law some suggestions with a view of eliminating from the case certain considerations that are misleading and wholly foreign to the questions involved, and a word with respect to the functions of the writ of habeas corpus and the procedure thereon in cases of interstate extradition. It is declared by statute to be a state writ to inquire into the cause of detention, and in a proper case to discharge the person from all restraint of his liberty. In some cases the writ cannot issue at all, namely, in cases where the restraint or detention is by virtue of a mandate from a court or judge of the United States in cases where such court or judge has exclusive jurisdiction. Neither can it issue in a case where the party is detained by virtue of the final judgment or decree of any competent tribunal, civil or criminal. Code, § 2016. The applicant for the writ must show affirmatively in his petition that he is not detained under any such process, and, should it appear upon the hearing that he is, then he must be remanded. Id. §§ 2032, 2033. In other words, when certain facts are made to appear as the cause of the detention, the inquiry can go no farther, but must stop, and the applicant must be remanded, however unjust in point of fact his detention may be. In all other cases there are no limitations upon the scope of the inquiry, but it must proceed until the issue is determined according to the rules of law applicable to such a case. The burden in the first instance is upon the officer or party who detains the person to show that such detention is authorized by some legal authority.

The relator in this case was not detained under process from any court, civil or criminal, but under an executive warrant commanding the defendant to deliver him to an agent of another state, to be brought to that state for trial upon a charge of crime al- leged to have been committed in that state, and hence all the facts were open to inquiry. The defendant made return to the writ that he detained the relator under this warrant, but exhibited no other document or paper to sustain the warrant. The warrant on its face stated that it had been represented to the governor of this state by the governor of the state of Tennessee that the relator was charged in that state with the crime of larceny and false pretenses, and that he had fled from that state, and taken refuge in this state. These statements on the face of the warrant were to be taken as presumptively true in the first instance, and, if the inquiry rested there, the defendant had made out a prima facie case to justify the detention. It is important here to note, and to keep always in view, that when the defendant presented the executive warrant without any other document or paper or any other proof of the facts therein stated he raised only a presumption. The warrant did not conclusively establish the facts recited. It was so held by this court (People ex rel. Lawrence v. Brady, 56 N. Y. 182), and the law as laid down in that case has never been modified, but has been repeatedly approved. Indeed, I do not understand that there is now any difference of opinion as to the legal effect of the warrant as evidence. It raised a presumption, but nothing more. I am not aware of any case in any court of controlling authority where it was held to be conclusive, and no reason is given why it should be. But a mere legal presumption is good and justifies an act only until it is removed by proof of some other fact, and when so removed the act stands without authority or justification. That, in my opinion, is just what happened in this case, as will appear hereafter. It must be borne in mind all the time that we know nothing, and can know nothing, judicially, concerning the facts or circumstances of the larceny and false pretenses charged in the warrant. The record does not even contain the indictment, or any paper or proof as to the facts, if any, that transpired in the demanding state. All we know or can know are the things recited in the warrant. The statute provides (Code, § 2039) that the relator may, under oath, deny any material allegation of the return, or state any fact to show that his detention was illegal, or that entitled him to his discharge. The relator did so traverse the return, and thus put the facts stated in the warrant in issue. The court thereupon was required to proceed in a "summary way to hear the evidence," and dispose of the case as justice required. The relator proved one material fact conclusively, and that was that he was not within the demanding state at the time of the commission of the crime as that fact was averred in the indictment. I do not mean that his oath on that point was conclusive, but the proof was of a higher character, namely, the stipulation of the respective attorneys in open court. These were admissions upon the record that import absolute verity for all the purposes of the inquiry, and they had the legal effect to remove every presumption to the contrary that arose from the face of the warrant. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 186. It is important to understand the real scope and effect of these admissions. They were: (1) That three indictments were attached to the requisition papers upon which the warrant was issued, and, as they were not produced, we know nothing as to their contents, except as stated in the admission, and that statement was: (2) That all of them were found on February 26, 1902, and the alleged crimes were charged in the indictments to have been committed on May 1, 1901, May 8, 1901, and June 24, 1901, respectively. So that we simply know that the relator was charged with three distinct offenses of larceny and false pretenses committed on the dates above stated. (3) It was also admitted and stipulated that the relator was not within the state of Tennessee between May 1, 1899, and July 1, 1901, but was in that state on July 2, 1901. These are all the facts that the demanding state elected to disclose upon the hearing of the writ of habeas corpus as the grounds for taking the relator from this state against his will into another jurisdiction. Not a single fact is before us that raises any question as to the constructive presence of the relator in the demanding state on the dates named in the indictment, or that would warrant even the suspicion that he committed the crimes charged by means of an innocent agent. All that is said upon that subject is pure conjecture, without any fact upon which to build up the speculation. On the record before us the relator was presumptively personally present in the demanding state at the dates named, and there took and carried away the property claimed to have been stolen, or he did not and could not commit the offense charged in that state at all. It having been conclusively established that the relator was not in the demanding state on the dates when the crimes were charged to have been committed, it follows that he could not have committed the offenses, and certainly could not have fled from the justice of the demanding state. The authorities are unanimous in holding that a person cannot be a fugitive from the justice of the demanding state who was not in that state when the crime charged is alleged to have been committed. Constructive presence furnishes no basis for executive action. The cases on that subject are collected in a note to the case of State v. Hall (N. C.) 28 L. R. A. 289. The presumption arising from the recitals in the executive warrant was completely overthrown by the admissions upon the hearing before the court that the relator was not in the demanding state at the dates when it was alleged that the crimes were committed, and this left the warrant under which the relator was in custody without any basis upon which to rest.

This proposition is met only in one way, and by one line of argument, which should now be noticed. It is suggested that, since the relator was in the demanding state on the 2d day of July, 1901, for a few hours, on 60 L. R. A.

a temporary errand of business, that he may have committed some or all of the crimes charged while there on that day; and that, since the precise dates stated in the indictment are not material, it may be shown upon the trial that he actually did commit the crimes on that day, and hence this court should send the relator to the demanding state for trial. This suggestion may possibly have the merit of ingenuity, but as a method of reasoning or argument, or as a judicial utterance in a case involving personal liberty, it is to be hoped that this court will not adopt it. The state of Tennessee and its agent were represented at the hearing upon the writ by able counsel. All the facts and circumstances constituting the alleged crimes were open to inquiry. It could have been shown that there was or might have been a mistake in stating the dates in the indictment, or it could have been shown that the crimes were actually committed on the 2d day of July following; but nothing of the kind was claimed, or even suggested. The demanding state, its agent and counsel, for some reason elected to withhold all proof of the facts and circumstances of the alleged larcenies, and to stand upon the bare recitals in the warrant. The prima facie proof that the state gave, consisting only of the recitals of the warrant, that the relator was personally present there at the dates named and committed the crimes, was superseded and removed by the solemn and conclusive admissions in open court that he was not there at the time, and consequently could not have fled from justice. When the prosecution alleges and proves a larceny committed at a designated time and place, and makes no claim that it was committed at any other time or place, and the accused then shows by conclusive proof that he was not in the state on the days designated, nor for a year before, nor for eight days after, and the case rests upon these facts alone, without any proof to justify even a suspicion that the crime was committed eight days after the date laid in the indictment, it would be a strange rule of law that would permit the case to go to the jury in order to procure a finding that, after all, the time laid in the indictment was a mistake, and the crime was committed by the accused at the later date.

But the case of Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 29 L. ed. 544, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 291, is cited to sustain this line of argument, and an expression of the learned judge who spoke for the court is made prominent. This court and every other court has often commented upon the value of isolated judicial expressions in an opinion as authority. The facts of the case upon which the decision was based must be compared with the one in hand, in order to enable us to interpret the decision and the language of the opinion. The difference in the facts of that case and the one at bar is so radical and fundamental that it will be seen at a glance that it has no application.

1. In that case the state of New York, the demanding state, took a very different course from that adopted by the demanding state in the case at bar. It did not rest its right upon the recitals of the warrant, but produced all the papers upon which it issued; thus disclosing to the court all the facts and circumstances constituting the crime charged. The warrant was there supported by all the preceding facts, and the recitals became wholly immaterial. Not so here, since the recitals give us all the light we have, and they are conclusively contradicted by the admissions of record.

2. Not only did the court have all the papers before it, but proof was given dehors the record as to all the facts and circumstances of the crime. There was full disclosure, and nothing was withheld, so that at the close of the hearing the question whether the accused was or was not a fugitive from justice was one of fact. Not so in this case; since, after the admissions, we have not a single fact left to show that the relator fled from the state of Tennessee.

3. In that case there was nothing but the oath of the accused that he was not in the demanding state at the time charged in the indictment, and that was of no consequence against all the other proof to show that he was. His oath was not conclusive, whereas in the case at bar we have an admission that is conclusive that he was not in the state at the time, and nothing to place against it unless we are to presume that the crime was committed on the 2d day of July, when no one claims that it was. The court ought not to presume that the crime was committed on that day against the allegations of the indictment, and without any claim from any source that it was. If presumptions are to be made in such a case, they should be in favor of personal liberty, and not against it.

But the question whether the relator committed larceny in the state of Tennessee at any time when he was personally present there is not really in the case at all, since there is not now, and never was, any serious claim that he was in that state when the crimes charged were committed, otherwise than constructively. Constructive presence in the demanding state is the sole basis of the claim that the relator fled from its justice, and, as already suggested, there is no case or authority that I am aware of that sustains such a claim. All the cases are the other way, and we must either disregard these cases or adopt the fiction that the offenses were really committed by the relator while he was in the state on July 2, 1901.

It may, before closing, be profitable to call special attention to a case quite similar, since it shows how such cases as this are considered and disposed of by courts in the demanding state of Tennessee. I refer to the case of Tennessee v. Jackson, 1 L. R. A. 370, 36 Fed. 258, which is quite instructive. It appears that Jackson resided in Chicago. He sold to the prosecutor, who resided at Chattanooga, a horse, the bargain having been made by correspondence. The horse was shipped to the purchaser by rail at the place last named, and he remitted by mail to Jackson, at Chicago, the purchase price. When the horse arrived, his qualities were found to be such that the purchaser claimed to have been defrauded out of the price by false and fraudulent statements. He proceeded to obtain a warrant from a justice of the peace at Chattanooga against Jackson in Chicago, charging him with obtaining money by fraud, and placed the warrant in the hands of a detective, who made an affidavit that Jackson had fled from the state of Tennessee and had taken refuge in the state of Illinois. On this affidavit and warrant he procured a requisition from the governor of Tennessee on the governor of Illinois for the delivery to him of Jackson. Armed with these papers, the detective proceeded to Illinois, and obtained a warrant from the governor of that state for the arrest of Jackson. He arrested him on the warrant, hurried him off to Tennessee, and there had him tried before the justice of the peace, convicted, and sent to jail. It will thus be seen that Jackson was not only extradited from his home in another state, but actually tried and convicted in the demanding state. But Jackson sued out a writ of habeas corpus in Tennessee, and was discharged on the ground that all the proceedings were based upon a falsehood, namely, that he had fled from Tennessee, where he had never been before. The opinion of the court is very brief, but pointed. After citing the act of Congress, the learned judge said: "According to the provisions of this law, there must be, not only the commission of the crime, but the person charged must be a fugitive from the state in which it was committed, before the executive authority can be called into action. Jackson was not a fugitive. He had not in all his life been in Tennessee; had never fled from it; and his case did not fall within the positive terms of this law. The oath of the detective was false, and the governors of the two states imposed upon. The whole proceeding was a fraud upon the law. If this arrest and imprisonment are to be maintained, the opportunities for wrong and abuse of this law will be great and widespread. Commercial transactions are largely conducted by mail and by telegraph. If the seller at one end of the line and the buyer at the other, with the aid of detectives, in cases of dispute and controversy between them, are to be allowed, under such proceedings as these, to have the citizens of one state carried to another state for trial under the false allegation that the person charged has fled, instances of oppression may not be few." It would be quite difficult to point out any material distinction between that case and the one at bar. It is quite clear that, should we send the relator to Tennessee, he would be entitled there to his discharge by the same court that discharged Jackson on the facts now before us. That court held that the accused party could not be deprived of his liberty by executive action based upon the false affidavit of a detective that he had fled from Tennessee to Illinois. That, in my opinion, is a safe precedent to follow in this case. Someone in this case has made just such an affidavit. That must follow from the admission that the relator was not in the demanding state at the times stated in the indictment as the dates when the alleged crimes were committed. On the hearing in this case upon the return of the writ, the state of Tennessee could have shown all the facts and circumstances of the alleged crime for which it had demanded the surrender to it of the person of the relator, as this state did in the Roberts Case, 116 U. S. 80, 29 L. ed. 544, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 291. But, instead of taking that course, all the facts and circumstances are left clouded in mystery, except so far as they are disclosed by the admissions referred to. When it admitted that the relator was not in the state at the times laid in the indictment, and gave no other light as to the facts, the case for detention failed. The state of Tennessee does not ask for the surrender of the relator on the ground that he committed any crime in that state on the 2d day of July, 1901; nor does it even suggest that its prosecuting officer made any mistake in stating the 24th of June as the true date of the commission of the offense. The relator is claiming the benefit and protection of the laws of this state, which guarantee to him his liberty against all unlawful restraint. If he has actually fled from the justice of the demanding state, of course he ought to be surrendered; but it is admitted that he did not, and it is safe to say that no one believes for a moment that he did, except, possibly, in the same way and in the same sense that Jackson fled from the same state in the case cited. Personal liberty must rest in this state upon a very frail and unsafe basis if this court can be induced to send the relator to Tennessee upon such a vague and fanciful conjecture as that which is at the foundation of the fiction that he may in fact have committed the crime on the 2d of July, and that the prior dates stated by the prosecuting officer of that state are the result of some error or mistake. When the state of Tennessee, or someone authorized to speak for it, is willing to assure us that the suggestion is based upon fact, and not upon fiction, it will be timely then to entertain it; but until then the courts of this state should treat its solemn admission upon the record according to its fair scope and meaning, which obviously is that the relator was not in the state when the crimes charged were committed. I am in favor of reversing the order.

Parker, Ch. J., and Gray and Vann, JJ., concur with Cullen and O'Brien, JJ.

Haight, J., dissenting:

The relator was arrested by the respondent and held in custody by virtue of a warrant issued by the governor of the state of New York, in which the respondent was required to arrest the relator, and deliver him into the custody of one Vernon Sharp, to be taken back to the state of Tennessee, from which he had fled, pursuant to a requisition 60 L. R. A.

of the governor of that state. The warrant recites the following facts as having been established before the governor of this state: "It having been represented to me by the governor of the state of Tennessee that Charles E. Corkran stands charged in that state with having committed therein, in the county of Davidson, the crimes of larceny and false pretenses, which the said governor certifies to be crimes under the laws of the said state, and that the said Chas. E. Corkran has fled therefrom and taken refuge in the state of New York; and the said governor of the state of Tennessee having, pursuant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, demanded of me that I cause the said Chas. E. Corkran to be arrested and delivered to Vernon Sharp, who is duly authorized to receive him into his custody and convey him back to the said state of Tennessee, which said demand is accompanied by copies of indictments and other documents, duly certified by the said governor of the state of Tennessee to be authentic and duly authenticated, and charging the said Chas. E. Corkran with having committed said crimes, and fled from the said state and taken refuge in the state of New York." Corkran procured a writ of habeas corpus to issue for the purpose of obtaining his discharge. On the return of the writ the attorneys for the parties stipulated "that three indictments were attached to the requisition papers, sent by the governor of the state of Tennessee to the governor of the state of New York for the extradition of Chas. E. Corkran; that each of said indictments was found on the 26th day of February, 1902; and that the alleged crimes were charged in said indictments to have been committed on the 1st day of May, 1901, on the 8th day of May, 1901, and on the 24th day of June, 1901, respectively." It was further conceded by counsel of the respective parties "that the relator was not within the state of Tennessee between the 1st day of May, 1899, and the 1st day of July, 1901." It was also conceded that the relator "was in the state of Tennessee on the 2d day of July, 1901." Taking the two stipulations together, it appears that the relator was not in the state of Tennessee on the dates charged in the indictment, but that he was in that state eight days after the date charged in the last indictment. In no place is it stipulated that he was not in the state at the time the offenses charged were committed. If this was an accidental omission, it has not been supplied by any of the evidence before us. The relator subscribed and verified the petition upon which the writ of habeas corpus was issued. In it he alleges "that it did not appear that there was any evidence before the governor of the state of Tennessee at the time he issued his demand that your petitioner was personally or constructively within the limits of the state of Tennessee when the crimes are alleged to have been committed." In his affidavit traversing the return to the writ he states that he had read the indictments before the governor of the state of New York upon which his warrant of arrest was issued and that those indictments charged him with the commission of the crimes of larceny and false pretenses, specifying the dates named in the indictments. He then states that he was not in the state of Tennessee at any time during the months of March, April, May, or June, 1901. He also was sworn upon the hearing and gave oral testimony, in which he reiterates that he was not in the state of Tennessee during the dates mentioned in the indictments, but concedes that he was there on the 2d day of July, 1901. In neither the petition, affidavit, nor testimony does he swear that he was not in the state when the offenses charged were committed, but has refrained from so testifying.

There are cases in which time is a necessary ingredient of the offense,—as, for instance, the violation of the Sunday laws; but, barring a few exceptions, I do not understand that the precise time is a necessary ingredient of crimes, either under our Code or the common law. Section 280 of our Code of Criminal Procedure provides that “the precise time at which the crime was committed need not be stated in the indictment; but it may be alleged to have been committed at any time before the finding thereof, except where the time is a material ingredient in the crime.” This provision of the Code is a substantial enactment of the common law upon the subject. 2 Hawk. P. C. 334; 1 Hale, P. C. 361; 1 Archbold, Crim. Prac. 85; Com. v. Harrington, 3 Pick. 26; People v. Stocking, 50 Barb. 573; Reg. v. Firih, 11 Cox C. C. 234; People v. Emerson, 53 Hun, 437, 6 N. Y. Supp. 274; People v. Jackson, 111 N. Y. 362-369, 19 N. E. 54. As we have seen, the last indictment charged the crime as having been committed on the 24th day of June. Time is not a material ingredient of the crimes of larceny or false pretenses. It would, therefore, have been competent upon the trial to show that the offenses charged were actually committed on the 2d day of July, when the relator was in the state, instead of the 24th day of June. The indictments were before the governor. They charged the commission of the crime of larceny. The usual allegation is that he did then and there take, steal, and carry away, which imports the presence of the person charged. Under the statute a charge may be established before the governor by the production of a copy of the indictment. It therefore furnishes some evidence upon which the governor may act. As we have seen, the relator has neglected to show, either by stipulation or by his own testimony, that he was not actually present at the time the offenses charged were committed. He has confined his testimony to showing that he was not there on the particular dates specified in the indictment. This is not sufficient. It consequently follows that the contention of the relator to the effect that the governor had no power to issue the warrant for his arrest and his return to the state of Tennessee for the reason that he was not personally present in that state when the offense was committed is not raised by the record in these proceedings.

The warrant upon which the relator is detained recites all the facts necessary to give the governor jurisdiction to issue it. It is not contended that it is informal or defective in any particular. It recites that the governor of Tennessee presented papers to the governor of this state, duly authenticated, included copies of the indictments found, charging the relator with having committed the crimes of larceny and false pretenses in that state, and that he “has fled therefrom, and taken refuge in the state of New York.” This, if true, is sufficient to authorize the governor of this state to issue the warrant for his arrest and return to the state of Tennessee. The papers presented to the governor, upon which he made his determination to issue the warrant, have not been returned, or their contents made to appear by the relator, either in his petition or traverse. They consequently are not before us, and we are unable to determine whether the conclusion of the governor was proper, or without support of evidence. In the case of People ex rel. Draper v. Pinkerton, 77 N. Y. 245, the question under consideration appears to have been squarely decided. It is stated in the opinion that “the only material question which seems to be presented in this case is whether a warrant of the governor of this state for the arrest of a fugitive from the justice of another state, containing the recital of facts necessary to confer authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States, is a sufficient justification for holding the prisoner when brought up on habeas corpus, without producing the papers or evidence upon which the governor acted. We have no doubt but that the recitals are to be taken as prima facie, at least, true, and that the return setting forth the warrant containing such recitals is sufficient.” In the case of People ex rel. Jourdan v. Donohue, 84 N. Y. 438, Finch, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: “The sufficiency of the executive warrant to justify the detention of the prisoner is the sole question raised by the writ of habeas corpus and presented on this appeal. . . . Where, however, the papers upon which the warrant is founded are not produced, but are withheld by the executive in the exercise of official discretion and authority, we can look only to the warrant itself and its recitals for the evidence that the essential conditions of its issue have been fulfilled.” He then proceeds to state that all the essential requirements of the Constitution and statute are contained in the recitals of the warrant, and concludes by affirming the order dismissing the writ of habeas corpus. In the very recent case of Turlinden v. Ames, 184 U. S. 270-278, 46 L. ed. 534, 541, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 484, Chief Justice Fuller says: “The settled rule is that the writ of habeas corpus cannot perform the office of a writ of error, and that, in extradition proceedings, if the committing magistrate has jurisdiction of subject-matter and of the accused, and the offense charged is within the terms of the treaty of extradition, and the magistrate, in arriving at a decision to hold the accused, has before him competent legal evidence on which to exercise his judgment as to whether the facts are sufficient to establish the criminality of the accused for the purposes of extradition, such decision cannot be reviewed on habeas corpus. Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U. S. 502-508, 40 L. ed. 787-789, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, and cases cited; Bryant v. United States, 167 U. S. 104, sub nom. Ea parte Bryant, 42 L. ed. 94, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 744." And again, he concludes by saying: "The decisions of the executive department in matters of extradition within its own sphere, and in accordance with the Constitution, are not open to judicial revision; and it results that, where proceedings for extradition, regularly and constitutionally taken under the acts of Congress, are pending, they cannot be put an end to by writs of habeas corpus." See, also Re Clark, 9 Wend. 212. In the case of Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 29 L. ed. 544, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 291, we have a case in many respects very similar to the one under consideration. In that case the relator had been indicted in the state of New York for grand larceny. A requisition was made by the governor for his extradition from the state of Georgia. The governor of that state issued his warrant, upon which he was arrested and held in custody. Habeas corpus was then issued by the district court of the Southern district of Georgia. The accused made an affidavit denying his guilt, and also denying that he was in the state of New York on the day laid in the indictment as the date of the offense; but he did not deny that he was in the state at about that date. Mr. Justice Matthews, in delivering the opinion of the court, says, with reference to the claim that the relator was not a fugitive from justice, that it "is a question of fact which the governor of the state upon whom the demand is made must decide upon such evidence as he may deem satisfactory. . . . The determination of the fact by the executive of the state in issuing his warrant of arrest upon a demand made on that ground, whether the writ contains a recital of an express finding to that effect or not, must be regarded as sufficient to justify the removal until the presumption in its favor is overthrown by contrary proof." The judgment of the circuit court, remanding the prisoner to the custody of the agent of the state of New York, was affirmed. It will be observed that in that case the relator showed that he was not in the state at the date laid in the indictment; but this did not overcome the presumption of fact found by the governor that he was a fugitive from justice. Article 4, § 2, subd. 2, Const. U. S., provides that "a person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime." The Revised Statutes of the United States (§ 5278, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3597), provide that,

"whenever the executive authority of any state or territory demands any person as a fugitive from justice of the executive authority of any state or territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any state or territory, charging the person demanded of having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the state or territory from whence the person so charged has fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the state or territory to which such person has fled to cause him to be arrested and secured, and to cause notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear."

It will be observed that, under the Constitution and statute to which we have referred, the application must be made to the "executive authority" of the state or territory to which the person charged with the crime has fled. The duty, therefore, devolves upon such executive authority to determine all the questions of fact which arise under the Constitution and statute. In this state the executive authority is vested in the governor. When the application was made for the arrest of the relator by the governor of Tennessee, it became the duty of the governor of this state to determine: (1) Whether a crime under the laws of Tennessee was charged as having been committed by the relator; (2) whether he was a fugitive from justice of that state. It appears that the governor has determined these questions from his recitals in the warrant. The first question was established by the production before him of the indictments found, duly certified and authenticated, and the second by the indictments and other documents duly certified by the governor of the state of Tennessee to be authentic. Neither the Constitution nor the statutes make any provision for a review of the determination of the governor, but our own statutes give to every person deprived of his liberty the right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus; and in case he is imprisoned by virtue of a warrant of the executive, under a demand for extradition, § 827 of the Code of Criminal Procedure gives him the right to a review for the purpose of determining his identity,—whether he is the person charged with crime under the demand for extradition. Under this writ the courts doubtless have the power to determine whether the executive has acted within the powers given him by the Constitution and statutes of the United States. When the papers upon which he has acted have been returned and become a part of the record in the proceedings upon habeas corpus, and it appears from such papers that no crime is charged as having been committed in the state demanding the return of the person, it has been held, though not without criticism, that the court may discharge him (People ex rel. Lawrence v. Brady, 56 N. Y.

182), but where the papers upon which the governor has acted in making his determination to issue the warrant are not before the court, and the contents of such papers do not appear, the recitals of facts found by him, contained in the warrant, must be taken as true, so far as the review by habeas corpus is concerned.

The prevalence of crimes committed in one state by persons actually in another state, through innocent agents employed by them, such as the forwarding of forged drafts, checks, and other instruments through the mails, express agencies, or otherwise, for the purpose of procuring money or other property thereon, makes it desirable that the question should be determined as to whether, under the Constitution and statutes of the United States, a person found in one state can be surrendered up, to be taken to another state for trial, for a crime committed therein, through some innocent agency of his, when he was only constructively present in the person of his agent. That question, however, ought to be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. The conclusions reached upon the points above discussed render it unnecessary for this court to determine it in this case.

The order appealed from should be affirmed.

THOUSAND ISLAND PARK ASSOCIATION, Respnt.,

Ora TUCKER, Appt.

1. Streets shown on the plan of the park of an association organized to maintain a camp meeting and lease lots to persons desiring the advantages of the ground are dedicated to the use of the lessees and those, at their request, using them for access to their lots, so that the association cannot prevent such use.
2. Exclusive rights are not given by a statute merely authorizing an association organized to maintain a camp meeting to purchase and deal in provisions and other commodities for supplying the needs of lot lessees and visitors, and to maintain stores and shops for that purpose, and to authorize others to engage in such pursuits, and to make and establish regulations therefor.
3. Power to prohibit hawking and peddling within a camp-meeting ground does not authorize the prohibition of the delivery therein of produce ordered by mail by lot lessees, although the price is not fixed until the goods are delivered.
4. Power to adopt a regulation requiring lessees of lots to purchase all supplies from the lessor is not reserved to an association organized for the maintenance of a camp meeting by a provision in the leases that the lessee shall keep and perform all such conditions or rules as the lessor shall from time to time impose, since such requirement is not reasonable.

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that a camp-meeting association cannot impose tax on taking orders for provisions on grounds of, see Northport Wesleyan Grove Camp-Meeting Asso. v. Perkins (Me.) 48 L. R. A. 272, 60 L. R. A.

Cullen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was incorporated in December, 1874, under the provisions of chapter 117 of the Laws of 1853, entitled "An Act to Authorize the Formation of Corporations for the Erection of Buildings," under the name of the Thousand Island Camp Meeting Association, for the purpose of erecting buildings and laying out land for the use of persons who might attend camp meetings on the grounds of the association. In 1875 it acquired a tract of about 800 acres on Wellesley Island, in the St. Lawrence river, a part of which it laid out into parks or open squares and streets, and the remainder thereof subdivided into lots. It graded the streets, improved the parks or open spaces, constructed a dock, and built a tabernacle and other buildings, including a hotel. It leased to individuals a large number of the lots for the purpose of erecting cottages thereon. These leases ran for ninety-nine years, with the privilege of perpetual renewals, and by their terms were "granted and accepted according to the rules and regulations which may from time to time be adopted and promulgated for the government of said park, and which are hereby made part of the instrument." The leases specified that the regulations existing at their date and assented to by the lessees were: "(1) No games or diversions of any kind, not approved by said association, will be allowed on any of the premises of the said association at any time. (2) The association reserves the right at all times to use, lay out, and lease all lands not already laid out or designated as streets or avenues. (3) The erection of privies is forbidden, except by consent of the association."

By chapter 4 of the Laws of 1879 the corporate name of the plaintiff was changed to its present title. By chapter 278 of the Laws of 1883 the plaintiff, in addition to the powers conferred upon it by its act of incorporation, was authorized "to purchase and deal in such provisions and other commodities and articles necessary and proper for supplying lot lessees, cottages, and visitors, and to maintain stores, shops, lumber yards, and other buildings and erections upon the corporate lands; to establish and conduct livery stables, baths, bath-houses, boat liveries, boat houses, and boats for hire; to authorize others to engage in such pursuits on said park; to make and establish regulations therefor; to improve the corporate property in any and all ways calculated to contribute to the pleasure, health, or well being of its lot lessees and visitors." By subdivision 6 of § 1 it was provided that nothing in the act should be construed to prevent the bringing of provisions and building or other materials upon the grounds of said association for the use of those bringing the same, and not intended for the purposes of trade or sale. In August, 1895, the trustees of the plaintiff enacted the following regulation: "All traffic in vegetables, meats, groceries, newspapers, and all other articles of merchandise usually sold in the markets and stores of the association or any huckstering whatsoever without permission, on its docks and grounds, is hereby prohibited." The defendant is a farmer in Jefferson county, who has supplied lot owners in the park with poultry, vegetables, and like products. The method in which he conducted his business was, as has been found by the trial court, by means of orders on postal cards sent to him by various lot owners. In compliance with such directions, he delivered the goods ordered to the various persons ordering them, on their respective premises. The complaint alleged the incorporation of the plaintiff, the improvement of its land, the lease of its lots, and the enactment of its regulations against trafficking already recited. It further alleged that the plaintiff had leased a store, a meat market, and other buildings to individuals, with a grant of the exclusive privilege of carrying on such business in the park; that the rental value of such premises depended largely upon the exclusive right so granted to the lessee to carry on the particular business. It was alleged that the defendant, in violation of said regulation, was trafficking in supplies sold in the stores and shops established by the plaintiff, and thus injuring its exclusive right to carry on business. The relief asked was that the defendant be enjoined from trafficking, selling, or delivering vegetables, meats, fruits, groceries, and any other merchandise on the grounds of the plaintiff without its permission. The trial court found that the defendant had trafficked in vegetables and supplies under orders by post, in the way narrated. It held that the plaintiff possessed the exclusive privilege of dealing in merchandise within the limits of the park, that the regulation adopted by it was reasonable and valid, and that the conduct of the defendant violated such exclusive privilege. Judgment was granted enjoining the defendant from huckstering or trafficking in vegetables or other farm products for household use, or other merchandise usually sold in the market or stores of the plaintiff, and from continuing such traffic as theretofore conducted by him, by means of mail orders and personal delivery of goods, without first obtaining the permission of the plaintiff.

The real question involved in this case is the right of the plaintiff association to prevent the lessees and occupants of the plots which it has leased from obtaining their supplies by purchase from others than the plaintiff, or the persons to whom it has granted the exclusive privilege of dealing in such supplies. The action cannot be sustained on the theory that the defendant is a trespasser on plaintiff's lands, and that it is entitled to resort to equity to prevent a repetition of the trespass, unless it be first determined that he entered upon the park for the purpose of violating the plaintiff's right. Trespass on land can be maintained only by a plaintiff in possession. Therefore, so far as relates to the entry on the premises of the cottagers, the plaintiff has no standing to complain of a trespass. As far as the roads and streets in the park are concerned, the probability is that they were made public highways by chapter 242 of the Laws of 1895, which enabled the plaintiff to discharge its highway tax by work on those roads. In that case every one of the public had the right of passage over them. But however this may be, the lots leased were laid out on a map and plan of the park showing the streets and roads. By leasing the lots as designated on such maps, the plaintiff thereby dedicated the land in the streets and roads to the use of the lot lessees, and anyone using a road for access to the premises of such lessee on the latter's request can justify his presence there as against the plaintiff under such dedication. We therefore revert to the original question,—whether the defendant's errand was lawful as against the plaintiff.

The real theory of the action, and the ground on which the decisions of the courts below have proceeded, is that the plaintiff had the exclusive privilege to furnish stores and supplies to residents in the park, except in cases where the residents might personally bring their supplies with them, and that the defendant's conduct infringed on the plaintiff's exclusive privilege of trading or authorizing trading. The claim of the plaintiff to this exclusive privilege is based on two grounds: First, the statute of 1883; second, the covenants or conditions of the leases granted by it to the various holders of cottage plots. As to the first, it would be sufficient to say that, if the statute granted to the plaintiff the exclusive right claimed, it would be in conflict with § 18, art. 3, of the Constitution, which prohibits the legislature from granting to any private corporation or association or individual any exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever. Fox v. Mohawk & H. River Humane Soc. 165 N. Y. 517, 51 L. R. A. 681, 59 N. E. 353. But the act of the legislature is not subject to any such construction. It does not purport to give the plaintiff any exclusive privilege of trading, or to forbid others from so doing. It authorizes the plaintiff to purchase and deal in provisions and other commodities for supplying lot lessees and visitors, and to maintain stores and shops for that purpose. Thus far it merely grants the plaintiff additional corporate powers—a grant which was necessary, for, by the statute under which it was originally incorporated, the plaintiff would have no right to carry on any business of the kind. It then empowers the plaintiff to authorize others to engage in such pursuits on the park, and “to make and establish regulations therefor.” I assume that by this statute there was given to the plaintiff the same power to regulate trade in the park that is generally granted to municipal corporations to regulate trade within their limits. More than this the legislature did not grant. The power to regulate a useful trade does not authorize its prohibition or the creation of a monopoly. “An ordinance cannot legally be made which contravenes a common right unless the power to do so be plainly conferred by a valid and competent legislative grant [with us the legislative power is restricted by the constitutional provision cited]; and, in cases relating to such a right, authority to regulate conferred upon towns of limited powers, has been held not necessarily to include the power to prohibit.” Dill. Mun. Corp. § 325. “The power to license and regulate a lawful and necessary business will not give the corporation the power to make contracts which create or tend to create a monopoly.” Id. § 362. The restraint or prohibition of hawking and peddling has always been regarded in this state as a justifiable exercise of the police power. Buffalo v. Webster, 10 Wend. 100; Stamford v. Fisher, 140 N. Y. 187, 35 N. E. 500. As said by Judge Gray in the latter case: “It is perfectly competent to empower municipal corporations to prescribe regulations for the orderly conduct of business within their limits and upon the public streets.” Therefore, so far as the regulation adopted by the plaintiff forbade trafficking or huckstering in articles of merchandise on the dock, streets, or open places, it was valid. It might also restrain peddling and similar trafficking in the park, for all these things would tend to interfere with the comfort of the residents, and disturb the quiet and good order of the settlement. But the business done by the defendant did not in any way constitute hawking or peddling. This was so held in Stamford v. Fisher, 140 N. Y. 187, 35 N. E. 500. It in no way affected the order or quiet of the community. The defendant took his goods only to those who had previously ordered them, in pursuance of those orders. It is doubtful whether even an act of the legislature restraining such a business could be sustained as a proper exercise of the police power. See People v. Jarvis, 19 App. Div. 466, 46 N. Y. Supp. 596; People ex rel. Tyroler v. Warden of City Prison, 157 N. Y. 116, 43 L. R. A. 264, 51 N. E. 1006. It was found by the trial court that the price was made for the goods at the time of delivery, and that the sale was not consummated till then. This is immaterial. The defendant did not offer his goods for sale to other persons. If he had assumed to do so, that might have constituted hawking or peddling. This action, however, is not brought on any claim that the defendant has violated any police regulation for the maintenance of order, or for the prevention of nuisances or objectionable callings, but, as already stated, on the theory that his business has interfered with the pecuniary value of the plaintiff's exclusive rights.

Though the plaintiff gained no exclusive privilege from the statute, if it had continued the owner and possessor of the lands in the park it would have had, by virtue of such ownership and possession, an unqualified right to regulate business carried on there in such manner as it might deem proper, and to exclude any person from the premises for any reason. By these means the plaintiff could hold a practical monopoly of all business carried on in the park,—a monopoly subject to no legal condemnation, because it would proceed from no act of the legislature or municipal regulation, but from the ownership of the land. When the plaintiff leased or granted the cottage plots, it might have subjected the leases to such conditions and the tenants to such covenants as it saw fit to impose. If it had been provided in the leases that the tenant or occupant should purchase all his supplies from the plaintiff, or from such shop or market as it might establish, and should obtain no supplies from any other source, I am not prepared to say that such a covenant would not be enforced, or, rather, that damages could not be recovered for its violation. The exclusive privilege reserved by the landlord would fairly be a part of the consideration for the demise of the premises. But to impose such a restriction on the tenant, some condition or covenant to that effect must be found in the lease. Otherwise the dominion of the tenant is as absolute during the demised term as that of the owner previous to the demise. In the leases granted by the plaintiff, certain regulations adopted by it were expressly recited. None of these restricted the right of the tenant to purchase stores and merchandise for consumption in the park where and from whom he pleased.

The lease contained the further condition that the tenant should keep and perform all such conditions or rules and regulations as the landlord should from time to time impose. Thus there was reserved to the landlord the power to subsequently make new regulations. Such power, however, though general in form, was not absolute or unqualified. A new regulation established under this reservation, to be valid, must be reasonable. In this respect the case is entirely analogous to that of a member of a corporation, where power is reserved to the corporation, either by the statute or by its constitution, to modify or repeal by-laws and to enact new ones. "If, then, the power is reserved to alter, amend, or repeal, and that reservation enters into a contract, the power reserved is to pass reasonable by-laws, agreeable to law. But a by-law that will disturb a vested right is not such." Kent v. Quicksilver Min. Co. 78 N. Y. 159. See also Parish v. New York Produce Exchange, 169 N. Y. 34, 56 L. R. A. 149, 61 N. E. 977. The question, therefore, is whether the regulation forbidding the tenants or occupants to purchase supplies, except at the plaintiff's store, unless they bring those supplies personally upon the grounds, is reasonable. In determining whether the by-law of a corporation is reasonable or not, there should properly be considered the nature of the corporation, and the object for which it is organized. In the present case it was intended to maintain plaintiff's park as a camp-meeting ground. Its purpose was not only to provide a place for recreation, but also for the spiritual and religious edification of its members. It is well known that some religious denominations entertain views as to the propriety of conduct and demeanor of members, their recreations and their modes of life, that seem strict and possibly intolerant to the rest of the community. When a person joins such an association, he must expect to conform to its standards. So here, anyone leasing grounds from the plaintiff, with the reservation in his lease of the right of the plaintiff to establish new regulations, might naturally expect the possibility of new regulations regarding the enjoyment of his property so as to prevent giving scandal or offense to the other tenants. Regulations of this nature, which would be condemned as unwarrantable invasions of private liberty in the case of ordinary companies organized for the improvement, development, and sale of tracts of land, would, in the case of an association like the plaintiff, be properly upheld. The regulation which the plaintiff has sought to import into its leases is not of this character, but solely for the purpose of pecuniary gain. No regulation of the kind, nor on the subject, existed at the time the grounds were leased; and there was no reason why a person renting the lands should expect such a regulation to be enacted by the plaintiff, any more than if he had rented the premises from an ordinary land company. The regulation seems to me of a most arbitrary and unreasonable character. Not only are the cottagers entitled to purchase where they can buy the cheapest, but in articles of food there is a great difference of individual taste. In the grocery shop established by the plaintiff there are certain brands of flour or coffee, and it may be that, if the question is to be decided by the courts, those brands would be held to be the best. Nevertheless some of the cottagers might like other brands better. Some might prefer their vegetables fresh from the defendant's farm, to those that have stood on the huckster's stand in the market. The articles kept in the plaintiff's stores and shops may be good, and the prices charged therefor reasonable, but the pecuniary means of some of the cottagers may be such as to require them to purchase inferior articles at a lower price. Thus the regulation, if upheld, would seem to establish a uniform standard of taste and a uniform style of living.

The question involved in Round Lake Asso. v. Kellogg, 141 N. Y. 348, 36 N. E. 326, and Chautauqua Assembly v. Alling, 46 Hun, 582, is essentially different from that before us. In the Round Lake Case the action was brought to restrain the defendant, who had acquired a lease of a plot of land, from using the premises as a place for the sale of merchandise, in violation of a regulation adopted by the association forbidding such use. It was held that the regulation was reasonable; the lot not having been leased for the purposes of a shop or store, but to enable persons habitually attending camp meetings to erect cottages or tents thereon. In the Chautauqua Case the habendum clause declared that the premises were to be held for a cottage or tent for a private residence, and the defendant attempted to maintain thereon a boarding house. Both the cases involved the use of the demised land for improper or unauthorized purposes. The plaintiff has covered that subject by express provision in its leases that the premises shall not be used for any mercantile or mechanical trade, for a boarding or lodging house, or for any purpose other than a summer residence. Any violation of this covenant would be properly restrained. But limitations or restrictions on the use of property are in no way akin to restrictions or limitations on the right to purchase supplies whereon to subsist. The fact that a restriction on one subject was imposed by the lease gave no intimation that subsequently there might be imposed restrictions on the other subject. It is said that liberty of purchase is still permitted to the tenants and cottagers if they personally bring in the goods purchased. But this is no liberty at all. The tenant ordering goods might be sick or infirm and unable to leave his residence. If it be asserted that he might authorize another to bring in the goods for him, that concession would dispose of the present case, for the defendant acted in pursuance of instructions given by the tenants. If it is a violation of the plaintiff's rights for the defendant to furnish vegetables to the cottagers on orders from them, it would equally violate those rights for a grocer in Syracuse or Utica to deliver to a cottager a barrel of sugar or a barrel of flour. No such restriction is reasonable.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

B. M. WEBB, Appt.,

v.

T. J. FISHER.

(.....Tenn.....)

A judge of a court of record is not subject to a private action for oppressively, maliciously, and corruptly entering a decree disbarring an attorney.

(February 7, 1908.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dekalb County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages from defendant for alleged corrupt and malicious acts committed by him as chancellor of the Fifth Chancery Division. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Webb & Cantrell, for appellant:

A judge is liable for his corrupt, wicked, oppressive, fraudulent, and malicious conduct.

Cope v. Ramsey, 2 Heisk. 197; Hoggatt v. Bigley, 6 Humph. 237.

Messrs. Wade & Robinson for appellee.

McAlister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented upon this record is in respect of the liability of a judicial officer for certain official acts which are alleged to have been done oppressively, maliciously, and corruptly. The more specific allegations of the declaration are that the defendant, T. J. Fisher, as chancellor of the fifth chancery division of Tennessee, decided against plaintiff the cause of W. H. Cummings, relator, against B. M. Webb, in the chancery court at Smithville, Tennessee, in which a decree of disbarment was made and entered against plaintiff, a practising attorney and counsel and solicitor in the courts of said state, and that said decree was pronounced corruptly, maliciously, wickedly, and oppressively. There are other allegations in the declaration, which are not necessary to be mentioned, since the statement already made presents the real case as made, stripped of useless verbiage and immaterial recitals. To this declaration defendant filed a plea of not guilty. At the July term, 1902, defendant asked leave of the court to withdraw his plea, and file a demurrer to the declaration, assigning for cause the exemption of a judicial officer from such a suit; but this motion was disallowed. At the November term, 1902, the presiding judge, Hon. Joseph C. Higgins, being of opinion that the declaration stated no cause of action, dismissed the suit. Plaintiff appealed, and has assigned errors.

The precise question with which we are now confronted has not heretofore been decided in this state, so far as we are advised by any reported opinion. The case of Hoggatt v. Bigley, 6 Humph. 237, involved the liability of a justice of the peace for acts done in his official capacity. Green, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The only question is whether the justice of the peace had jurisdiction of the case against the slave, Jim, whom he committed to prison; for it is not contended that a judicial officer is responsible for mere errors of judgment in a case of which he has jurisdiction, and in which, without malice, he honestly pronounces what he believes to be the judgment of the law." It was not contended in that case that the official act was done maliciously or corruptly, but the contrary appeared. The case of Cope v. Ramsey, 2 Heisk. 197, was a bill filed by the next friend of a minor against the defendants, as justices of Warren county, to hold them personally liable for a sum of money paid into the hands of the clerk of said court in Confederate money. The bill charged that all the parties defendant combined and confederated together to cheat and defraud said minor in this transaction; but the court found there was no proof to throw suspicion on the defendants. A demurrer was incorporated in the answer, which assigned that defendants were not responsible for acts done in a judicial capacity, and that the bill failed to charge that said acts were done with a corrupt, malicious, or fraudulent purpose. Sneed, J., said: "If they [the justices], in the rendition of the order complained of, have done the complainants wrong by an honest error of judgment, they are not responsible for it, pecuniarily or otherwise. But," continues the court, "if they have acted corruptly, maliciously, and with purpose to defraud the complainant of his rights, then in an appropriate proceeding they are responsible. The bill does not make out such a case. It does not im-pute to these justices any corrupt or dishonest motive touching this judicial act, and the bill is therefore demurrable." It will be observed that the rule announced in the two cases last cited related to the official liability of justices of the peace, who are held exempt when the act is within the justices' jurisdiction, unless it is inspired by motives of malice and corruption. But with respect to courts of superior and general jurisdiction a different rule has long obtained. It was thus announced in Randall v. Brigham, 7 Wall. 523, 19 L. ed. 285, viz., "Now, it is a general principle, applicable to all judicial officers, that they are not liable to a civil action for any judicial act done within their jurisdiction. In reference to judges of limited and inferior authority it has been held that they were protected only when they acted within their jurisdiction. If this be the case with respect to them, no such limitation exists with respect to judges of superior or general authority. They are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction, unless, perhaps, where the acts in excess of jurisdiction are done maliciously or corruptly." But in the case of Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. 335, 20 L. ed. 646, it was held that the qualifying words were incorrect, and that judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction, and are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly. "A distinction," said the court, "must be here observed between excess of jurisdiction and the clear absence of all jurisdiction over the subject-matter. Where there is clearly no jurisdiction over the subject-matter, any authority exercised is a usurped authority; and for the exercise of such authority, when the want of jurisdiction is known to the judge, no excuse is permissible. But where jurisdiction over the subject-matter is invested by law in the judge, or in the court which he holds, the manner and extent in which the jurisdiction shall be exercised are generally as much question for his determination as any other question involved in the case, although upon the correctness of his determination in these particulars the validity of his judgment may depend." It was further stated in that case, viz.: "The exemption of judges of the superior courts of record from liability to civil suit for their judicial acts existing when there is jurisdiction of the subject-matter, though irregularity and error attend the exercise of the jurisdiction, cannot be affected by any consideration of the motives with which the acts are done. The allegation of malicious or corrupt motives could always be made, and, if the motives could be inquired into, judges would be subjected to the same vexatious litigation upon such allegations, whether the motives had or had not any real existence. Against the consequences of their erroneous or irregular action, from whatever motives proceeding, the law has provided for private parties numerous remedies, and to those remedies they must in such cases resort. But for malice or corruption in their action, whilst exercising their judicial functions within the general scope of their jurisdiction, the judges of these courts can only be reached by public prosecution in the form of impeachment, or in such other form as may be specially prescribed. . . . In this country the judges of the superior courts of record are only responsible to the people, or the authorities constituted by the people, from whom they receive their commissions, for the manner in which they discharge the great trusts of their office. If, in the exercise of the powers with which they are clothed as ministers of justice, they act with partiality, or maliciously, or corruptly, or arbitrarily, or oppressively, they may be called to an account by impeachment, and suspended or removed from office. In some states they may be thus suspended or removed without impeachment by a vote of the two houses of the legislature." As said in Scott v. Stansfield, L. R. 3 Exch. 220: "This provision of the law is not for the protection or benefit of a malicious or corrupt judge, but for the benefit of the public, whose interest it is that the judges should be at liberty to exercise their functions with independence and without fear of consequences." Philbrook v. Newman, 85 Fed. 139. In 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed., p. 728, it is said, viz.: "The rule is well established that judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even where such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction, and are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly;" citing numerous cases. The only cases cited as holding a contrary doctrine are several cases from Kentucky and two cases from Tennessee. The latter, as we have already seen, lay down the rule with respect to the liability of justices of the peace, namely, Cope v. Ramsey, 2 Heisk. 197; Hoggatt v. Bigley, 6 Humph. 237. A reason for a different rule with respect to the liability of justices of the peace may be found in the fact that under our Constitution they are not liable to impeachment for crimes and misdemeanors in office, or removal from office for cause by a two-thirds vote of the general assembly. They are made liable to indictment and removal from office by the court upon conviction. Const. 1870, art. 5, § 6; Const. 1834, art. 5, § 5. The rule exempting judges from liability for judicial acts is based upon the consideration that the judge represents the public. If, says Mr. Cooley, the duty which the official authority imposes upon an officer is a duty to the public, a failure to perform it, or an inadequate or an erroneous performance, must be a public, and not an individual, injury, and must be redressed, if at all, in some form of public prosecution. The duty is public, and the end to be accomplished is public. The individual loss results from the proper or improper and imperfect performance of a duty, for which his controversy is only the occasion. The judge performs his duty to the public by doing justice between individuals, or, if he fails to do justice between individuals, he may be called to account by the state in such form and before such tribunal as the law may have provided: But, as the duty neglected is not a duty to the individual, civil redress, as for a civil injury, is not admissible. This is only one reason for judicial exemption from individual suits. Cooley, Torts, 380, 381. The necessary result of the liability would be to occupy the judge's mind and time with the defense of his own interests. The effect would be to lower the dignity of the court. Said Lord Tenterden, viz.: "In the imperfection of human nature it is better even that an individual should occasionally suffer a wrong than that the general course of justice should be impeded and fettered by constant and perpetual restraints and apprehensions on the part of those who are to administer it." Quoted in Williamson v. Lacy, 86 Me. 80, 25 L. R. A. 506, 29 Atl. 943. These principles we believe to be sound, and apply in the present instance.

The result is the judgment below is affirmed.

NOTE.—The decree of disbarment was reversed by the court of chancery appeals on the facts, and Mr. Webb reinstated as an attorney.

1. The storing of dynamite in a partially buried box on a vacant lot to which children are accustomed to resort to play is negligence which will render the one guilty thereof liable for injuries to a child by the explosion of one of the sticks, which was taken from the box by children who had resorted to the lot to play, and ignited by one of them in ignorance of its explosive character.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Roberts & Leehy, for appellant:

Wrongful acts of independent third persons, not actually intended by the defendant, are not regarded by the law as natural consequences of his wrong; and he is not bound to anticipate the general probability of such acts any more than a particular act by this or that individual.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent, in company with another boy, was playing on some vacant lots in the city of Seattle, and, observing a box which was not altogether covered, investigated the same, and found in it some sticks of explosive powder known as "Judson Dynamite No. 2." According to the testimony of the boys, these sticks of dynamite were already prepared for explosion. They took one of them (thinking it was a large firecracker, it being about 6 inches long) to a stump, lit a match, and applied it to the fuse. The dynamite exploded, and the respondent was injured thereby, losing one of his eyes. The dynamite was exploded by the boy who was playing with the respondent. It was on the Fourth of July and they were out on the lots aforesaid exploding firecrackers. Action was brought for damages, and a judgment of $3,000 obtained. From such judgment this appeal is taken.

The complaint alleges, among other things, that the defendant was under contract with the city of Seattle to improve Denny way, and other ways, avenues, and streets of the city; that, while engaged in the prosecution of the work, he used an explosive powder known as "Judson Dynamite No. 2" (setting forth the character of the powder, and the care and skill necessary to handle it); that, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff or the parents of the plaintiff, and without leave or license from the owner of the premises on which the powder was stored, he wrongfully, carelessly, negligently, and improperly did store more than 20 sticks of said powder, and did suffer it to be and remain, on said premises on the 4th day of July, 1899, badly, insufficiently, and deficiently covered, and in such position as to be readily discovered and easily tampered with by children playing upon or passing over said lot; that the plaintiff and his companion were boys of tender years, and wholly ignorant of the dangerous properties of said powder; that, while playing upon said lot, they found and discovered a box placed with its contents upon said lot by the defendant, containing a quantity of dynamite aforesaid, said box having been there placed by the defendant negligently, insufficiently, and deficiently covered; that the said children, having found the box as aforesaid, prompted by childish curiosity, opened the same and found therein the said sticks of powder; that thereupon the said William Kiger (the boy who was accompanying respondent), without fault or negligence on his part, and without fault or negligence of this plaintiff, took from said box, in plaintiff's immediate presence, one of the sticks of powder aforesaid, and, supposing it to be some kind of a firecracker, such as that in common use on that anniversary, ignited the fuse attached thereto, whereupon the said stick of powder exploded with great force, and by the explosion thereof the injury set forth in detail was caused. Damages were claimed in the sum of $20,000. The complaint contains the other ordinary allegations in such cases. A demurrer was interposed to this complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which demurrer was overruled, and the overruling of the same is appellant's first assignment of error.

We think, if the powder was placed on vacant city lots, upon which children are accustomed to play, in the manner described by the complaint, that it is negligence on the part of the person so depositing it, and, in the absence of contributory negligence—which does not appear from the complaint—responsibility for damages will attach. There is a great diversity of decision upon cases of this character, the particular circumstances of each case generally controlling. But, without entering into an analysis of the many cases which might be cited, we think the cases cited by the respondent sustain the complaint in this case. Harri-man v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 11, 12 N. E. 451, it seems to us, is a parallel case. There the defendant, or its servants, negligently placed and left on the track an unexploded signal torpedo, at a place which had been used as a crossing. The torpedo was picked up by a boy of nine years of age, and carried by him into a crowd of boys near by. Being ignorant of its explosive character, he attempted to open it, the torpedo exploded, and the plaintiff, a boy of ten years of age, was injured by the explosion. It was held under this state of facts that the negligence of the company's servants was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury. The only difference between that case and this is that in this case there had been an attempt to conceal the powder by burying it out of sight. But if the testimony of the respondent and the witness Willie Kiger is true, the box was not completely buried, and nothing would appeal more strongly to the natural curiosity of a boy seven years old than a box in such a place partly disclosed. We think the complaint stated a cause of action, and there was no error committed in overruling the demurrer to the same.

It is strongly contended that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, in denying the challenge of defendant to the sufficiency of the evidence, and in refusing to render judgment in favor of defendant against plaintiff upon the evidence. The evidence was contradictory, and, if the jury believed the testimony of the witnesses for the respondent,—and the credibility of the witnesses was for the jury alone to determine,—there was a sufficient testimony to sustain the judgment.

The same may be said of the fourth assignment, that the court erred in holding that the evidence showed that the powder was stored and kept in such a manner as to be rendered particularly attractive to children. We think that the instructions of the court generally stated the law fairly, and as favorably to the appellant as it was entitled to, both in relation to the independent agency of William Kiger, the boy who exploded the powder, and in every other particular, except instruction 28, which we will hereafter notice, and that no error was committed by the court in refusing instructions offered by the defendant, as such instructions, so far as they were justified by the law, had already been given by the court in its direct instructions. But the court instructed the jury as follows:

"I charge you, further, that the testimony of expert witnesses is proper evidence to be received and considered by you, and is entitled to such weight with you as in your judgment as fair-minded men it is entitled to, but it is not of as high grade as evidence, —is not as good evidence of a fact as the testimony of a credible witness or witnesses who testify to having seen the fact itself occur. In other words, the testimony of an eyewitness to an occurrence, whom you find to be a credible witness, is entitled to more weight with you than that of an expert witness who did not see the occurrence, but testifies only to his opinion in the matter."

The giving of this instruction is assigned as error, and, while it is contended by the respondent that such instruction embodies a proper statement of the law, and some cases are cited to sustain that view, yet this court has decided that expert testimony, being competent testimony under the law, must go to the jury as any other testimony in the case goes, and that the jury is the sole judge of the weight of such testimony, and that the court errs when by its instruction to the jury it discriminates in any way against the weight of such testimony. Such was the ruling of this court in Gustafson v. Seattle Traction Co. 28 Wash. 227, 68 Pac. 721, and in Re Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 68 Pac. 827.

For this error, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Fullerton, Ch. J., and Hadley, J., concur. Mount, J., concurs in the result.

Anders, J., dissenting:

While I have no doubt that the instruction of the court, as set forth in the foregoing opinion, was erroneous, I am also of the opinion that appellant's motion for a nonsuit and for judgment should have been sustained on the ground that the evidence failed to show negligence on the part of appellant.

2. M. and D. jointly owned in fee simple a tract of 180 acres of land. M. conveyed to W. "all the coal in, on, or underlying the undivided one half" of the tract, and granted to W. the right to make and maintain on said tract of land such openings as might be necessary for ventilation, for drainage, and for taking out all of the coal, without any liability for injury to the surface of said land, or anything thereon, by reason of the mining of said coal, and the right to remove same, with rights of way, etc. D. conveyed to W. his undivided one half of the tract in fee. W. conveyed to M. "all the surface of the 180 acres, undivided, that was so conveyed to him by said D.," retaining the right to make and maintain on said tract of land such openings as might be necessary for ventilation, for drainage, and for the taking out of all the coal, without any liability for injury to the surface of the land, or anything thereon, by reason of the mining of said coal, and the right to remove same, and rights of way, etc. Held, the said last conveyance from W. to M. was an express grant of the surface only, and severed it from all underlying strata.

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harrison County in favor of defendants in a suit to determine title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Millard F. Snider, for appellants:

The term "land" is the word most commonly used in referring to real estate, and it includes the surface of the earth, embracing any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever, as arable lands, meadows, woods, waters, and marshes.

2 Bl. Com. 17; 2 Minor Inst. 4.

The grant of a well carries the land which it occupies.

3 Washb. Real Prop. p. 389.

The term "house" or "cottage" or "wharf" or "town pound," when granted and used as a general term of description, carries the land which is thereby occupied. Such would be the case with the grant of a "pool" or a "pit;" it would pass the land as well as the water in it. Then why does not the grant of the "surface" of 180 acres grant the land?

Webster v. Potter, 105 Mass. 414; 3 Washb. Real Prop. p. 389.

It has also been questioned as to whether "a piece of timber" conveys the land.

Golden v. Coonan, 107 Iowa, 209, 77 N. W. 852.

In construing a deed the court should, as nearly as possible, assume the position of the parties to the deed, and consider their situation and surroundings.

Jones, Real Prop. § 52.

The language used is to be taken most strongly against the grantor.

Turk v. Skiles, 45 W. Va. 34, 30 S. E. 234; 2 Minor, Inst. 1066.

The whole deed must be taken together.

2 Minor, Inst. 1064.

Land has in its legal signification an indefinite extent, upwards as well as downwards.

2 Bl. Com. p. 18.

surface of any land and the center of the earth belongs to the owner of the "surface."

Hague v. Wheeler, 157 Pa. 324, 22 L. R. A. 141, 27 Atl. 714; Barringer & Adams, Mines & Mining, pp. 33, 34; Caldwell v. Copeland, 37 Pa. 427, 78 Am. Dec. 436; *Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. If the courts and law-book writers, and the people generally, call it surface, would not the grantor, who makes the deed and conveys all the surface, excepting the coal, be held to convey everything included in the land, that he did not except?

Jones, Real Prop. § 537.

Messrs. Davis & Davis, for appellees:

The effect of this deed to Monroe was to divest Wilson of all interest in the surface or agricultural portion of the land, leaving him the owner of all the coal and an undivided one-half interest in and to all of the oil, gas, or other minerals and subjacent strata underlying said surface.

Lillibridge v. Lackawanna Coal Co. 143 Pa. 293, 13 L. R. A. 627, 22 Atl. 1035; Knight v. Indiana Coal & I. Co. 47 Ind. 105, 17 Am. Rep. 695; Bryan, Petroleum & Natural Gas, § 29; *Caldwell v. The word "surface" is universally used in all the judicial opinions as a synonym for the agricultural portion of the land, or the superincumbent soil.

Messrs. Fleming & Fleming and O. W. Russell also for appellees.

McWhorter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By decree of the circuit court of Harrison county entered on the 27th day of May, 1890, in the case of W. J. Deison and John W. Monroe against Cruger W. Smith and others for the partition of 397 acres of land, there was assigned to said Deison and Monroe, the plaintiffs, in fee simple and in severalty a tract of 180 acres, known as "Lot No. 1" in the partition. On the 20th day of August, 1891, John W. Monroe and wife, in consideration of $1,200, conveyed with general warranty to Benjamin Wilson "all the coal in, on, or underlying the undivided one half of a certain tract of land situated in said county, containing 180 acres," and granting also to said Wilson the right to make and maintain on said tract of land such openings as might be necessary for ventilation, for drainage, and for the taking out of all the coal, without any liability for injury to the surface of said tract of land, or anything thereon, by reason of mining and removing the coal, and all rights of way and privileges necessary to the proper mining and removing of the coal; and on the 11th day of September, 1891, William J. Deison and wife, in consideration of $1,200, conveyed with covenants of special warranty to said Wilson their undivided one half in fee simple of said 180 acres of land. On the 28th day of September, 1891, said Benjamin Wilson conveyed to John W. Monroe the surface of the said 180 acres, undivided, which was conveyed to him by said Deison, in the following words: "Now this deed further witnesseth that Wilson does hereby grant to the said John W. Monroe all the surface of the said one hundred and eighty acres, undivided, that was so conveyed to him by said Deison. This conveyance is for a valuable consideration, but the said Wilson retains the right to make and maintain on said tract of land such openings as may be necessary for ventilation, for drainage, and for taking out of all the coal, without any liability for injury to the surface of said tract of land, or anything thereon, by reason of the mining of said coal, and the right to remove same, and the right to him and his heirs and assigns, and to all persons claiming by, through, and under them, to enter in, upon, and under said tract of land for the purpose of mining and removing the coal from said land, the right to make and maintain such openings thereon, and the right to pass over, through, or under said tract of land, by railway or otherwise, to reach any other lands belonging to him or his heirs or assigns, and all persons claiming by, through, or under him. This conveyance and six hundred dollars cash paid by Wilson to Monroe makes up the consideration paid by Wilson for Monroe's undivided one-half interest in the coal underlying the one hundred and eighty (180) acres aforesaid, which said Monroe has conveyed to Wilson, with certain privileges in his deed specified, and above referred to." On the 7th of April, 1893, John W. Monroe and his wife conveyed the said 180 acres of land to John J. Williams an undivided two-thirds interest and to William T. Williams undivided one-third interest, excepting and reserving therefrom the "coal in and under the same as fully as the same has been heretofore conveyed, together with all mining rights and privileges granted and reserved in said deeds from Monroe to Wilson and from Wilson to Monroe, respectively, to all which deeds references are here made." On the 12th day of June, 1899, Benjamin Wilson and others leased to the South Penn Oil Company, its successors or assigns, "for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas and of laying pipe lines, building tanks," etc., four several tracts of land, containing in the aggregate about 500 acres, including the tract of 180 acres; the lessee to deliver to the credit of the lessors, their heirs or assigns, free of cost, in the pipe lines, the equal one-eighth part of all the oil produced and saved from the leased premises, and to pay $200 per year for the gas from each and every gas well drilled on the premises the product from which should be marketed and used off the premises. On the 21st day of June, 1899, John J. Williams and W. T. Williams leased for the same purposes to the said South Penn Oil Company the said tract of 180 acres of land, the lessee covenanting "to deliver to the credit of the first parties, their heirs or assigns, free of cost, in the pipe line to which it may connect its wells, their proportionate share of the equal one-eighth part of all oil produced and saved from the leased premises," and "to pay their proportionate share of $200 per year for the gas from each and every gas well drilled on said premises, the product from which is marketed and used off the premises." At the November rules, 1900, John J. Williams and William T. Williams filed their bill against the South Penn Oil Company, the Eureka Pipe Line Company, Benjamin Wilson, and others, in the circuit court of Harrison county, claiming to be the sole owners of the one-eighth royalty of the oil and gas in the 180 acres, and praying that it might be so decreed to them, and that, there being no contention or controversy as to their being entitled to the one half of said royalty, that the defendant South Penn Oil Company be required to deliver up to them the one half of royalty, or one sixteenth of the oil. The defendant South Penn Oil Company filed its answer, denying the allegation of the bill that it entered upon the said tract of land exclusively under the lease made by the plaintiffs, but that it entered under the said lease and also under the Wilson lease; denied that it had failed or refused to sign the division order or orders under which the Eureka Pipe Line Company could and would have delivered the one eighth of royalty oil of all produced and being produced from the leased premises; but it was the truth that it had refused to sign such order, as demanded by plaintiffs, under which they would have received the whole of the one-eighth royalty; and denied that it had covenanted in its lease to deliver the one-eighth royalty to plaintiffs; that it did not pretend to decide and say that plaintiffs might not be entitled to some part of said oil, but, if they had title to some part thereof, that such part, if anything, was less than the amount or part claimed by them in their bill, and asked that plaintiffs be required to show to the court what interest they had in the royalty in the oil, as well as their proportionate share of $200 per year for the gas wells; and expressed their readiness to deliver the one-eighth royalty as the court might direct it to be distributed among the persons entitled to the same. Defendant Benjamin Wilson filed his separate demurrer and answer to the bill, claiming to be entitled, with his colessors, to one half the royalty and price of the gas produced from said 180 acres, and denied that he had conveyed to the said Monroe anything more than the surface of the one equal undivided moiety of said 180 acres. On the 7th of February, the answers of the several defendants were filed, to which plaintiffs replied generally, and joined in the demurrers, and, there being no adverse claim to one half of the royalty of the oil and one half of the gas rental claimed by plaintiffs, it was ordered to be delivered to them, and the residue of the oil was directed to remain in the pipe lines until further orders from the court. On the 23d of May the death of defendant Benjamin Wilson was suggested, and the cause revived in the name of his heirs at law, and on the 2d of October, 1901, the cause was finally heard, and the court overruled the demurrer, and divided the one half of the royalty oil—being one sixteenth—and the gas rental among the defendants in the proportions to which they were entitled, and, being of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the relief prayed for in their bill, the same was dismissed, and judgment was entered against the plaintiffs for costs; from which decree plaintiffs appealed.

The question involved in the case seems to turn upon what was conveyed by the deed of September 28, 1891, from Benjamin Wilson to John W. Monroe. After the deed from Deison to Wilson, the latter was the owner of all the coal and the one undivided half of the residue of the whole tract in fee. Wilson, by his deed of September 28, 1891, conveyed to John W. Monroe "all the surface of the said 180 acres, undivided, that was so conveyed to him by said Deison." Counsel for the appellants insists that the word "surface," or a conveyance of the surface of the land, carries with it every part of the land not specifically excepted and files a very ingenious, as well as able, brief in support of his position; but it is well settled that the different materials which go to make up land may be severed by reservation or express grant; after severance or express grant. In Anderson, Dictionary of Law, at page 677, it is said: "The law recognizes horizontal divisions of land. A severance of the surface from the underlying strata may be created either by reservation or express grant; after severance, a mineral right is an independent interest. Thus, one person may own the iron ore, another the coal, another the limestone, and another the petroleum, and another the surface." Caldwell v. Copeland, 37 Pa. 427, 78 Am. Dec. 436. The very fact of conveying the surface specifically carries with it the idea of an express grant alone of the surface, and severs it from every other material composing the land. A conveyance of any specified interest in the land, such as the coal, or the limestone, or the iron ore, or the surface, is an express grant, and severs such interest from every other part of the land; and the title to all the residue remains in the grantor, just as any part of the land would, if reserved specifically in a deed conveying the land. In Knight v. Indiana Coal & I. Co. 47 Ind. 105, 17 Am. Rep. 692, and at page 695, 17 Am. Rep., it is said in the opinion: "The owner in fee simple has the power to sell and convey his mines or any stratum by deed or grant so as to create one freehold in the soil and another in the mines; and, as a conclusion from the premises, a freeholder of an estate of inheritance may by deed create as many freeholds beneath the surface as he can properly designate. Thus, one person may own the surface, another may be entitled, by conveyance, to the iron, another to the limestone, and still another to a stratum of coal; for coal and minerals in place are land, and are subject to a conveyance as such and the owner of the mineral right has a corporeal hereditament distinct from the surface,"—and cites Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. 475, 72 Am. Dec. 760; Harlan v. Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. 35 Pa. 287; Bainbridge Mines, 7-10; Armstrong v. Caldwell, 53 Pa. 284; Addison Torts, 116; Whitaker v. Brown, 46 Pa. 197; Caldwell v. Copeland, 37 Pa. 427, 78 Am. Dec. 436; and Barnes v. Mawson, 1 Mees. & S. 77. Section 29, Bryan, Petroleum & Natural Gas, says: "In mineral lands the surface or soil as adapted to cultivation may be separated from the mineral right, or the right to dig under the surface for, and one person may own one of these rights and another person the other;" citing Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 109 Pa. 583, 58 Am. Rep. 743, 1 Atl. 394; Suvin v. McCalmont Oil Co. 184 Pa. 202, 38 Atl. 1021. See also § 30, Bryan, Petroleum & Natural Gas. In Chartiers Block Coal Co. v. Mellon, 152 Pa. 286, 18 L. R. A. 702, 25 Atl. 597, Chief Justice Paxson, in delivering the opinion of the court, at page 295, 152 Pa., page 706, 18 L. R. A., page 598, 25 Atl., says: "The mining of coal and other minerals is constantly developing new questions. Formerly a man who owned the surface owned it to the center of the earth. Now the surface of the land may be separated from the different strata underneath it, and there may be as many different owners as there are strata. Lilli-bridge v. Lackawanna Coal Co. 143 Pa. 293, 13 L. R. A. 627, 22 Atl. 1035. The difficulty is to so apply the law as to give each owner the right of enjoyment of his property or strata without impinging upon the right of other owners, where the owner of the surface has neglected to guard his own rights in the deed by which he granted the lower strata to other owners." Justice Paxson further says: "In the earlier days of the common law the attention of buyers and sellers, and therefore the attention of the courts, was fixed upon the surface. He who owned the surface owned all that grew upon it and all that was buried beneath it. His title extended upward to the clouds and downward to the earth's center. The value of his estate lay, however, in the arable qualities of the surface, and, with rare exceptions, the income derived from it was the result of agriculture. The comparatively recent development of the sciences of geology and mineralogy, and the multiplication of mechanical devices for penetrating the earth's crust, have greatly changed the uses and the values of lands. The tracts that were absolutely valueless, so far as the surface was concerned, have come to be worth many times as much per acre as the best farming lands in the commonwealth, because of the rich deposits of coal, or iron, or oil, or gas known to underlie them at various depths. These deposits are sometimes found, however, beneath well-cultivated farms, so that the surface has a large market value apart from the value of the deposits of coal or other minerals under it. In such cases the owner is rarely able to utilize the lower stores of wealth to which he has title by mining operations conducted by himself, and for this reason he sells them to some person or corporation to be mined and to be moved. So, it often happens that the owner of a farm sells the land to one man, the iron or oil or gas to another, giving to each purchaser a deed or conveyance in fee simple for his particular deposit or stratum, while he retains the surface for settlement and cultivation precisely as he held it before. The severance is complete for all legal and practical purposes. Each of the separate layers or strata becomes a subject of taxation, of encumbrance, levy, and sale, precisely like the surface. As against the owner of the surface, each of the several purchasers would have the right, without any express words of grant for that purpose, to go upon the surface to open a way by shaft, or drift, or well to his underlying estate, and to occupy so much of the surface beyond the limits of his shaft, drift, or well as might be necessary to operate his estate, and to remove the product thereof. This is a right to be exercised with due regard to the owner of the surface, and its exercise will be restrained, within proper limits, by a court of equity, if this becomes necessary; but, subject to this limitation, it is a right growing out of the contract of sale, the position of the stratum sold, and the impossibility of reaching it in any other manner." In Murray v. Allred, 100 Tenn. 100, 39 L. R. A. 249, 43 S. W. 355, at page 251, 39 L. R. A., the court quoted from 2 Rapalje & L. Law Dict. p. 821: "In the most general sense of the term, minerals are those parts of the earth which are capable of being got from underneath the surface for the purpose of profit. The term therefore includes coal, metal, ores of all kind, clay, stone, slate, and coprolites. 'Surface' means that part of the land which is capable of being used for agricultural purposes,"—and cites Midland R. Co. v. Checkley, L. R. 4 Eq. 19; Hext v. Gill, L. R. 7 Ch. 699; Atty. Gen. v. Tomline, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 762. There can be no question but that the word "surface" has a definite, certain meaning; that it is that portion of the land which is or may be used for agricultural purposes, for plowing, grazing, etc., and that a conveyance of the surface of a tract of land as completely severs the surface from the various strata beneath it as the conveyance of the coal, iron, limestone, or any other specified stratum or interest in the land conveys a separate estate. It is claimed by appellants that the language used in the deed is to be taken most strictly against the grantor, and cites Jones, Real Prop. § 52; Turk v. Skiles, 45 W. Va. 84, 30 S. E. 234; 2 Minor, Inst. 1066; but this can only apply where the language of the deed is ambiguous, or will admit of two constructions. In § 848, Devlin, Deeds, it is said: "It is an old principle of law that exceptions in a deed and every uncertainty are to be taken favorably for the grantee." But this rule is not applicable to any case but one of strict equivocation,—cases where the language of the deed is susceptible of two interpretations. . . . But a construction should, if possible, be adopted that will render all parts of the deed operative. * * * This rule is often misunderstood. It does not mean that the words are to be twisted out of their proper meanings, but only that where the words may properly bear two meanings, and where, after we have applied evidence, whether extrinsic or intrinsic, admissible under the foregoing rules, we are still unable to determine in which of these meanings they were used, we must take them in the meaning most disadvantageous to the person who used them, unless the adoption of that meaning would work wrong." The defect in the argument of counsel for appellant is that he assumes that the meaning of the grantor, Wilson, is uncertain as to what he conveys to Monroe. He says that Wilson makes almost exactly the same reservations in his deed as to the coal privileges as he had Monroe to grant to him when Monroe conveys his interest in the coal to Wilson. I see nothing in this inconsistent with the view that he is conveying alone the surface or agricultural part of the land to Monroe. The reservation of the right of way, and to make and maintain openings for mining purposes, refers to the surface, and the rights and privileges therein, the same in one case as in the other. A careful examination of the deed from Wilson to Monroe will show that the grant to Monroe was of "all of the surface of the 180 acres, undivided, that was so conveyed to him by said Deison." This is the whole granting clause, and is complete in itself, and mentions specifically the surface of the undivided moiety. The grantor does not specifically reserve the coal in the said Deison interest, but "retains the right to make and maintain on said tract of land such openings as may be necessary for ventilation, for drainage, and for taking out all of the coal, without any liability for injury to the surface of said tract of land, or anything thereon, by reason of the mining of said coal, and the right to remove the same,"

etc. The grantor was the owner in fee of the one undivided half of the coal before conveyed to him by Monroe, and this retention of the privileges of mining the coal could, with propriety, be applied to his said undivided interest in the coal derived from Monroe; and could not the appellees with the same propriety claim that the granting of the surface of the one half of the Deison undivided half interest carried with it the coal, as well as the oil and gas, or any other interest therein? In Buchanan v. Andrew, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 286: "It is the safest and best mode of construction upon all occasions to give to words free from ambiguity their plain and ordinary meaning." Counsel for appellants says that Monroe understood this deed to convey to him everything but the coal, as will appear from his deed of general warranty to John J. and William T. Williams, where, "after reciting that Deison and Monroe owned the land, and Monroe had sold the coal under his undivided half to Wilson, and Deison had sold his undivided one-half interest in said tract of land in fee to Wilson, and Wilson had sold all the surface of his undivided half interest in said tract of the land to Monroe, reserving the coal underlying the same with mining and other privileges therein named," it does not appear that plaintiffs so understood it. In making their lease to the defendant South Penn Oil Company for their interest in said oil and gas, it is provided that the lessee shall "deliver to the credit of the first parties [plaintiffs], their heirs or assigns, free of cost, in the pipe line to which it may connect its wells, their proportionate share of the equal one-eighth part of all oil produced and saved from the leased premises." And a similar provision in relation to the gas rental. Thus it is seen that they were not entitled, under the lease, to all the royalty oil and gas. It is claimed by appellees, and not denied, that this provision as to their "proportionate share" of the royalty was interlined in the lease, and written in with a pen; but it is claimed by counsel for appellants that this provision for the payment to them of the proportionate share of the royalty and rental as referred to here means a distribution between the lessors in said lease as between themselves. On the 12th of June—a few days before the date of their lease—the South Penn Oil Company had taken a lease from Wilson of the same character for the same property, with an agreement or provision to deliver to the lessors the equal one-eighth part of the oil produced from the premises, and it appearing that the appellants had an interest in the oil, it was necessary to take from them a lease as well, to enable it to take possession and drill for oil. The lease made by the appellants was a joint lease, and their "proportionate share" was a joint share, and evidently so recognized in 60 L. R. A.

the provision for its payment. If it had been intended to distribute the proportionate share to the lessors, respectively, as between themselves, it would have so provided; but the language of the lease clearly indicates that these lessors were not entitled to the royalty, except to their joint proportionate share of the one eighth of oil and their share of the gas rental. Under the lease they were entitled to receive their share together as one share, the proportion to which they were entitled as between them and the other lessors.

There is no error in said decree, and the same will be affirmed.

Dent, P., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the decision in this case, for the reason that the effect of it is to render the plaintiff's estate voidable at the instance of those who are held to own all the strata underneath the surface, with the implied right to enter and remove the same, including rock, fire clay, limestone, and all other formations to the center of the earth, leaving nothing whatever to support the surface. This was plainly not the intention of the parties, and, if the deed so reads, it should be so reformed to meet that intention. The grantor having set forth in his conveyance what rights he was to have in so far as the surface is concerned,—and this was to enter and remove the coal alone,—precludes any implied rights for any other purpose. So he has no implied right to enter and remove the oil and gas. They being of such volatile character as not to be the subject of separate property in place, but only when reduced to occupancy, the owner of the surface, who has the exclusive right thereto, except as to the removal of the coal, alone has the right to control the production of such oil and gas. If the life tenant is entitled to the interest on the oil produced until the expiration of the tenancy (Eakin v. Hawkins [W. Va.] 43 S. E. 211), the owner of the soil in fee should be entitled to such interest during the continuance of his estate,—that is, perpetually,—which takes the whole thereof absolutely; otherwise the owner of the soil in fee has a less estate than the life tenant. The surface, when reduced to its ordinary meaning in common acceptance, includes only the face of the land and does not even cover the tillable soil. So that even the clay could be taken for the manufacture of brick and pottery. In this deed it was clearly the intention of the parties that the surface meant, not only the face of the land, but all that was necessary to support it down even to the center of the earth, except the coal, which was impliedly reserved, along with the coal privileges expressly reserved.

The case should be reversed, and justice done between the parties.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of South Carolina, Respt., v.Nelson J. SHAW, Appt.

(64 S. C. 566.)

1. An appellate court may grant a new trial when there is no evidence to support the verdict.
2. A master may be found guilty of murder for whipping a servant so that he dies, although he has a right to inflict the punishment, and the instrument is proper, if the punishment is so prolonged and barbarous as to indicate malice.

(December 13, 1902.)

NORM.—Homicide by excessive or improper chastisement.

- I. The general rule, 801.
- II. Parent and child, 801.
- III. Persons in loco parentis, 802.
- IV. Schoolmaster and pupil, 803.
- V. Husband and wife, 803.
- VI. Master and servant, slave, or apprentice, 804.
- VII. Conclusion, 804.

I. The general rule.

Parents, masters, and other persons, having authority in foro domestico, may give reasonable correction to those under their care, and, if death ensue without their fault, it will be no more than an accidental death; but, if the correction exceed the bounds of due moderation, either in the measure of it, or in the instrument made use of for that purpose, it will be either murder or manslaughter according to the circumstances of the case. State v. Harris, 63 N. C. 1.

If a father, master, or schoolmaster correct his child, servant, or scholar, he must do it with a fit instrument for correction, and not with such an instrument as is liable to kill him; and, if he uses such an instrument, he is criminally liable therefor. Grey's Case, J. Kelyng, 64, 1 East P. C. 261.

And as a general rule a beating from which death results will be regarded as excessive, so as to render the person inflicting it guilty of manslaughter. Reg. v. Hopley, 2 Fort. & F. 202.

II. Parent and child.

A parent cannot be permitted deliberately to inflict such punishment on his child as will be likely to produce death, and yet escape criminal responsibility under the cover of parental authority to correct in moderation. Powell v. State, 67 Miss. 119, 6 So. 646.

And where it appears that a father, in punishing his child, used a weapon likely to produce death in an unlawful, improper, and cruel manner, and committed such an act as, in its consequence, naturally tended to destroy the life of the child; and that the child died therefrom,—he is guilty of murder, although he may not have intended to kill him. Williams v. State, 57 Ga. 478.

Where, in the chastisement of a child, the instrument used is a deadly weapon, or equivalent thereto, and death results, it is murder; and where the correction inflicted with an instrument improper for the purpose, but not deadly, or with a proper instrument to an im-

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Sessions Circuit Court for Sumter County convicting him of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lee & Moise, for appellant:

The facts show absolutely no evidence of murder, but only a case of manslaughter. Appellant stood towards the deceased in loco parentis, with the lawful right to administer chastisement with a proper instrument for that purpose, and, if chastisement was moderate and death ensued, it was, as matter of law, excusable homicide. If it was immoderate and excessive, and death ensued, it was, as matter of law, manslaughter, and proper degree, and death results, it is manslaughter; and where, in such case, the proof is wholly circumstantial, and such that it might be inferred that the father killed the child intentionally to get insurance on her life, or that she died from a blow on her head with a broom handle, which was struck before the insurance policy was taken out, and that she was not struck for the purpose of killing her, but that the injury was inflicted through his rough way of treating her,—the jury should be instructed as to voluntary manslaughter. Montgomery v. Com. 28 Ky. L. Rep. 732, 63 S. W. 747.

So, where a father stripped his young son, eight years old, naked, threw him on the floor, and savagely beat him from head to foot for about half an hour with a piece of rubber pipe, for some trifling offense, and death resulted therefrom within a few minutes, an instruction in a prosecution therefor that if such immoderate correction was intentionally inflicted without just cause or excuse, and, considering the manner and degree of infliction, and the age and strength of the child, that such correction was evidently dangerous and likely to kill or produce great bodily harm, the accused is guilty of murder, is proper, though he may not have intended to kill the child. Powell v. State, 67 Miss. 119, 6 So. 646.

And the act of a mother, being angry with one of her children, in taking up a small piece of iron used as a poker and throwing it at him, as he was running to the door which was open, is unlawful and improper as a mode of correction; and, where the iron struck another child just then entering at the door, causing its death, she is guilty of manslaughter, although she had no intention of hitting the child, with whom she was angry, intending only to frighten him. Rex v. Conner, 7 Car. & P. 438.

And where a father beats his helpless child to death without cause, and concludes by saying to his expiring victim: "Die, God damn you!" inquiry as to the motive is unnecessary; and an instruction in a prosecution therefor, that, if a motive on the part of the defendant to commit the crime has not been shown, then the jury ought to consider that as a circumstance favorable to the accused, is properly refused. Powell v. State, 67 Miss. 119, 6 So. 646.

And the right of a parent to correct a child has reference only to such children as are capable of correction and of appreciating it, and not to an infant two and one half years old; and while a slight slap might be lawfully given to such an infant by its mother, more violent treatment by its father would not be justifiable; and where the father of such an infant whips it with a strap 1 inch wide and 18 inches long for some childish fault, giving it from could not, under that state of facts, be murder.

State v. Johnson, 45 S. C. 483, 23 S. E. 619; State v. Howard, 64 S. C. 344, 58 L. R. A. 685, 42 S. E. 173; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 685; 3 Greenl. Ev. 134; 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 1014; 1 Russell, Crimes, p. 670.

Mr. John S. Wilson for respondent.

Gary, A. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record contains the following statement of facts: "The defendant (appellant) was indicted for the murder of Nathaniel Williams, a boy in his employ as a servant, whose death he caused by whipping him. He was tried before his honor Judge J. C. Klugh and a jury, at Sumter, at the June term, 1902, of the court of general sessions.

six to twelve strokes, and the child dies, the question for the jury on a prosecution for the homicide is whether the child's death was accelerated or caused by the blows inflicted by the father. Reg. v. Griffin, 11 Cox C. C. 402.

Though a father kills his child in correcting him, without legal excuse or justifiable cause, however, before convicting him of murder, the jury must believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the correction was excessive, cruel, unusual, evidently dangerous, and likely to kill or produce great bodily harm. Powell v. State, 67 Miss. 119, 6 So. 646.

And where it appears that a father had whipped his child with a little switch, not intending to kill him, but simply to chastise him reasonably and properly, and the child, by some mischance or accident died in consequence thereof, the father can be guilty of nothing more than involuntary manslaughter. Williams v. State, 57 Ga. 478.

And an instruction in a prosecution against a father for homicide, in whipping his child to death, that, if the defendant killed the child without any legal excuse or justification; and that, if the strap used by him in chastising the child was not a deadly weapon; and that, if the chastisement was not evidently dangerous and likely to kill or produce great bodily harm,—then he should be found guilty of manslaughter only, fairly represents the law of manslaughter as applicable to the facts of the case, and is quite as favorable to the accused as is warranted. Powell v. State, 67 Miss. 119, 6 So. 646.

And an instruction in a prosecution for murder of a child by whipping and beating it, in which there is evidence from which it might be inferred that the accused was not actuated by an intention to kill, or by an evil or cruel disposition, in which case the killing cannot be murder,—should present the alternative proposition as to the law where there was no intention to kill, as provided under Texas Code, art. 614, as well as where the intention evidently appeared in cases arising under the provisions of arts. 612, 613, and 615 thereof. Hill v. State, 11 Tex. App. 456.

III. Persons in loco parentis.

While the law allows a person in loco parentis the broadest latitude in governing another, it is not necessary to prove express malice on his part to convict him of murder when he caused death by whipping with such cruelty and inhumanity as to exclude the idea of passion. State v. Harris, 63 N. C. 1; and see State v. Shaw, 60 L. R. A.

The state put in evidence the small leather strap with which the whipping was done,—a proper instrument for chastisement; but the contention on the part of the state was that the whipping was cruel, immoderate, and excessive, causing the death of the boy, and hence that the defendant was guilty of murder. The deceased was a stout-built boy, aged about twelve or thirteen years, bright and intelligent, and in good health. He was at the time of his death, and had been for four or five years prior thereto, in the employ and service of the defendant, working for and waiting upon him about his dwelling and store, and clerking for him occasionally. The whipping occurred on Saturday, November 9, 1901, for a petty theft committed on the previous Thursday. The defendant's defense was the plea of not guilty; that the chastisement was moderate

And where a child was stripped naked by a person with whom he lived, and placed on his back with his feet tied up, and kept there from morning till night every day for a week, and repeatedly whipped each day while in that position with a heavy leather strap, a knitted cord, and an iron ramrod until he died, the provocation being small, deliberation and malice are shown, warranting a conviction for murder. State v. Harris, 63 N. C. 1.

And where a mother-in-law, perceiving a fault committed by her daughter-in-law in some work she was doing, threw a child's stool at her, which hit and killed her, and afterwards she concealed the death and hid the body, it is either murder or manslaughter. King v. Hazel, 1 Leach C. C. 368.

So, where a man beat a boy between five and six years of age with a piece of sycamore fishing pole, about 3 feet long and 1½ inches in diameter for some minutes, and afterwards procured a piece of grape vine about 1¼ inches in diameter, and resumed the beating, which lasted in all about fifteen minutes, and the child died from injuries received, an instruction, in a prosecution for the homicide, as to the law of murder in the first degree on the theory of a wilful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, and also as to the law of manslaughter in the fourth degree, is proper. State v. Shock, 68 Mo. 552.

And one who strikes a little girl about five years of age for disobedience in an unimportant matter, several times with an iron poker, knocking her down, and then stamps upon her, inflicting injuries resulting in death, is guilty, at least, of manslaughter; since the punishment is inflicted in a cruel and unusual manner, and the deed is done while committing a misdemeanor. People v. De Garmo, 73 App. Div. 46, 76 N. Y. Supp. 477.

And evidence of a course of brutal treatment by a stepfather towards his stepchild through a period of several months, and that she was found lying on the hearth dead with evidences on her body that her death was occasioned by burning, and that the accused was guilty of causing it, is sufficient to warrant a verdict, in the prosecution thereof, of wilful, malicious, premeditated, and deliberate murder. State v. Mahly, 68 Mo. 315.

And evidence, in a prosecution against a stepfather for killing a stepdaughter by beating her to death, that the child was beaten in a cruel and unmerciful manner; and that no one was present at the time of the chastisement except the accused, the child beaten to death, and her mother; and that the punishment was inflicted with a heavy rope, and that the rope was found and proper, and that the boy's death was wholly unintentional, and through misfortune; that at most it was a case of manslaughter. The jury found the prisoner guilty of murder, with a recommendation to mercy. Defendant's counsel moved before his honor upon the minutes for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict of the jury was not warranted by the evidence; that there was absolutely no evidence of murder or malicious homicide in the case to sustain the verdict; that, the defendant having the lawful right to inflict moderate chastisement, if he inflicted the same, and death ensued, it was at most manslaughter, and not murder; and hence that the conviction was illegal, and the verdict should be set aside. After hearing argument from the defendant's counsel, the presiding judge overruled the motion, and sentenced the prisoner to imprisonment for life in the state penitentiary. Due and timely notice of intention to appeal to the supreme court was served upon the solicitor."

The following are the appellant's exceptions: "(1) For that his honor the presiding judge erred, as matter of law, it is respectfully submitted, in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial, when there was no testimony whatever in the case to sustain the conviction of the prisoner of the crime of murder. (2) For that his honor the presiding judge erred, as matter of law, it is respectfully submitted, in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial, when the evidence in the case went no further than to make out at most a case of manslaughter."

The first question argued by the appellant's attorneys was whether this court had wet from a recent washing, with blood remaining in the interstices; and that the child's hands were broken: and that there were lacerations and bruises on different parts of her body. — Justifies a verdict of murder in the second degree. Taylor v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 57 S. W. 812.

The act of a person standing in the relation of a parent to a ten-year-old boy, however, who was disobedient and ran away, of tying him in a grain sack, having two holes in it, and then engaging with acquaintances in drinking whisky, and forgetting the boy, and allowing him to remain in the sack for several hours, when he was found to be dead, is not wilful, deliberate, and premeditated murder, but manslaughter. State v. Fields, 70 Iowa, 196, 30 N. W. 480.

And a person in loco parentis, who inflicts corporal punishment on a child, and compels it to work for an unreasonable number of hours and beyond its strength, after which the child dies of consumption, its death having been hastened by ill treatment, is not guilty of murder, but only of manslaughter, although the punishment was cruel and excessive and accompanied by violence and threatening language, where he believed that the child was shamming illness, and really able to do the work required. Rex v. Cheeseman, 7 Car. & P. 455.

IV. Schoolmaster and pupil.

A schoolmaster represents the parents of a pupil, and has parental authority delegated to him for the time being, and may, for the purpose of correcting a child, inflict moderate and reasonable corporal punishment; but, if it be administered to gratify passion, or if it be excessive or immoderate in nature or degree, or if protracted beyond the child's powers of endurance, and with an instrument unfitted for the purpose and calculated to produce danger to life or limb, the violence is unlawful; and, if death ensues, the person inflicting it is guilty of manslaughter. Reg. v. Hopley, 2 Fost. & F. 202.

While a father may authorize the chastisement of his child, he cannot authorize an excessive chastisement which will justify a schoolmaster in inflicting such chastisement as will cause death, whatever his motives may have been. Ibid.

And a schoolmaster who wrote to the parent of a pupil proposing to beat the pupil severely to subdue his obstinacy, and, on receiving the parent's reply assenting to his proposition, beat the boy for two hours and a half secretly in the night with a thick stick until he died, is guilty of manslaughter. Ibid.

V. Husband and wife.

Though a husband has a right to correct his wife on words between them, a pestle is an improper instrument with which to do it; and if, in such case, a husband uses a pestle to correct his wife, and kills her with it, he is guilty of murder. Grey's Case, J. Kelyng, 64, 1 East P. C. 261, Citing Dalton, Justice of Peace, 218.

And beating or striking a wife violently, though with the open hand, is not one of the rights conferred on a husband by marriage, even if the wife is drunk and insolent; and, such blows being illegal, if they cause the death of the wife, the husband is at least guilty of manslaughter. Com. v. McAfee, 108 Mass. 458, 11 Am. Rep. 383.

And the death of a wife, caused by her husband stamping and jumping upon her prostrate person, and by blows and kicks inflicted with great violence, and repeated during an afternoon and evening, is a murder committed with extreme atrocity and cruelty, within the meaning of the Massachusetts statute making such killing murder in the first degree. Com. v. Devlin, 126 Mass. 253.

And an allegation, in an indictment against a husband for the homicide of his wife, that he struck, kicked, beat, bruised, and wounded her upon her head and body, and threw her upon the floor, causing her death, sets forth the killing with sufficient particularity, though the proof is that he struck her with his open hand upon her cheek and about the temple, and she fell to the floor, and medical evidence attributed her death to falling on a chair, causing concussion of the brain. Com. v. McAfee, 108 Mass. 458, 11 Am. Rep. 383.

But an instruction, in a prosecution against a husband for the homicide of his wife, that, if he used such force and violence towards her as to cause her to leave his house from fear of death or great bodily harm at his hands, and her death was produced from exposure to cold, he is guilty of manslaughter, is improper, in the absence of an instruction that such fear of death or great bodily harm must have been well grounded or reasonable, and that her death by freezing was the natural and probable consequence of leaving the house at the time and under the circumstances; where it appears that the husband was a cripple, and had but one arm which he could use, and she was a high-tempered woman, and there was evidence that she could whip him. Hendrickson v. Com. 85 Ky. 281, 3 S. W. 166.

So, the unlawful beating by a husband of his

the power to grant a new trial on the ground mentioned in the exceptions. Whatever doubts may heretofore have existed as to the power of the supreme court to grant a new trial when there is no evidence to support the verdict, the rule is now well established by recent cases that it has such power. The reason for the rule is that it is error of law for the circuit court to refuse to set aside a verdict without any evidence to support it.

We will next consider whether there was any testimony whatever from which the jury had the right to infer malice on the part of the prisoner in causing the death of the boy, who died immediately after the whipping. We have never seen a case where the circumstances attending the homicide were more harrowing and revolting. There was testimony that the boy was stripped naked, and whipped for one or more hours, with a leather strap having a knot at one end; that there were more than a hundred welts raised upon him, which covered his body from his head to his feet; that, after blisters were raised over his body, they were burst by strokes from the strap; that the appellant resumed the whipping after being interrupted for a while by a visit from a person who had called to see him; that the boy's privates were most horribly mutilated, and that his pitiful appeals for mercy were disregarded. The appellant's attorneys, in their argument, contended that the jury could not find the prisoner guilty of murder, "because the appellant here stood towards the deceased in loco parentis, with the lawful right to administer chastisement with a proper instrument for that purpose; and, if the chastisement was moderate, and death ensued, it was, as a matter of law, excusable homicide, as contended by the appellant; but if, on the other hand, it was immoderate and excessive, as contended by the state, and death ensued, it was, as matter of law, manslaughter, and could not, wife, causing death after birth, of a child subsequently born, is not manslaughter, but murder in the second degree. Clarke v. State, 117 Ala. 1, 23 So. 671.

VI. Master and servant, slave, or apprentice.

Every master has a right moderately to chastise his servant, but the chastisement must be on just grounds and with an instrument properly adapted to the purposes of correction. The using of a weapon from which death is liable to ensue imports a mischievous disposition, and the law implies that degree of malice, if death actually does ensue, which will make it murder. King v. Wiggs, 1 Leach C. C. 378, note; and see State v. Shaw.

And a master who used his sword to correct his servant, causing his death, is guilty of murder, the sword being an improper instrument for that purpose. Rex v. Kette, 1 Ld. Raym. 140.

And a master, whose servant negligently permitted some of his sheep to escape, who, on seeing them go, seized a stake and threw it at the boy, hitting him on the head with it, fracturing his skull and killing him, is guilty of manslaughter. King v. Wiggs, 1 Leach C. C. 378, note.

So, where a slave is killed by his master or overseer, or either of them, in inflicting punishment upon him, the rules of the common law upon the subject of murder regulate the character of the offense; and at common law masters were allowed to punish their servants with moderation; and what was moderation, and what was a cruel and unusual punishment, was a question of fact for the jury. Kelly v. State, 3 Smedes & M. 518.

And where a master punishes a slave barbarously, unreasonably, immoderately, and accompanies the punishment by hard usage and the withholding of food, clothing, and rest, the punishment loses its character of correction, and denotes a contemplation of a fatal result; and, in case of the death of the slave, the master is guilty of murder. State v. Hoover, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 365, 34 Am. Dec. 383; Wilson v. State, 29 Tex. 240.

And, in case of such punishment, so severe as to cause death, the lesser offense provided for in Tex. Penal Code, art. 674, of the abuse or cruel treatment of a slave, is merged in the greater offense. Wilson v. State, 29 Tex. 240.

And the act of a master of a slave in wilfully and excessively whipping him so as to cause his death is murder in the first degree, though it was not done with the purpose and intention of killing him. Souther v. Com. 7 Gratt. 673.

But, under an indictment for the homicide of a slave by cruelly whipping, or other cruel and inhuman treatment, framed under Ala. Code, § 3296, providing that any owner, overseer, or other person having the right to correct any slave, who causes the death of such slave by cruelly whipping or beating, or by any other cruel or inhuman treatment, or by the use of any instrument in its nature calculated to produce death, though without any intention to kill, is guilty of murder in the second degree, and may be guilty of murder in the first degree, —the accused cannot be convicted of a higher offense than murder in the second degree. Es parte Howard, 30 Ala. 43.

In Grey's Case, J. Kelyng, 64, 1 East P. C. 261, however, it was said that, "if a master correct his servant, or lord his villain, and by force of that correction he dieth, although he did not intend to kill him, yet this is felony, because they ought to govern themselves in their correction in such ways that such a misadventure might not happen."

So, a master who, by premeditated negligence or harsh usage, causes the death of an apprentice, is guilty of murder. Rex v. Self, 1 Leach C. C. 137, 1 East P. C. 226.

And a master who, upon the disobedience of his apprentice and refusal to serve him, struck him with a bar of iron, breaking his skull and killing him, is guilty of murder. Grey's Case, J. Kelyng, 64, 1 East P. C. 261.

VII. Conclusion.

The question as to criminal responsibility for causing death in inflicting chastisement when the right to inflict it exists seems to depend entirely upon the reasonableness of the chastisement. If it is reasonable in extent and severity, and is inflicted with a proper instrument, and death happens to ensue, no criminal responsibility attaches; but, if it is unreasonably severe, or if it is inflicted with an improper instrument, and death results therefrom, it is manslaughter; and, if the severity is such as to be likely to cause death, or if it is inflicted with an instrument likely to cause death, showing a depraved mind and a reckless disregard for human life, from which malice might be inferred, it is murder.

F. H. B.

under that state of facts, be murder. Hence his conviction of the crime of murder was illegal, and the refusal by the court of his motion for a new trial was error of law." The general proposition for which they contend is amply sustained by the authorities cited in their argument. The jury, however, in the cases mentioned, must be satisfied that the chastisement was inflicted for the purpose of correction, and not for the purpose of destroying the life of the person upon whom the punishment is inflicted. In the note at page 658 of 1 Archbold, Crim. Pr. & PL, it is said: "If death ensues from a master's chastisement of his slave, inflicted apparently with a good intent for reformation or example, and with no purpose to take life or put it in jeopardy, the law would doubtless tenderly regard every circumstance, which, judging from the conduct generally of masters towards slaves, might reasonably be supposed to have led the party into excess. But where the punishment is barbarously immoderate, and unreasonable in the measure, the continuance, and the instruments, accompanied by other harsh usage and painful privations of food, clothing, and rest, it loses all character of correction in foro domestico, and denotes plainly that the master must have contemplated a fatal termination of his barbarous cruelties; and in such case, if death ensue, he is guilty of murder,"—citing State v. Hoover, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 365, 34 Am. Dec. 383. The facts and circumstances surrounding the homicide were such as to warrant the jury in drawing the inference that the purpose and intention of the prisoner was to take the life of the boy. If such was the case, the jury had the right to infer malice, and to find the prisoner guilty of murder. There being, therefore, some evidence proper to be submitted to the jury upon the question of malice, it was not error of law to refuse the motion for a new trial. The exceptions must, therefore, be overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

NATIONAL TELEGRAPH NEWS COMPANY et al., Appts.,
v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

(119 Fed. 294.)

1. The market quotations and sporting news gathered by a telegraph company, and delivered to its patrons by means of tickers, are not, as so delivered, within the protection of the United States copyright laws.
2. The news of market quotations and sporting items gathered and furnished by a telegraph company to patrons by means of tickers is property, which will be protected by equity against appropriation by rival companies who intend to furnish it to their patrons in competition with complainant, to the injury or destruction of the service.

Messrs. Frank O. Lowden, Henry D. Estabrook, and Herbert J. Davis, for appellee:

Property is simply a right; it is the right in or to a thing. The corpus, or res, or thing, is simply the subject of property.

Eton v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 51 N. H. 504, 12 Am. Rep. 147.

A partial disposition, by the true proprietor, of a thing that is his, is not to be carried beyond the intent and measure of his assent and approbation in that behalf, whether it be the case of borrowing, hiring, or a compact of any other sort.

Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2303.

When a person, at the cost of effort and money, obtains information, formulates it in words, and commits it to writing, he has a property therein.

The reports of passing events, sent over appellee's tickers to saloons, hotels, and brokers' offices, is not, properly speaking, literature; it does not come within the purview of the copyright statutes.

Clayton v. Stone, 2 Paine, 382, Fed. Cas. No. 2,872.

But appellee's news report is akin to literary property. It may appropriately be called quasi—or pseudo—literary property; not within the purview of the copyright statutes, to be sure; not affected, therefore, selling prices of his wares and merchandise. for use by his travelling salesman, has a property right therein which may be protected by injunction, see Simmons Hardware Co. v. Walbel (S. D.) 11 L. R. A. 267, with note on what products of skill and labor are entitled to protection.

by any of the provisions of those statutes, but finding its protection, if at all, in the principles of the common law.

A telegraph message, together with the contents thereof, is the subject of property. If the message and its contents are appellee's property before publication, then it must be admitted that the news report is appellee's exclusive property, to do with as it sees fit.

How does the publication of a manuscript, not within the purview of the copyright statutes, warrant the presumption of an abandonment or dedication to the general public? Publication is but one method of using his property,—the only method which could make his property of profit to himself or of value to the public.

Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2341.

The question simmers itself down to one of intention. Intention is a question of fact, evidenced by a person's word, or act, or omission to act.

At common law an author of any book or literary composition had the sole right of first printing, and publishing the same for sale, and might bring an action against any person who printed, published, and sold the same without his consent. Such right was not taken away upon his printing and publishing such book or literary composition, but the author had the exclusive right of copy in perpetuity.

Ibid.

Where literary, or quasi literary, property, such as here involved, is not subject to statutory copyright, the facts, or acts, or circumstances evidencing an intention to donate the owner's right of copy to the general public, should be even more unequivocal than where the property is a drama, or lecture, or musical composition, privileged to statutory protection.

An uncopyrighted drama or lecture is not generally dedicated to the public by presentation, so that one in the audience would be permitted to take the words uttered by the actors in shorthand and reproduce them.

It would be difficult to imagine a more limited publication than is the ticker report. It is a single copy, sent to the particular subscriber, to be read under a glass case. It is not even separated from the machine which produces it. It is literally a part of the machine, and the only part which gives value to the apparatus.

Kiernan v. Manhattan Quotation Teleg. Co. 50 How. Pr. 194; Exchange Teleg. Co. v. Gregory [1896] 1 Q. B. 147.

The publication by appellee of its news report on any particular day would not, in legal contemplation, have been completed until the last moment of that day, and the rights of the public, therefore, could not attach until the day succeeding.

Marcell v. Somerton, 30 L. T. N. S. 11.

The competition of appellants is intrinsically unfair. It is the policy of the law to encourage enterprise. It is a principle of law that a man is entitled to the fruits of his enterprise; he is not obliged to contribute his effort to the support of a stranger and a rival in business.

Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. McConnell, 82 Fed. 65.

Grosscup, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, the Western Union Telegraph Company, does a general telegraphing business, having offices in every state, village, hamlet, and railroad station in the country, and wires connecting the same with central offices through the country.

About 1881 there was invented an instrument which, by means of a type wheel, actuated by electrical impulse, automatically prints in plain, ordinary type, upon a strip of paper, messages transmitted electrically from a distance. The instrument is now generally known as the "ticker," and is commonly found in the offices of brokers, bankers, and other persons interested in the current price of securities, and in hotels, saloons, and other places where people who are interested in the happenings of the race tracks, athletic clubs, baseball associations, and in pending events generally, are in the habit of gathering. Upon the perfecting of this instrument appellee entered, in addition to its general telegraph business, upon a business heretofore new to it. It collected at various points, where it had offices, news relating to events there transpiring; and, after accumulating in its central offices such product by means of its wires, re-distributed to its tickers, in the offices and places of its patrons, by means of local wires, what was deemed of sufficient interest. The news thus gathered and printed upon strips of paper is open to the inspection of all persons who may come within these places.

The appellants, The National Telegraph News Company, and F. E. Crawford and A. K. Brown, its officers, own and control within the city of Chicago, a system of wires, connecting their operating office with tickers of their own, in the offices and places of patrons of their own. The evidence in the record before us shows that they have been appropriating vi et armis the news appearing upon the appellee's tape; and thereupon, with the loss of a few moments only, redistributing such news over their own wires and tickers to their own patrons. Such appropriation is not denied; but is defended as appellants' lawful right, upon the ground, chiefly, that, upon the appearance of the printed tape upon the appellee's tickers, in the places of appellee's patrons, there is such a publication as, within the meaning of the law, dedicates the contents of the tape to the public, and deprives appellee of any further monopoly therein.

The contention is grounded, chiefly, upon the assumption that the matter thus printed is, unless the subject-matter of copyright, unprotected against appropriation by the public; and, if the subject-matter of copyright, comes under § 4956 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3407), which provides that no person shall be entitled to a copyright unless he shall, before publication, deliver at the office of the librarian of Congress, or deposit in the mail addressed to the librarian of Congress at Washington, a printed copy of the title of the book, or other article, or a description of the painting, drawing, chromo, statue, statuary, or a model or design for a work of the fine arts, for which he desires copyright.

It is obvious, at a single glance, that the appellee is at great expense in gathering and transmitting the news, and in maintaining the instrumentalities, the offices, and the wires, through which its work, in this respect, is accomplished. At every initial point there must be one who is on the lookout,—eyes trained to see, and a judgment trained to discriminate,—and in every central office there must be minds fitted by native wit and acquired knowledge to winnow the wheat from the chaff. Added to this is the increased cost of despatchers, instruments, wires, and plant made necessary by this special department of appellee's business.

It is obvious, also, that if appellants may lawfully appropriate the product thus expensively put upon the appellee's tape, and distribute the same instantaneously to their own patrons, as their own product, thus escaping any expense of collection, but one result could follow—the gathering and distributing of news, as a business enterprise, would cease altogether. Appellee could not, in the nature of things, procure copyright under the act of Congress upon its printed tape; and it could not, against such unfair conditions, without some measure of protection, compete with appellants upon prices to be charged their respective patrons. And in the withdrawal of appellee from this business, there would come death to the business of appellants as well; for, without the use of appellee's tape, appellants would have nothing to distribute. The parasite that killed, would itself be killed, and the 60 L. R. A.

The general question raised by appellants' contention, then, is this: Is the printed tape, coming out of appellee's tickers, a book or article within the meaning of the copyright laws of the United States, and especially of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4956 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3407), and, if not a book or article within the meaning of the copyright law, is there any remedy that will protect this feature of appellee's business against the kind of piracy shown?

We are of the opinion that the printed tape would not be copyrightable, even if the practical difficulties were out of the way. When the Federal Constitution was adopted the right of property in literary production had been already securely established in English law. Its source, whether, in natural right, or in the statute of Anne, was still in doubt; but that an author had ownership of some species over the production of his brain,—an ownership as distinctive as that of the creator of corporeal property,—was conceded by all. Indeed, it could not be otherwise in a civil polity that recognizes the individual, and his right to enjoy what he creates, as the unit of organized society.

But when the Federal Constitution was adopted, the application of this right to productions other than those strictly literary had not yet been mooted. The great case of Donaldson v. Beckett, 2 Bro. P. C. 129, had been decided only thirteen years previously. The business world, that in this day permits nothing to escape as a means for its exploitation, had not yet pressed into her service art and books. Business catalogues, circulars containing market quotations, sheets, such as Dun's and Bradstreet's, directories,—the whole staff of aides-de-camp to commerce, now familiar to all,—were then practically unknown. In the public mind, the publication of a book meant that literature, as literature, had received an accession.

Unquestionably, the framers of the Constitution, in vesting Congress with "power to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries," had this kind of authorship in mind; and were the intention of the framers of the Constitution to give boundary to the constitutional grant, many writings, to which copyright has since been extended, would have been excluded. But, here as elsewhere, the Constitution, under judicial construction, has expanded to new conditions as they arose. Little by little copyright has been extended to the literature of commerce, so that it now includes books that the old guild of authors would have disdained; catalogues, mathematical tables, statistics, designs, guide-books, directories, and other works of similar character. Nothing, it would seem, evincing, in its makeup, that there has been underneath it, in some substantial way, the mind of a creator or originator, is now excluded. A belief that in no other way can the labor of the brain, in these useful departments of life, be adequately protected, is doubtless responsible for this wide departure from what was unquestionably the original purpose of the Constitution.

But, obviously, there is a point at which this process of expansion must cease. It would be both inequitable and impracticable to give copyright to every printed article. Much of current publication—in fact the greater portion—is nothing beyond the mere notation of events, transpiring, which, if transpiring at all, are accessible by all. It is inconceivable that the copyright grant of the Constitution, and the statutes in pursuance thereof, were meant to give a monopoly of narrative to him, who, putting the bare recital of events in print, went through the routine formulæ of the copyright statutes.

It would be difficult to define, comprehensively, what character of writing is copyrightable, and what is not. But, for the purposes of this case, we may fix the confines at the point where authorship proper ends, and mere annals begin. Nor is this line easily drawn. Generally speaking, authorship implies that there has been put into the production something meritorious from the author's own mind; that the product embodies the thought of the author, as well as the thought of others; and would not have found existence in the form presented, but for the distinctive individuality of mind from which it sprang. A mere annal, on the contrary, is the reduction to copy of an event that others, in a like situation, would have observed; and its statement in the substantial form that people generally would have adopted. A catalogue, or a table of statistics, or business publications generally, may thus belong to either one or the other of these classes. If, in their makeup, there is evinced some peculiar mental endowment,—the grasp of mind, say, in a table of statistics, that can gather in all that is needful, the discrimination that adjusts their proportions,—there may be authorship within the meaning of the copyright grant as interpreted by the courts. But if, on the contrary, such writings are a mere notation of the figures at which stocks or cereals have sold, or of the result of a horse race, or base-ball game, they cannot be said to bear the impress of individuality, and fail, therefore, to rise to the plane of authorship. In authorship, the product has some likeness to the mind underneath it; in a work of mere notation, the mind is guide only to the fingers that make the notation. One is the product of originality; the other the product of opportunity.

Judged by a test like this, the printed matter on the tape in question is in no sense copyrightable. It is, at most, the mere annal of events transpiring. True, the happenings of a race track, or the incidents of a college boat race, may be put in narrative, involving creative imagination; or the doings of a board of trade become the basis of a useful book or article evincing originality. But the printed tape under consideration is no such book or article, and affects no such dignity. It is, in its totality, nothing more nor less than the transmission by electricity, over long distances, of what a spectator of the event, occupying a fortunate position to see or hear, would have communicated, by word of mouth, to his less fortunate neighbor. It is an exchange merely, over wider area, of ordinary sightseeing; and the exchange is in the language of the ordinary sightseer. Matter of this character is not, within the meaning of the copyright law, the fruit of intellectual labor, and would not, if actually copyrighted, be protected by the courts. J. L. Mott Iron Works v. Clair, 27 C. C. A. 250, 53 U. S. App. 461, 82 Fed. 316.

Indeed, the printed tape under consideration has no value at all as a book or article. It lasts literally for an hour, and is in the waste basket when the hour has passed. It is not desired by the patron for the intrinsic value of the happening recorded,—the happening, as an happening, may have no value. The value of the tape to the patron is almost wholly in the fact that the knowledge thus communicated is earlier, in point of time, than knowledge communicated through other means, or to persons other than those having a like service. In just this quality—to coin a word, the pre-communicatedness of the information—is the essence of appellee's service; the quality that wins from the patron his patronage.

Now, in virtue of this quality, and of this quality alone, the printed tape has acquired a commercial value. It is, when thus looked at, a distinct commercial product, as much so as any other output relating to business, and brought about by the joint agency of capital and business ability. In no accurate view can appellee be said to be a publisher or author. Its place, in the classification of the law, is that of a carrier of news; the contents of the tape being an implement only, in the hands of such carrier, in its engagement for quick transmission. This is service; not authorship, nor the work of the publisher.

This, then, brings us to the second inquiry: Is there any remedy that will protect appellee, in this feature of its business, against the piracy of outsiders? Has appellee in the performance of this service, no appeal to the law?

It will be noted, first, that the business is, as an entirety, a lawful one. It meets a distinctive commercial want, and in some of its branches, at least, adds to the facilities of the business world. Indeed, no argument against its lawfulness has been advanced.

The business involves, also, the use of property. This consideration brings it at once, in a general way, within the protecting care of courts of equity. At first glance the immediate act restrained in the order below—the use of the information by a rival enterprise until after sixty minutes—may not appear as a trespass upon, or injury to, property, other than to the extent that there may be property in the printed matter. But such a view falls short of looking far enough. Property, even as distinguished from property in intellectual production, is not, in its modern sense, confined to that which may be touched by the hand, or seen by the eye. What is called tangible property has come to be, in most great enterprises, but the embodiment, physically, of an underlying life,—a life that, in its contribution to success, is immeasurably more effective than the mere physical embodiment. Such, for example, are properties built upon franchises, on grants of government, on good will, or on trade names, and the like. It is needless to say, that to every ingredient of property thus made up,—the intangible as well as the tangible; that which is discernible to mind only, as well as that susceptible to physical touch,—equity extends appropriate protection. Otherwise courts of equity would be unequal to their supposed great purposes; and every day, as business life grows more complicated, such inadequacy would be increasingly felt.

Nowhere is this recognition by courts of equity of the intangible side of property better exemplified than in the remedies recently developed against unfair competition in trade. An unregistered trade name or mark is, in essence, nothing more than a symbol, conveying to eye and ear information respecting origin and identity; as if the manufacturer, present in person, and pointing to the article, were to say, "These are mine;" and the injunctive remedy applied is simply a command that this form of speech—this method of saying, These are mine—shall not be intruded upon unfairly by a like speech of another.

Standing apart, the symbol or speech is not property. Disconnected from the business in which it is utilized, it cannot be monopolized. But used as a method of making an enterprise succeed, so that its appropriation by another would be a distinctive injury to the enterprise to which it is attached, the name, or mark, becomes at once the subject-matter of equitable protection. Here, as elsewhere, the eye of equity jurisdiction seeks out results, and, though the immediate thing to be acted upon by the injunction is not itself, alone considered, property, it is enough that the act complained of will result, even though somewhat remotely, in injury to property.

Considering that in such case equity, without question, lays its restraining hands upon the injurious appropriation of words that belong to the common language of mankind,—than which nothing could be freer to the uses of men,—there ought, it would seem, to be no difficulty, in the case under consideration, to find the power so manifestly needful.

The case under consideration may be summed up as follows: The business of appellee is that of a carrier of information.

The gist of its service to the patron is, that, by such carriage, the patron acquires knowledge of the matter communicated earlier than those not thus served. The ticker, with its printed tape, is an implement or means only to this commercial end, which the patron, or the patron's patron, may utilize to the end intended, but may not appropriate to some end not intended, especially if such appropriation result in injury to, or total destruction of, the service. In short, the law being clearly inadequate to that purpose, equity should see to it that the one who is served, and the one who serves, each gets what the engagement between them calls for; and that neither, to the injury of the other, shall appropriate more.

The immediate business of appellee brought to our attention, in the case under review, may not arouse any great solicitude. It relates to the gathering and distributing of news, not looked upon, perhaps, in all quarters, as essential to the public welfare. But the questions raised are of much wider significance. They involve, among others, that modern enterprise—one of the distinctive achievements of our day—which, combining the genius and the accumulations of men, with the forces of electricity, combs the earth's surface, each day, for what the day has brought forth, that whatever befalls the sons of men shall come, almost instantaneously, into the consciousness of mankind. Thus, a gun thunders in a harbor on the other side of the earth; before its reverberations have ceased, the moral sequence of the event has taken root in every civilized quarter of the earth. Famine arises in India to begin its grim march; it has gotten but little under way until a counter army—the unfailing benevolence of human kind—has been mustered from America to Russia. On an isolated island, and without premonition, a mountain claps its black hands upon the population of a city; almost before a ship in the harbor, with tidings of the catastrophe, could have set sail, relief ships from the harbors of Christendom are under way. By such agencies as these the world is made to face itself unceasingly in the glass, and is put to those tests that bring increasing helpfulness and beauty into the heart of our race.

Is service like this to be outlawed? Is the enterprise of the great news agencies, or the independent enterprise of the great newspapers, or of the great telegraph and cable lines, to be denied appeal to the courts, against the inroads of the parasite, for no other reason than that the law, fashioned hitherto to fit the relations of authors and the public, cannot be made to fit the relations of the public and this dissimilar class of servants? Are we to fail our plain duty for mere lack of precedent? We choose, rather, to make precedent,—one from which is eliminated, as immaterial, the law grown up around authorship,—and we see no better way to start this precedent upon a career, than by affirming the order appealed from.

Affirmed.

NOTE.—Baker, Circuit Judge, though not sitting in this case, read, in connection with Illinois Commission Co. v. Cleveland Teleg. Co. 119 Fed. 301, the briefs and record herein, and took part, uniformly, in the conferences. He authorizes the statement that the reasoning and conclusions arrived at in this case meet with his concurrence.

F. W. DODGE COMPANY

v.

CONSTRUCTION INFORMATION COMPANY et al.

(183 Mass. 62.)

1. Facts with reference to contemplated buildings or improvements, which have been ascertained promptly by effort and expense, and compiled and put in form for the use of contractors, having a commercial value so long as they are not generally known, are property, and entitled to protection as such.
2. The furnishing to subscribers of secret information, gathered by effort and expense, regarding intended buildings or improvements, which is advantageous to their respective lines of business, under contract not to disclose it, is not a publication which will deprive its owner of the right to protection against the unlawful use of it by a rival.

REPORT by the Supreme Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench of an action brought to enjoin defendants from utilizing information which complainant had gathered and sold to customers. Demurrers to bill overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Odlin and Dunbar & Rackemann for plaintiff.

Messrs. Charles F. Choate, Jr., and Edward C. Stone, for defendants:

The plaintiff, by offering or sending out its information in the form of reports to an indefinite number of persons, and to anyone who will subscribe therefor, has abandoned whatever property rights, if any, it may have had in it.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before us on demurrers to the plaintiff's bill. The plaintiff corporation has been engaged for some years in the business of collecting information in regard to the erection of buildings, both public and private, the construction of sewers, water-works, and other undertakings of public utility, as soon after they are contemplated as possible. This information is carefully compiled and distributed each day to the plaintiff's customers in accordance with their contracts, enabling them very early to take such steps as may seem to them best to obtain contracts to do the work or to furnish supplies. The plaintiff, at great expense, has many servants and agents employed in the collection, preparation, and distribution of this information, which it sells to its subscribers under a contract in writing, whereby the subscriber binds himself to use the reports in strict confidence, and for his business only. The formal contract with subscribers, annexed to the bill, which is in blank, with large spaces for writing in special arrangements, shows that the information may be printed, written, or oral, and implies that the information furnished to the subscribers is such as pertains to their different kinds of business, so that different subscribers receive information in detail on different subjects, according to their interests. It also contains an agreement to be signed by each subscriber to hold the information in strict confidence, and for his business only. The plaintiff avers that the defendant corporation is engaged in the same kind of business as the plaintiff, and that it has obtained unlawfully and dishonestly, from the plaintiff's subscribers, information furnished them by the plaintiff under these contracts, being aware of the terms of the contracts between the plaintiff and its subscribers, and that it is purchasing these reports from these subscribers for cash, and is furnishing them to its subscribers daily, and is informing the plaintiff's subscribers that by subscribing for the reports of the defendant they will obtain the advantages of the plaintiff's reports for a less price than the plaintiff charges for them. The plaintiff says that the defendant has thereby prevailed upon many of the plaintiff's subscribers to cease buying the plaintiff's reports, and has caused the plaintiff great loss and damage. The prayer of the bill is for an injunction and an account.

The important question in this case may be divided into two parts: First. Has the plaintiff any property in the information after it has been obtained at great expense and compiled for the use of its subscribers? Second. Does it lose its property by publication, abandonment or dedication to the public, when it furnishes the information to subscribers under these contracts? The facts, before it has ascertained them, unless they are held for a special purpose confidentially, and as secrets, are not property; but when these facts have been discovered promptly by effort and at expense, and have been compiled and put in form, and are of commercial value by reason of the speedy use that can be made of them before they have obtained general publicity, they are property. They represent expensive effort and valuable service, and, in the form in which they are presented to subscribers, they may be used with a reasonable expectation of profit from the early possession of them. The information is not visible, tangible property, but there is a valuable right of property in it, which the courts ought to protect in every reasonable way against those seeking to obtain it from the owner without right, to his damage. What the plaintiff has when the defendant seeks to obtain it from him is the possession of valuable information. This early possession is valuable in itself. The plaintiff has it and the defendant does not have it. If the defendant can obtain it legitimately, he becomes the owner of the same kind of property, and the two may become competitors in the market as vendors to those who are willing to pay for it. But if the defendant surreptitiously and against the plaintiff's will takes from the plaintiff and appropriates the form of expression which is the symbol of the plaintiff's possession, and thus, by direct attack, as it were, divides the plaintiff's possession, and shares it, this conduct is a violation of the plaintiff's right of property. That there is a right of property of this kind has been decided in England in regard to information of stock quotations and other different kinds of news obtained to be furnished to those who will pay for it. Exchange Tele. Co. v. Gregory [1896] 1 Q. B. 147; Exchange Tele. Co. v. Central News Co. [1897] 2 Ch. 48. This has also been held by different courts in this country. Kiernan v. Manhattan Quotation Tele. Co., 50 How. Pr. 194; Chicago Board of Trade v. Christie Grain & Stock Co. 116 Fed. 944; National Tele. News Co. v. Western U. Tele. Co. 119 Fed. 297. We are of opinion that one's possession of information which he has obtained, compiled, and put in form for a specific use is a right which ought to be protected against those who would share it with him without his consent.

The next question is whether the giving of information by the plaintiff to its subscribers is a publication of it, such as dedicates it to the public, and deprives the plaintiff of its right of control. It is well established that the private circulation of information or literary composition, in writing or in print, for a restricted purpose, is not a publication which gives the public a right to use it. Prince Albert v. Strange, 1 Macn. & G. 25; Jeffreys v. Boosey, 4 H. L. Cas. 815, 867; Exchange Tele. Co. v. Gregory [1896] 1 Q. B. 147; Exchange Tele. Co. v. Central News Co. [1897] 2 Ch. 48; Bartlett v. Crittenden, 4 McLean, 300, Fed. Cas. No. 1082. See also Tompkins v. Halleck, 133 Mass. 32, 43 Am. Rep. 480; The Mikado Case, 23 Blatchf. 347, 25 Fed. 183; Press Pub. Co. v. Monroe, 51 L. R. A. 353, 19 C. C. A. 429, 38 U. S. App. 410, 73 Fed. 196. It has been held in Ladd v. Oanard, 75 Fed. 703-729, and in Jewelers' Mercantile Agency v. Jewelers' Weekly Pub. Co. 155 N. Y. 241, 41 L. R. A. 846, 49 N. E. 872, that where a company furnished a reference book, or a book of mercantile agency credit ratings, to an unlimited number of subscribers, under a stipulation that the book was furnished as a loan, and not as a sale, and that it should not go into other hands, there was a publication. Each of these suits was brought under the United States copyright act for an infringement of the copyright, and the decision was on the ground that by reason of publication the copyright was not perfected. In the latter case three of the judges did not agree that there was a publication. The thing sent out in these cases was a book designed to be preserved and used for a considerable time. It was in a convenient form for transfer from hand to hand, and for use from time to time by different persons. We do not think that these cases very much resemble the case before us. The information given by the plaintiff in this case, as we infer, is of specific facts for particular persons or classes of persons, adapted to their interests, and furnished from time to time as the facts are ascertained. It seems very unlike the sale or loan of a large printed book, designed to be distributed among a large class of persons. We think the case falls within the principles laid down in the cases first above cited. It makes no difference that the information in some of these cases was furnished by telegraph, and that in this it is furnished orally or in writing or in print. We are of opinion that the averments of the bill do not show a publication which deprives the plaintiff of its rights or property.

We have considered the case without reference to the question whether it would be possible to obtain a copyright upon the plaintiff's compilations, for we think its rights are the same, however this question might be decided. It would seem, however, to be impracticable to obtain copyrights in the course of the plaintiff's business, whether the material would be a subject for a copyright under the statute or not.

We do not deem it necessary to consider at length the objections raised by the special demurrer. Although the averments of the bill are not so full as might be desired, we are of opinion that they are sufficient.

Demurrers overruled.

v.

Pietro MASCAGNI.

(183 Mass. 19.)

A clause in a contract for a tour to conduct entertainments, the performance of which will extend into several countries, that suits upon it shall be brought in the country where the contracting parties are domiciled, is valid, and will be enforced by the courts of other countries.

(February 26, 1903.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought NOTE.—A question somewhat analogous to the one discussed above, as to the effect of agreement to arbitrate on right to bring action, is considered in a note to Kinney v. Baltimore & O. Employees' Asso. (W. Va.) 15 L. R. A. 142; also in the later cases of Chapman v. Rockford Ins. Co. (Wis.) 28 L. R. A. 405, and Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Hon (Neb.) ante, 438. 60 L. R. A.

to recover damages for alleged breach of contract. Action dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas J. Barry, for plaintiffs:

The filing of the demurrer and of the answer constituted a waiver of all objections to the jurisdiction.

Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; York v. Texas, 137 U. S. 15, 34 L. ed. 604, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 9.

The plaintiffs, as citizens of the United States, claim a Federal right to proceed against the defendant for his breach of the contract in this country under the terms of the treaty between the United States of America and the King of Italy.

This treaty right is superior to state laws or decisions, and is the supreme law of the land when litigating with subjects of the King of Italy, either in this country or in Italy.

Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 175 U. S. 91, 44 L. ed. 84, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33.

An agreement by the parties to abstain, in all cases arising under a contract, from resorting to the United States courts, is void as against public policy.

Messrs. Brandeis, Dunbar, & Nutter and Edward E. McClennen, for defendant:

The defendant's rights should not be cut off unless the statute very plainly requires it.

Brown v. Kellogg, 182 Mass. 297, 65 N. E. 378.

He has done nothing to preclude him from enforcing the provisions of the contract.

To constitute a waiver there must be conduct manifesting an intention not to insist on performance.

West v. Platt, 127 Mass. 367.

He has not taken a position inconsistent with insisting on such performance.

Rayburn v. Comstock, 80 Mich. 448, 45 N. W. 378.

He has not broken any part of the contract which is a condition to his right to the performance of these provisions.

Knight v. New England Worsted Co. 2 Cush, 271; 2 Parsons, Contr. 8th ed. 798; Leighton v. Meserve, 117 Mass. 50.

This is a difference or question arising under the contract.

Barrie v. Earle, 143 Mass. 1, 58 Am. Rep. 126, 8 N. E. 639; Randegger v. Holmes, L. R. 1 C. P. 679.

The provision of the contract is an agreement that no action for any difference or question arising under it shall be brought in Massachusetts.

Nute v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 174.

The reason generally given for holding agreements in similar language to submit to arbitration invalid is that, if valid, they would exclude action in court.

Rowe v. Williams, 97 Mass. 163; Keeffe v. National Accl. Soc. 4 App. Div. 392, 38 N. Y. Supp. 854.

This agreement, if valid, amounts to a bar.

Nute v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 174; Daley v. People's Bldg., Loan, & Sav. Asso. 178 Mass. 13, 59 N. E. 452.

This agreement is valid.

Greenwood v. Curtis, 6 Mass. 358, 4 Am. Dec. 145; Atwood v. Walker, 179 Mass. 519, 61 N. E. 58; Brookway v. American Exp. Co. 168 Mass. 257, 47 N. E. 87; O'Regan v. Cunard S. S. Co. 160 Mass. 356, 35 N. E. 1070; Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery [1894] A. C. 202; Re Missouri S. S. Co. L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 321.

If the parties to a contract agree that it shall be governed by the lex loci contractus, effect will be given to the agreement.

Greenwood v. Curtis, 6 Mass. 358, 4 Am. Dec. 145; Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co. 153 Mass. 553, 12 L. R. A. 340, 27 N. E. 665; O'Regan v. Cunard S. S. Co. 160 Mass. 356, 35 N. E. 1070; Mamlin v. Talisker Distillery [1894] A. C. 202; Daley v. People's Bldg., Loan & Sav. Asso. 178 Mass. 13, 59 N. E. 452.

The validity of the agreement depends upon the laws of Italy; but it is not apparent what these laws are. The court will, therefore, assume that they do not differ from the laws of Massachusetts, or will apply the laws of this commonwealth, because ignorant, in theory, of any other.

Kennebrew v. Southern Automatic Electric Shock Mach. Co. 106 Ala. 377, 17 So. 545; Whitford v. Panama R. Co. 23 N. Y. 465; Harvey v. Merrill, 150 Mass. 1, 5 L. R. A. 200, 22 N. E. 49; Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74, 34 Am. Rep. 512.

An agreement in a contract made in Massachusetts to bring action upon it only in the courts of Massachusetts would be valid.

Daley v. People's Bldg. Loan & Sav. Asso. 178 Mass. 13, 59 N. E. 452.

While an agreement is unenforceable if it keeps from the courts the entire controversy, the same is not true of one which keeps from them but a part of it.

Hood v. Hartshorn, 100 Mass. 117, 1 Am. Rep. 89; Haley v. Bellamy, 137 Mass. 357; Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373; McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray, 139; Hutchinson v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Beal, 141 Mass. 566, 6 N. E. 742.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before us on a report from the superior court submitting the question whether there was an error of the presiding justice in overruling the motion to dismiss, the answer in abatement, and demurrer filed by the defendant, and in rule 60 L. R. A.

ing that the fifteenth paragraph of the contract between the plaintiffs and defendant, upon certain facts agreed, was not a bar to the prosecution of the action in this commonwealth. The contract referred to was made in Florence, Italy, where the defendant, a subject of the King of Italy, had his home, and where the plaintiffs, citizens of the state of New York, elected a domicile by a provision of the contract. By it the defendant undertook to direct certain concerts, and direct and present certain operas, all composed by him, in the course of a tour through such parts of the United States and Canada as the plaintiffs should designate, covering a period of fifteen weeks, for the sum of $4,000 per week, with sundry provisions for expenses, and the like, and other stipulations prescribing the rights of the parties in various particulars, which it is unnecessary to state. The contract was in the Italian language, and, according to the translated copy set forth in the pleadings it contains the following provisions: "The present contract in its form and substance is regulated by the Italian laws by will of the parties concerned, and according to article 9 of the Italian Civil Code. Whatever difference or question there might arise between the parties, including the agent, will be acted upon by the civil authorities of Florence, Italy. Maestro Mascagni reserves the right to direct action in New York for the payment of his recompense, and therefore he alone has the faculty to derogate the competence of the established contract." The defendant moved to dismiss this suit, and answered in abatement, and demurred on the ground that, under this provision, our courts have no jurisdiction.

The construction and legal effect of a contract is governed by the lex loci contractus unless there is something in it indicating a different intention of the parties. O'Regan v. Cunard S. S. Co. 160 Mass. 356, 35 N. E. 1070; Brookway v. American Exp. Co. 168 Mass. 257, 47 N. E. 87; Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co. 153 Mass. 553, 12 L. R. A. 340, 27 N. E. 665; Re Missouri S. S. Co. L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 321; Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery [1894] A. C. 202. This contract was made in Italy, where one of the parties had his permanent home, and the other a domicile elected by the terms of the contract. It was to be performed in part there, for the plaintiffs were to pay the defendant $7,000, ten days before the time fixed for his departure from Cherbourg for the United States, but the further performance was to be in the United States. The intention of the parties that it should be governed by Italian laws was not left to inference, but was expressed in words.

The first and principal question is, What is the effect of the stipulation in regard to the adjustment of differences or questions between the parties? We have little doubt that it was meant to give exclusive jurisdiction of all such matters to the Italian courts; saving only jurisdiction of suits by the defendant to recover his compensation, which is given to the courts of New York. This seems to be the meaning of the words of this translation, and another translation set out in the answer in abatement, whose correctness has not been disputed, tends to make this meaning even clearer. It is averred in the answer in abatement that such a provision is legal and binding under the laws of Italy. Of course, if this be true, it is immaterial what construction is put upon it under our laws. There is certainly nothing so objectionable in it, on grounds of public policy, that our courts will refuse to give it effect under our treaty with Italy, which gives the citizens of each country full rights in the courts of the other. Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co. 153 Mass. 553, 12 L. R. A. 340, 27 N. E. 665. It is said in the report that the hearing was upon the pleadings, "without objection that there was no reply to the answer in abatement." We are not quite certain whether, in the absence of a reply, the averments of this answer were taken to be true. If they are true, it is the duty of our courts to give the contract effect according to the law of Italy, but we infer, in the absence of proof in support of the averments of the answer, that the case was considered upon the declaration and admitted facts only. Assuming this, we must also assume that the law of Italy is like our own (Harvey v. Merrill, 150 Mass. 1, 5 L. R. A. 200, 22 N. E. 49); and we come to the question whether such an agreement of parties to a contract is valid here.

It is decided that an agreement in a contract that the parties shall not avail themselves of their right to an appeal to the courts for the settlement of their controversies, but shall submit them to private arbitration, will not be enforced, because it is such an utter abnegation of one's legal rights as should not be permitted. Rowe v. Williams, 97 Mass. 163; Wood v. Humphrey, 114 Mass. 185; Miles v. Schmidt, 168 Mass. 339, 47 N. E. 115. On the other hand, it is allowable for parties to make such agreements in reference to preliminary and incidental matters of dispute, so long as they retain the right to appeal to the courts for the determination of any substantive question of liability. Hood v. Hartshorn, 100 Mass. 117, 1 Am. Rep. 89; Haley v. Bellamy, 137 Mass. 357; Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373; Hutchinson v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 153 Mass. 143, 10 L. R. A. 558, 26 N. E. 439. Perhaps the tendency in modern times is to permit greater freedom in contracting in matters of this kind than formerly. Miles v. Schmidt, 168 Mass. 339, 47 N. E. 115; Daley v. People's Bldg., Loan, & Sav. Asso. 178 Mass. 13, 59 N. E. 452. In most cases—certainly in a case like the present—there is no occasion for the protection of the dignity or convenience of the courts. The contract was between citizens of foreign states, who, so far as our tribunals are concerned, well might make any reasonable arrangement for the settlement of their disputes.

The determining question seems to be whether such a contract as this is so improvident and unreasonable—such an abnegation of legal rights—that the government, for the protection of mankind, will refuse to recognize it, even when made in a foreign country by subjects or citizens of that country. We can fancy the parties to this contract, at the time of making it, saying something like this: "As the performance of this contract will not only involve travel through one or more foreign countries in going to America and returning, but will involve journeying long distances, through a great many independent states, each of which has its own courts and system of laws, under some of which a person sued in a civil action, when about to leave the state, may be arrested and held to bail or in imprisonment,—if suits may be brought in any one of these numerous jurisdictions there is a liability to great trouble and expense on the part of the defendant in meeting the litigation. The contract contemplates a service of fifteen weeks, after which Maestro Mascagni intends to return to his permanent home, in Florence. It will be better and more reasonable for both of us to provide that our controversies, if any arise, shall be settled by the courts of Florence, than to leave both parties subject to suits in forty or fifty different jurisdictions, at great distances from the home of either." If, moved by such considerations, the parties made the agreement in question, shall the court say that they were non compotes mentis, and that their agreement was so improvident and unreasonable that it cannot be permitted to stand? The case is quite unlike Nute v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 174, although it has some features in common with that. In that case the provision was contained in a by-law of a mutual insurance company, and it undertook to limit claimants to one county in a small state for the venue of actions. The principles laid down in Daley v. People's Bldg., Loan, & Sav. Asso. 178 Mass. 13, 59 N. E. 452, are applicable, although the cases are different in some particulars. Similar doctrines are stated in Re New York L. & W. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 447, and Greve v. Etna Live Stock Ins. Co. 81 Hun, 28, 30 N. Y. Supp. 668. There is no attempt here to deprive either party of the right of appeal to the courts, as in Rowe v. Williams, 97 Mass. 163, but only an attempt to narrow the area within which suits may be brought. This is analogous to the limitation of the subjects of which the courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction, by a provision for the arbitration of incidental and subsidiary questions out of court, which is approved in cases above cited. It is also analogous to the limitation by contract of the time within which suits may be brought. Eliot Nat. Bank v. Beal, 141 Mass. 566, 6 N. E. 742. We are of opinion that this part of the contract is valid.

The defendant has done nothing that deprives him of his right to rely on the contract. The suit which he brought prior to this was upon a later contract, and against parties not identical. Besides, in his declaration in that case, in stating inducements, he took pains to aver that there was no right to sue upon this contract in this country. The second suit, which he brought after he had been held to answer in this, contains a similar averment, and apparently he brought it to avail himself of such rights as he might have in case the decision in the present suit should be adverse to him. We are of opinion that the ruling was erroneous.

Motion granted.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

William H. GIBBS, Respt.,
v.

Mary A. TALLY et al., Appts.

(133 Cal. 373.)

An owner of property who has made and filed a valid contract for the placing of a building thereon, under which, by the terms of the statute, the entire contract price may be applied to the claims of laborers and material men, cannot constitutionally be required to furnish a bond which will make him liable to them in an additional amount in case their claims are not satisfied by the contractor.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for failure to furnish a bond for the payment of the claims of contractors and material men, as required by statute. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Clarence A. Miller, for appellants:

The statute is nothing but an attempt to render the owner liable for 25 per cent more than the contract price, even though the contract is valid, unless a bond be given.

The legislature has no power to hold the owner beyond his valid contract price.

Latson v. Nelson, 11 Pac. Coast L. J. 589; Wiggins v. Bridge, 70 Cal. 439, 11 Pac. 754; Wilson v. Barnard, 67 Cal. 423, 7 Pac. 845; O'Donnell v. Kramer, 65 Cal. 353, 4 Pac. 204; Whittier v. Hollister, 64 Cal. 283, 30 Pac. 846; Dore v. Sellers, 27 Cal. 693; Renton v. Conley, 49 Cal. 185; Boven v. Aubrey, 22 Cal. 571; McAlpin v. Duncan, 16 Cal. 127; Knowles v. Joost, 13 Cal. 621; Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 179, 6 L. R. A. 588, 22 Pac. 509.

The bond complies with the statute.

The present statute says that the bond required shall, by its terms, "inure to the benefit of any and all persons," etc. It does not say whether, by its terms, it shall so inure directly or indirectly. But if a bond inures by its terms directly, and not incidentally, in favor of third parties, they have an action upon it without the aid of this statute.

Our bond by its terms inures incidentally to the benefit of parties entitled to liens.

Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 525, 15 Pac. 100.

Mr. T. M. Stewart, for respondent:

The statute takes no property from the defendants.

Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 177, 6 L. R. A. 588, 22 Pac. 509.

That the statute restricts unlimited exercise of the right of contract does not render it unconstitutional.

For the pursuit of any lawful trade or business, the law imposes similar conditions. Regulations respecting them are almost infinite, varying with the nature of the business.

He that first sues and obtains judgment on an official bond is entitled to take the whole penalty if his demand amounts to so much, in exclusion of every other claim.

The bond filed is no defense.

On petition for rehearing.

The test of reasonableness may in some cases be decisive of the constitutionality of police ordinances, but never of legislative declarations of industrial policy.

Temple, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages against Mrs. Tally, by the assignee of certain persons who

NOTE.—As to constitutionality of statutes creating an absolute liability of the owner of property for the claims in whole or in part of subcontractors or subordinate claimants after he has paid the contractor, see also cases in note to Frenn v. Bauer (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 565, 60 L. R. .

had performed labor or furnished materials in the construction of a building, for failing to cause a bond to be filed with the building contract, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1203. A bond was in fact filed, and apparently in good faith designed to comply with the statute, but it was found defective, because it was not, "by its terms, made to insure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor or furnish materials to the contractor, or any person acting for him or by his authority, . . . in an amount equal to at least 25 per cent of the contract price." The statute directs that every contract required to be filed by the provisions of the chapter relating to liens of mechanics and others shall be accompanied by a good and sufficient bond, and that any laborer or material man shall have an action to recover upon the bond for the value of labor and materials, not exceeding the amount of the bond; and such action shall not affect his lien. A failure to comply with the provisions of the section rendered "the owner and contractor jointly and severally liable in damages to any and all material men, laborers, and subcontractors entitled to liens upon property affected by said contract." The statute does not say who shall cause this bond to be executed, nor to whom it shall in form be made payable. It does not undertake that the contractor shall faithfully perform his contract. In short, there is in it nothing which can be of advantage to the owner in any possible event. On the other hand, no possible loss will accrue to the contractor by a failure to provide the bond. The declaration that he shall be severally and jointly liable with the owner is useless verbiage. The contractor is already liable for all labor or materials furnished to him or by his authority. The only person, therefore, upon whom a penalty is put for the failure is the owner. He, therefore, and he only, is required to furnish the bond; and, in effect, the bond is conditioned only that the contractor will pay "such" persons the value of labor and materials so furnished to him; and the action by a lienor does not affect his lien, or an action commenced for the foreclosure of it. The section assumes a valid contract, under which, if the contract is performed, the lienors can have the entire contract price distributed to them. But after that has been done, or even before it, a suit can be brought upon the bond, or, if it has not been filed, against the owner, to recover an additional 25 per cent upon the contract price; and that is this precise case. The material men and laborers could have demanded security from the contractor before furnishing materials or labor. The statute attempts to compel the owner to furnish security for them in a matter to which he is not a party, and in which he is not concerned. The cost may exceed the contract price; because material men combine to charge exorbitant prices, or through bad management of the contractor, or because prices have increased since the contract was let, or from other causes. If this can be required from the owner it lessens materially the value of his contract. In fact, so far as price is concerned, it deprives him of it. He has no assurance that his house will be built for the stipulated price. There is no more reason for requiring the owner to give this security than there would be in requiring it from any other person in the community. That the owner may be required to pay more than the contract price is not the only injustice which may result from this most unreasonable statute. The owner, or the sureties he is required to furnish, would be responsible in case the contractor failed to perform his contract. Suppose the structure failed to comply with the contract,—was in fact so defective as to be useless,—and the owner should refuse to pay for it? The very fact that he was injured by the failure of the contractor would create the liability on his part or upon his sureties. Whether the owner is not the principal on the bond, or the party for whom the sureties undertake, I will not discuss. The undertaking, in effect, certainly is that the contractor will pay certain debts if he incurs them; but he is not specially required to furnish the bond, and, as I have stated, incurs no penalty for not doing so, while the owner does.

It is perfectly manifest that this section, if valid, places an unreasonable restraint upon the owner of property in regard to the use thereof. It compels him to become responsible for liabilities he has not incurred, and which were not created for his benefit. It practically forbids him from improving his property by letting a contract unless he becomes liable, or furnishes sureties who will be so liable, for 25 per cent above the contract price, and for the same amount in case the contractor so far fails in keeping his contract that the labor and materials are without value to him, and the contractor has no valid claim against him on account thereof. To impose this burden upon an owner is to some extent to deprive him of his property, for the value of property consists in the right to use it. Blackstone, in stating the fundamental rights of Englishmen, says: "The third absolute right inherent in every Englishman is that of property, which consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions without any control or diminution save only by the laws of the land." 1 Bl. Com. 138. And Justice Miller said in Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557: "There may be such serious interruption to the common and necessary use of property as will be equivalent to a taking within the meaning of the Constitution." It was said by Judge Comstock in Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 378: "When a law annihilates the value of property, and strips it of its attributes by which alone it is distinguished as property, the owner is deprived of it according to the plainest interpretation, and certainly within the spirit of a constitutional provision intended expressly to shield private rights from the exercise of arbitrary power." It is also an unreasonable and unnecessary restriction upon the power to make contracts. See, upon this point, Butchers' Union, S. L.

Ex L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 746, 28 L. ed. 585, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 652; Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 30 Am. Rep. 323; Ex parte Jentzsch, 112 Cal. 469, 32 L. R. A. 664, 44 Pac. 803; Cooley, Const. Lim. 48; Re Tie Loy, 11 Sawy. 472, 26 Fed. Rep. 611. It clearly contravenes the provisions of § 1, art. 1, of the Constitution of the state, and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It is not, and clearly it could not be, contended that this law is a regulation which comes within what is called the "police power." It is not calculated, nor was it intended, to conserve the safety, health, or general welfare of the community. The section does not provide for a lien, but it is contended that there is not greater interference with property rights than is found in some of the provisions in regard to liens of laborers and material men, which have been upheld, and particularly in the provision making the contract void in case it is not filed, allowing liens of laborers, material men, and subcontractors to the full value of services rendered and materials furnished, although that may exceed the contract price. The Constitution directs the legislature to provide for liens of those persons upon the property to the improvement of which they have contributed. It has been held that this extends only to the contract price, which cannot be exceeded. If the contract is not filed as directed, it is void; and, there being no contract, it would follow, even though the statute had not said so, that the owner is building himself. In that case the so-called contractor is (as to other lienors) but the agent of the owner. This would be the natural result, and is not a forced conclusion made by the statute. Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 170, 6 L. R. A. 588, 22 Pac. 509, opinion of Justice Fox. Where there is a valid contract under which the work was done, and which is performed by the owner, all that the statute attempts to do, and in fact all that can be done, is to enable the laborers, material men, and subcontractors to cause the contract price to be applied to the payment of their demands. All that has been held upon this point is that it is not an unreasonable interference with the rights of the owner that whatever contract he makes shall be so executed and published that the constitutional policy may be carried out. No constitutional policy is back of the provision questioned here.

Our attention is called to the cases of Mangrum v. Truesdale, 128 Cal. 145, 60 Pac. 775, and Carpenter v. Furrey, 128 Cal. 665, 61 Pac. 369. In the first no question as to the validity of the statute was raised, and the only question discussed was whether a bond executed after the contract had been filed, and delivered to a loan association from whom a loan had been negotiated, and not filed with the contract, was a compliance with the law. The liability of the owner in case the bond was not furnished seems to have been admitted. In Carpenter v. Furrey, supra, the bond had been given, and the suit was against the sureties. They attacked the validity of the law (Laws 1893, p. 202) upon the grounds, only: (1) That the subject was not expressed in the title of the act; and (2) that it was a special law. These points are not raised in this case. In this case, I repeat, there was a valid contract, which was performed on both sides. Mrs. Tally has paid out to the lienors,—or, at least, strictly under the provisions of the law,—the entire contract price. There has been no technical or other obstruction which has prevented the lienors, or any of them, from getting out of this contract price all to which they were entitled. Having got from Mrs. Tally the entire contract price, they are endeavoring in this suit to compel her to pay 25 per cent more because of a mistake made by her or her attorneys in writing the bond. It cannot be done, and the legislature has not the power to require it of her.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: Beatty, Ch. J.; McFarland, J.; Henshaw, J.; Vandyke, J.; Garoutte, J.

*1. Civ. Code, §§ 2317, 2318, provides: "When any freight that has been shipped, to be conveyed by two or more common carriers to its destination, where, under the contract of shipment or by law, the responsibility of each or either shall cease upon delivery to the next 'in good order,' has been lost, damaged, or destroyed, it shall be the duty of the initial or any connecting carrier, upon application by the shipper, consignee, or their assigns, within thirty days after application, to trace said freight and inform said applicant, in writing, when, where, how, and by which carrier said freight was lost, damaged, or destroyed, and the names of the parties and their official position, if any, by whom the truth of the facts set out in said information can be established. If the carrier to which application is made shall fail to trace said freight and give said information in writing, within the time prescribed, then said carrier shall be liable for the value of the freight lost, damaged, or destroyed, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said loss, damage, or destruction occurred on its line." Held, that the provisions of these sections are not unreasonable and arbitrary, either as to the substantial requirements thereof, or as to the time within which the requirements must be met. Nor are they such a regulation of interstate commerce as to be beyond the power of the state. Nor do the sections infringe "the correlative liberty of silence." Nor do they amount to "compulsory private discovery" by "statutory terror." Nor are they unconstitutional and void for any other reason set forth in the present case.

2. An action under the provisions of the statute above quoted, brought in the name of the shipper, is well brought, though it appears that the shipper is not the owner of the goods.
3. Even if the fact that it was impossible to obtain the information required by the statute within the time specified therein would relieve the carrier from liability, the evidence offered to show that it was impossible to so obtain the information did not have this effect, and was therefore properly rejected.
4. There was no error requiring the granting of a new trial.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Pike County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff's in an action brought, upon defendant's refusal to ascertain through whose negligence the injury occurred, to recover the value of certain property delivered to defendant for transportation, which reached its destination in a damaged condition. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hall & Cleveland and R. L. Berner for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. W. Lambdin for defendants in error.

Cobb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A. O. Murphey & Hunt, a partnership, brought suit against the Central of Georgia Railway Company, alleging that they had shipped over the lines of the defendant company a car load of grapes from Barnesville, Georgia, consigned to Rocco Bros., Omaha, Nebraska; that the shipment was under a contract which provided that the responsibility of each carrier should cease upon delivery "in good order" to the next carrier; that when the grapes reached Omaha they were in a damaged condition, the amount of the damages that the plaintiff sustained by the failure to deliver the grapes in good order at their destination being set forth in the petition; that on August 20, 1897, the plaintiffs made to the defendant an application in writing, in which they requested the company to trace the freight, and inform plaintiffs in writing when, where, how, and by which carrier the freight was damaged, and the names of the parties, and their official positions, if any, by whom the truth of the facts could be established; that the defendant failed to trace the freight and give the information within thirty days, as required by law; and that by reason of this conduct the defendant became indebted to the plaintiffs in the amount set out in the petition. The defendant demurred to the petition, upon the following grounds: (1) Because the petition sets forth no cause of action, and under the allegations thereof the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. (2) The contract referred to in the petition not being one for a through carriage, the petition is defective in that it does not allege that the loss or damage occurred on the defendant's road, nor is it alleged that the freight was not delivered to the next carrier in good order.

(3) Because the act of the general assembly embraced in Civ. Code, §§ 2317-2318, under which the plaintiff's action is brought, is unconstitutional and void, in that it requires the defendant to furnish evidence to the plaintiffs for the purpose of a person's private claim or lawsuit touching the liability of another corporation, with which liability the defendant is in no wise connected either by contract or by law. (4) Because the law under which plaintiff's action is brought imposes upon the defendant the duty of hunting evidence with which plaintiffs can make out a claim against another carrier, and, in the event such evidence is not reported within a given time, the defendant is made responsible for the act of another carrier, with which it had no connection in carrying the goods, either by contract or otherwise. "Such legislative act is not a proper classification of legislation, but is arbitrary, and is a violation of the Constitution of this state." (5) Because the act under which the suit is brought impairs the obligation of the contract between plaintiffs and defendant for carrying the goods; the defendant being, under the contract, exempted from liability for damages to goods beyond its own lines. (6) Because the law in question requires the defendant to procure and report to plaintiffs certain information within a given time, and on failure to so report, then, without regard to whether such information could be obtained within the time prescribed, and without opportunity to the defendant to be heard, the act imposes upon the defendant the penalty of paying damages which were caused by another railway company with which the defendant had no connection by contract or otherwise; such law denying to the defendant "due process of law." (7) Because the law in question is in violation of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. (8) Because such law deprives the defendant of its property without due process of law. (9) Because the act is contrary to law, the Constitution, and public policy, in that it seeks to obtain information by statutory compulsion, attaching a penalty to the failure to produce information which the various railroads are entitled to withhold, if they desire to do so, under the correlative liberty of silence guar-anted by the Constitution. The demurrer was overruled, and the case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs. A motion for a new trial filed by the defendant was also overruled. The defendant assigns error upon the judgment overruling the demurrer and the judgment refusing to grant a new trial.

1. This suit was brought under the provisions of Civ. Code, §§ 2317, 2318, which are quoted in the first headnote. The petition set forth a cause of action if the law in question is valid. In passing upon the assignment of error complaining that the court erred in overruling the demurrer, it becomes necessary to determine only one question, and that is whether this law is unconstitutional for any reason assigned in the demurrer. If it is a valid law, the other grounds of the demurrer not relating to the constitutionality of the law were not well taken. We do not think the statute is subject to any of the exceptions taken in the demurrer. It is too well settled now to admit of question that, when private property is "affected with a public interest," the owner of such property "grants to the public an interest in such use, and must, to the extent of that interest, submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, as long as he maintains the use." Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77. It is also equally well settled that the incorporation of a railroad company by a state, and the granting to it special privileges to carry out the object of incorporation, particularly the authority to exercise the state's right of eminent domain, and the obligation assumed by the acceptance of the charter to transport all persons and merchandise upon like conditions and for reasonable rates, affect the property and employment with a public use, and thus subject the business of the company to legislative control in the interest of the public. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174, 32 L. ed. 377, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 47. It becomes necessary to determine in the present case whether the statute in question is of such a character as to come within the principles just referred to. A railroad company is not compelled to make a contract to forward goods beyond its own line. Coles v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 86 Ga. 251, 12 S. E. 749. See also State v. Wrightsville & T. R. Co. 104 Ga. 437, 30 S. E. 891. But when it receives goods consigned to a point beyond the terminus of its own line, it undertakes to transport them to their destination, and, if the goods are lost, it will be liable therefor in the absence of a contract otherwise limiting its liability. Falvey v. Georgia R. Co. 76 Ga. 597; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Georgia Fruit & Vegetable Exchange, 91 Ga. 389, 17 S. E. 904. It may, however, make a contract for the transportation of goods beyond the terminus of its own line, and stipulate in such contract that its liability shall cease when the goods are delivered to the next carrier; thus making itself liable only for damages or loss occurring while the goods are in its possession. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. 60 L. R. A.

Avant, 80 Ga. 195, 5 S. E. 78; Metropolitan R. Co. v. Shomo, 90 Ga. 500, 16 S. E. 49. In many instances it is to the interest, not only of the shipper, but also of the carrier, that the contract entered into should provide for a through shipment of goods to their destination over the connecting lines of the initial carrier. In order to secure business where the goods are to be transported to a distant point, it is necessary that the carrier should have traffic arrangements with its connecting lines, by which the shipper may become entitled to a through bill of lading, securing transportation over all the lines between the initial point and the point of destination. Especially is this true in regard to goods of a perishable nature. A carrier which holds itself out to carry such goods would secure little custom from shippers of that class of goods unless it were in a position to give reasonable assurances that the goods would not be subjected, at the terminus of the initial carrier's line, to the delays incident to shipments upon a bill of lading the undertaking of which is accomplished when the goods reach the terminus of the first carrier. The carrier may, under the law, refuse to issue bills of lading to points beyond its own line, but a carrier that would adopt such a rule would do little business in the transportation of goods to distant points, especially at places where there were other competing carriers who would issue through bills of lading to points beyond their own lines. It thus being often to the interest of the carrier to issue a through bill of lading in order that it may secure business, and the law allowing the carrier in such cases to limit its liability to loss or damage while on its own line, is it an unreasonable requirement, when, under such circumstances, a loss occurs beyond its own line, that the initial carrier shall, upon demand, furnish to the shipper, within a reasonable time, information as to the place at which the loss or damage occurred? If a through contract were for the sole interest of the shipper, such a requirement might be said to be unreasonable; but when such a contract is at least for the joint interest of both in all cases, and in many instances the making of such a contract would be the only means of securing the business for the carrier, it does not seem to be beyond the bounds of reason to require the carrier to furnish to the shipper information as to the point at which his goods were lost or damaged. It is much easier for the initial carrier to obtain this information than it would be for the shipper. Carriers, through business arrangements with the connecting carriers, are so intimately associated with each other, and each one is so thoroughly conversant with the systems of the others, that it is much easier for a carrier to obtain this information than a shipper. In fact, it is a practical impossibility in many instances for the shipper to obtain the information himself, and a refusal or failure on the part of the initial carrier, or one of the connecting carriers, to undertake to locate the point at which the loss or damage occurred, amounts practically to a denial of redress to the shipper of goods that have been lost or damaged. The well-known fact that, as a general rule, the shippers, under such contracts, were absolutely helpless where the goods were lost or damaged, was the motive which prompted the passage of the statute now under consideration. The statute is nothing more nor less than a legislative declaration that, where a railroad company, in its own interest, to secure business, makes a contract to transport goods beyonds its own terminus, and limits its liability to loss or damage upon its own line, in the interest of those who deal with the company, who come in contact with it is as a public carrier, in the interest of shippers,—that is, in the interest of the public,—the railroad company making such a contract shall, when the goods are lost or damaged in transit, be required to furnish to the shipper such information as that he may make a legal demand upon those who are responsible for the loss or damage. The right to control by legislative enactment, in the interest of the public, a corporation of this character is unquestioned, and in the legislative control of the character indicated in the law now under consideration we see nothing unreasonable or arbitrary. See, in this connection, Richmond & A. R. Co. v. R. A. Patterson Tobacco Co. 92 Va. 670, 41 L. R. A. 511, 24 S. E. 261.

It is said, though, that, even if the statute in question is a reasonable regulation in regard to requiring the carrier to furnish the information therein mentioned, that provision is unreasonable which fixes the time within which the information is to be furnished before the effect of the statute is to impose a penalty upon the initial carrier for the failure to give the information. Of course, if an act of the general assembly imposes a penalty upon an individual or corporation for a failure to perform a given act within a given time, and it is manifest that the character of the act is such that the courts could take judicial notice that it could not be performed within the time required, then it would be the duty of the courts to declare such legislation invalid, as an effort on the part of the lawmaking body to deprive a person of his property without due process of law. On the other hand, if the general assembly has a right to declare that a person shall do a given thing, and it provides that this act shall be performed within a given time, and the court cannot judicially know that it is impossible to do the thing required within the time fixed for its performance, then it is not within the power of the court to declare that the legislation is invalid upon its face. If, under the operation of such a statute in a given case, it should conclusively appear that it was impossible for a person against whom proceedings were had under the statute to perform, within the time required by the statute, the act thereby imposed, the question as to whether there would be any liability under the statute would arise as a matter for decision. In these days, when it is a matter of such common knowledge that the courts judicially know that railroad companies engaged in the transportation of persons and freight among the several states conduct their business with such facility by means of the telegraph and other agencies that, when it becomes necessary in their own interest to secure information in regard to the commonest details of the simplest transaction they can do so in a very short space of time, a court would stultify itself that would hold as a matter of law that thirty days was not a reasonable time for a carrier whose principal office was in Georgia to secure information as to where a car load of grapes was lost or damaged which was transported from a point in this state to Omaha, Nebraska. If information on any point involving the same amount of investigation were needed for its own business, it could be ascertained in a much less time than thirty days, and it is not unreasonable to require that it should use the same degree of diligence where one of its shippers is interested. The case of Wallace v. Georgia, O. & N. R. Co. 94 Ga. 732, 22 S. E. 579, which lays down the doctrine of "correlative liberty of silence," and that "compulsory private discovery" cannot be enforced by "statutory terror," has no application whatever to the present case. This is also true of the case of Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Lackey, 78 Ill. 55, 20 Am. Rep. 259, where it was held that an act requiring railroad companies to pay the costs of inquest and the costs of burial of all persons who died on their cars was invalid, so far as it attempted to make such companies liable where they had violated no law and had been guilty of no negligence. The same is to be said of the case of Bielenberg v. Montana Union R. Co. 8 Mont. 271, 2 L. R. A. 813, 20 Pac. 314, where it was held that a statute of Montana which provided that a railroad company which damaged or killed a horse should be liable was invalid in so far as it imposed liability upon corporations that were not negligent in the act complained of. It certainly cannot be said that the statute under consideration is an impairment of the obligation of the contract made by the plaintiffs with the defendant, inasmuch as the statute was enacted long before the contract was entered into. Nor is the law under review such a regulation of commerce among the several states as to be violative of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which grants to Congress the exclusive right to regulate commerce among the several states. While a regulation of the character set forth in the statute under consideration might, in some remote degree, bear upon the matter of interstate commerce, it is in no sense such a regulation of that commerce as that the state would be inhibited from making it. In a broad sense, any regulation which touches at all persons or instrumentalities engaged in interstate commerce would be a regulation of that commerce. Still many such statutes have been held not to encroach upon the right of Congress to control the matter of commerce among the several states. See in this connection, Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. ed. 819; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133, 42 L. ed. 688, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289; Richmond & A. R. Co. v. E. A. Patterson Tobacco Co. 169 U. S. 311, 42 L. ed. 759, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 335; St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. Palmer, 38 Neb. 463, 22 L. R. A. 335, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 494, 56 N. W. 957; Hart v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 485, 29 N. W. 597; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Crossman Bros. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 622, 33 S. W. 290; Williams v. Fears, 110 Ga. 584, 50 L. R. A. 685, 35 S. E. 699, Affirmed in 179 U. S. 270, 45 L. ed. 186, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128.

2. Having reached the conclusion that the demurrer was properly overruled, it becomes necessary to determine whether the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial. Complaint is made that the court erred in excluding the evidence of the plaintiff Murphey to the effect that the fruit shipped belonged to his wife. There was no error in excluding this evidence. The plaintiffs were the shippers. They were the persons with whom the contract of affreightment was made. They were the consignors; and it is well settled that the shipper or consignor can bring an action against the carrier for a breach of the contract of affreightment, without reference to whether the shipper has any property, either general or special, in the goods shipped. See Carter v. Southern R. Co. 111 Ga. 38, 50 L. R. A. 354, 36 S. E. 308. In Lockhart v. Western & A. R. Co. 73 Ga. 472, 54 Am. Rep. 883, the plaintiff was not only not the shipper, but had no interest whatever in the goods. The act under which this suit is brought gives the right of action in terms to the shipper, and provides that the carrier shall be liable for the value of the goods lost or damaged in the same manner and to the same extent as if the loss or damage occurred on its own line. As the shipper had the right, in the event of loss or damage on its own line, to bring an action against the carrier under the contract, under the statute the shipper had a right to bring an action against the initial carrier upon its failure to comply with the terms of the statute. Of course, when the shipper recovers, he will hold the recovery in trust for the true owner, and there can be no additional recovery by the owner under this statute.

3. It is contended, further, that the court erred in rejecting certain evidence, consisting of correspondence between the claim agent of the defendant and officers and agents of the lines over which the grapes were transported from Barnesville, Georgia, to Omaha, Nebraska, the correspondence consisting of letters and telegrams; and also the evidence of the claim agent that he had charge of the tracing of the freight in controversy; that he instituted the search asked for by the plaintiffs; that he offered them the information which he had obtained just one day after the expiration of the thirty days required by the law, and that it was utterly impossible to have sooner obtained the information. While the evidence offered showed a mass of correspondence by wire and by mail, we cannot say that the evidence would have authorized a finding that it was impossible for the defendant to have obtained the information within thirty days. The company seems to have obtained the information, or at least a portion of it, within thirty-one days, and it would, indeed, be a strain to say that it was a matter of impossibility to have obtained it earlier than this. In these days, when so much can be accomplished in so short a time, and when those in charge of the affairs of the great railways of the country are in thorough communication with each other by the use of their own lines of telegraph as well as the lines of regular telegraph companies, it does seem to us to be an extraordinary claim to be made in behalf of such companies that it is an impossibility, with all of the means at their command, to locate the place at which a car load of freight was lost or damaged in transit from Georgia to Nebraska, when such car can be transported between the two points within four or five days. If such impossibility exists, it is evidence only that those in charge of the affairs of the company have either not sufficient employees to transact the business required of the companies, or the system by which they operate is defective at some point. We have reached the conclusion that the statute is a reasonable regulation, and the companies who are amenable to it must adopt some system by which the statute can be complied with; especially so when there can be no question that it is within the power of the company to adopt a system by which the information can be obtained within the time fixed by law. It may be said that the ruling we now make imposes a very great burden upon railroad companies. Railroad companies are not required to issue through bills of lading beyond their own lines, and if they do not desire to bear the burden incident to through bills of lading of this kind, the remedy is in their own hands. If a case should arise where it appeared that it was really impossible for the initial carrier to secure the information within the time fixed by the statute, another and quite a different question from the one now before us would be presented. The evidence offered in the present case did not make out a case of impossibility under any view of it. It simply demonstrated that the system of the defendant was inadequate; and railroad companies, like everyone else, must adapt their systems of business to the law of the land.

4. The foregoing discussion disposes of all of the grounds of the motion for a new trial that require special notice. The requests to charge were properly refused, and the portions of the charge complained of were not erroneous for any of the reasons set forth in the motion. Counsel stated in the argument that they did not raise any question as to the amount of the verdict, nor is there anything in their briefs in reference to this subject. We find no error which would have required the judge to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except Simmons, Ch. J., disqualified, and Lumphkin, P. J., absent on account of sickness.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

MUNCIE NATURAL GAS COMPANY,
Appt.,

v.

City of MUNCIE.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A municipal corporation has power to stipulate as to the maximum rates to be charged by a gas company when allowing it to lay pipes in the streets, under a statute giving it exclusive power over its streets, highways, and alleys.
2. A gas company, while enjoying a contract permitting it to lay pipes in the streets of a city, cannot attack the power of the city to stipulate in the contract as to the maximum rates to be charged for gas.
3. A municipal corporation may, for the protection of the citizens, maintain an action to enjoin a gas company from violating its contract as to the maximum rate to be charged for gas in consideration of receiving permission to place mains in the streets, although the municipality itself is not a consumer, and its rights in its municipal capacity are therefore not affected.
4. The avoidance of a multiplicity of suits will give equity jurisdiction of a suit by a municipal corporation to enjoin a company which has laid gas mains in its streets from violating its contract as to maximum rates, where it is entitled to nominal damages at law, and each inhabitant has a right of action to vindicate his rights.
5. Injunction will lie to prevent a gas company which has laid its mains in a city street from violating its contract as to maximum rates which it will charge.
6. A municipal corporation which has made a contract with a gas company laying pipes in its streets as to the maximum rates to be charged may maintain an action to enforce the contract as a trustee of an express trust, under a statute allowing action by such trustees, and providing that the term "trustee" shall be construed to include a person with whom, or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another.
7. Public contracts should be construed liberally in favor of the public.

8. A motion to modify the decree cannot be considered on appeal, where it was not made a part of the record.

(February 18, 1903.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Randolph County in favor of plaintiff in a suit to enjoin the violation of a contract. Affirmed.

Incorporated cities have power to grant to any person or corporation the right to lay pipes in the streets and alleys for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants thereof with gas.

Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901, § 3547, Acts 1881, p. 103.

These powers such cities can exercise, but they can exercise only the powers expressly granted by statute, and those necessarily and fairly implied in the powers expressly granted, and essential and indispensable to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation.

A corporation assumes to do that which the statute has not conferred the power to do. Its assumption of power is void; the act is a nullity; the contract is ultra vires. The statute is the measure of the corporation's power.

There is a clear difference between acts of officers of a corporation, municipal or private, committed without authority from the corporation, and acts of the corporation itself. The term ultra vires is used indiscriminately, and applies to both classes of acts. In its legitimate sense it applies only to such acts as are beyond the powers of the corporation itself.

The right of a city is limited to the control of the supply and distribution of natural gas, and to require gas companies "to pay a reasonable license for such franchise and privilege" as it sees fit to grant them. No right exists to fix maximum prices which citizens shall pay for their fuel and lights.

The acceptance of an ultra vires city ordinance fixing maximum rates to be charged third parties by a gas company does not invest the city with any new power, nor does it invest it with any authority to pass the same as an ordinance, or make it a valid contract. A power which the state has not conferred upon a municipality cannot be granted or supplied by a gas company. The creature gets its powers from the creator.

Gillett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee instituted this action to restrain appellant from violating a special negative covenant in a contract between said parties regarding the maximum price of natural gas to be furnished by appellant to the inhabitants of said city. The amended complaint was in two paragraphs, to each of which a demurrer was overruled. Appellant answered in three paragraphs, one of which was a general denial. Demurrers were sustained to the other paragraphs of answer. Upon the request of each of the parties, the court, after a trial, made a special finding of the facts, and stated its conclusions of law thereon. A decree was rendered in favor of appellee.

So far as necessary to the consideration of this case, the facts so found specially are, in substance, as follows: On the 7th day of December, 1886, appellee passed an ordinance that was accepted by appellant on the 21st day of December, 1886, authorizing appellant to construct and maintain a system of pipes beneath the streets and alleys of said city for the purpose of furnishing and selling natural gas to its inhabitants generally. The 12th section of the ordinance contained the following proviso: "Provided, that in no case shall the total cost to such consumers for private purposes of such gas at any time exceed three fourths of the present current price of wood or coal for fuel, or of artificial gas for lighting; that the price of natural gas to private consumers for heating purposes shall be regulated by a schedule of prices submitted by the board of directors to the common council of said city at the beginning of each fiscal year, and that said company shall not, in any manner or for any purpose whatever, exceed the prices so submitted for that year, which schedule shall not exceed the price above stated in this section, said present price of wood being $2.50 per cord; of anthracite coal, $6 per ton; of soft coal, $4 per ton; and of artificial gas, $1.80 per 1,000 cubic feet." It is further found that said ordinance is still in force; that the appellant laid, and still maintains, the system of pipes provided for in said ordinance, and is engaged in the business of furnishing natural gas to the inhabitants of said city for heating and lighting purposes for hire; that on the 17th day of September, 1900, appellant submitted to the common council of said city a schedule, which is set out, of prices to be charged private consumers for the year beginning on the 1st day of October, 1900; that the city council investigated and considered such schedule, and by resolution found and declared that the prices in said schedule were excessive, and ordered and directed the appellant to submit a new schedule, which it refused to do. The findings sufficiently show that the schedule submitted provided for prices in excess of the provisions of the ordinance. It was further found by the court that since the 1st day of November, 1900, the appellant had been, and was at the time of the institution of the suit, charging the prices to consumers fixed in said schedule, under threats to discontinue the service of such consumers as refused to pay on the basis of said schedule, and that it threatens and intends to continue to charge and enforce the payment by all of its consumers of the rates set forth in said schedule. It is also found that since 60 L. R. A.

the 1st day of October, 1900, appellant has had more than 3,000 of said consumers in said city, who have, at great expense, fitted their residences with pipes and other fixtures to use natural gas, and that they cannot procure said gas except from the appellant. It is unnecessary to set out the conclusions of law.

The first contention of appellant's counsel is that the city had no authority to enter into a contract fixing the maximum rates to be charged the inhabitants of said city, and that, therefore, the contract was ultra vires, and void. We have to deal here with a question of ultra vires in its true sense; that is, where the act is claimed to be ultra vires the corporation itself. Municipal corporations possess and can exercise such powers only as are granted by the legislature in express words, and those necessarily or fairly implied or incident to the powers expressly granted, and those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 89, 90; 1 Smith, Mod. Law of Mun. Corp. 562, and cases cited; Pittsburg C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Crown Point, 146 Ind. 421, 35 L. R. A. 684, 45 N. E. 587; Bogue v. Bennett, 156 Ind. 478, 60 N. E. 143; Walker v. Towle, 156 Ind. 639, 53 L. R. A. 749, 59 N. E. 20; Lake County Water & Light Co. v. Walsh (Ind.) 65 N. E. 530. As said by Mr. Dillon: "The general principle of law is settled beyond controversy that the agents, officers, or even city council of a municipal corporation cannot bind the corporation by any contract which is beyond the scope of its powers, or entirely foreign to the purposes of the corporation or which (not being legislatively authorized) is against public policy. This doctrine grows out of the nature of such institutions, and rests upon reasonable and solid grounds. The inhabitants are the corporators; the officers are but the public agents of the corporation. The duties and powers of the officers or public agents of the corporation are prescribed by statute or charter, which all persons not only may know, but are bound to know. The opposite doctrine would be fraught with such danger and accompanied with such abuse that it would soon end in the ruin of municipalities, or be legislatively overthrown. These considerations vindicate both the reasonableness and necessity of the rule that the corporation is bound only when its agents or officers, by whom it can alone act, if it acts at all, keep within the limits of the chartered authority of the corporation. The history of the workings of municipal bodies has demonstrated the salutary nature of this principle, and that it is the part of true wisdom to keep the corporate wings clipped down to the lawful standard." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 457. But, notwithstanding this background of inhibition, we think that it may be affirmed that appellee had power to enter into the contract in question. Section 61 of the act of March 14, 1867 (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901, § 3623), provides that "the common council shall have exclusive power over the streets, highways, alleys, and bridges within such city." Natural gas is a public utility that cannot be obtained by the citizens of a municipality generally, except as it is conducted in pipes along the public ways of the city. The grant of exclusive power to the common council over such ways comprehends the right to permit gas companies to use the streets. If the common council may permit a natural gas company to use the streets without any conditions annexed except such as the law attaches, it is not perceived why, as in this case, in making provision for supplying natural gas to all of the inhabitants of the city, it may not protect such inhabitants against extortion by providing that the company shall not charge in excess of certain prices for its service. The right to annex terms by way of limitation upon the authority of the grantee in such cases has been often affirmed by this court. *Western Paving & Supply Co. v. Citizens' Street R. E. 436, it was said: "There was no compulsion on the part of the appellant to grant the privilege to use its streets to any particular company. It was within its discretion to give or not to give its consent, and it had the right to withhold it from all gas companies. Citizens' Gas & Min. Co. v. Elwood, 114 Ind. 332, 16 N. E. 624. It was not limited alone to the granting of this franchise, but it had the right to prescribe and impose terms and conditions. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 706; 2 Wood, Railroads, p. 986; Elliott, Roads and Streets, p. 565. When these terms and conditions, proposed by the appellant, were accepted by the appellee, and complied with, it became a binding contract. Western Paving & Supply Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 128 Ind. 531 [10 L. R. A. 770, 26 N. E. 188, 28 N. E. 88]." In Los Angeles City Water Co. v. Los Angeles, 88 Fed. 720, 731, the court said: "In procuring water, or any other commodity, by purchase, one of the first things to be considered and agreed upon is the matter of price. Therefore, to hold that a general power, without limitation, in a municipal corporation, to supply the city with water, does not include power to agree upon a price, it seems to me would be a solecism." The grant in this case may be said to rest upon the business or proprietary power of the city, as distinguished from its governmental or legislative power. *Indianapolis v. It is argued by counsel for appellant that, if the common council may contract that natural-gas rates shall not be in excess of a particular scale, it may also exercise general supervision over those who enter into other contracts with the inhabitants of the city. Municipalities cannot, of course, exercise any such paternalism as that. They cannot, under existing legislation, exercise the legislative power to fix rates in any case; but we perceive no reason, in view of the condition of legislation at the time the ordinance in question was accepted, why it was not competent for appellee to annex the terms complained of to the grant of the right to use its streets. We are not required in this case to consider the effect of subsequent legislation. But even if there was a technical want of power upon the part of the city to enter into a contract establishing maximum rates for natural-gas service, yet we do not think that appellant, while enjoying the fruits of the contract, can attack it, notwithstanding the fact that the law of ultra vires is stricter in its application to public than to private corporations. Counsel for appellant seem to think that the cases in this state are somewhat out of accord with those of the United States Supreme Court, which has followed the English cases. The leading case in the United States on this subject is Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 139 U. S. 24, 35 L. ed. 55, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 478, wherein it is affirmed that partly executed contracts ultra vires the corporation itself are void as to both parties; that they cannot be affirmed by estoppel or otherwise, and that, where the parties have so far acted upon such contracts that they cannot be restored to their original situation, the court is limited to the granting of such relief, if any, as can be given independently of the contract. The declarations of the case mentioned are no broader than those found in Tipppecanoe County v. Lafayette M. & B. R. Co. 50 Ind. 85, wherein it is declared that a corporate "contract ultra vires the charter is void, and cannot be made valid by any subsequent act of the corporation, because there is no residuary power to confirm it;" and that, "if the act is ultra vires the corporation, it is void, and no one is bound." That all power not expressly or impliedly granted to corporations is withheld is a rule that the authorities without division apply in testing the validity of the purely executory contracts of corporations; but in so far as the defense of ultra vires to a contract that has been partly executed is concerned, we must look to the cases, rather than to the lexicographers, for a definition of the term ultra vires. Without attempting to cover the whole ground, it may be said that, if a contract is of such character that, had the corporation at once proceeded to execute it, its act would have been contrary to public policy, or expressly or impliedly prohibited by statute, or would, in any degree, disable the corporation from the performance of its statutory duties, the undertaking cannot be enforced by either party. To this extent the cases, English, Federal, and state, are in reasonable harmony. As illustrative of this view, we cite Franklin Nat. Bank v. Whitehead, 149 Ind. 560, 39 L. R. A. 725, 49 N. E. 592; State ex rel. Scott v. Hart, 144 Ind. 107, 33 L. R. A. 118, 43 N. E. 7; Brown v. First Nat. Bank, 137 Ind. 655, 672, 24 L. R. A. 206, 37 N. E. 158; Platter v. Elkhart County, 103 Ind. 360, 2 N. E. 544; Cullen v. Carthage, 103 Ind. 197, 53 Am. Rep. 504, 2 N. E. 571; Miller v. Embree, 88 Ind. 133; Ft. Wayne v. Lehr, 88 Ind. 62; Driftwood Valley Turnp. Co. v. Bartholomew County, 72 Ind. 226; Rothrock v. Carr, 55 Ind. 334; Burnett v. Abbott, 51 Ind. 254; Tippecanoe County v. Lafayette M. & B. R. Co. 50 Ind. 85; Wrought Iron Bridge Co. v. Hendricks County, 19 Ind. App. 672, 48 N. E. 1050. On the other hand, we have a number of cases, commencing with the leading case of State Bd. of Agri. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 47 Ind. 407, 17 Am. Rep. 702, in which it is held, on the principle of equitable estoppel, that, where there is a mere defect of power upon the part of the corporation to enter into the contract, a defendant, while enjoying the benefit of the contract, shall not be permitted to raise the question as to the power of the corporation. Sturgeon v. Daviess County, 65 Ind. 302; Poock v. Lafayette Bldg. Asso. 71 Ind. 357; Bicknell v. Widner School Twp. 73 Ind. 501; Louisville N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Flanagan, 113 Ind. 488, 14 N. E. 370; Wright v. Hughes, 119 Ind. 324, 21 N. E. 907. The cases last cited are not seriously, if in any respect, out of accord with the Supreme Court of the United States. In Union P. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 163 U. S. 564, 41 L. ed. 285, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1173, it was pointed out that in a line of cases in that court, including Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 139 U. S. 24, 35 L. ed. 55, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 478, the contracts condemned as void were against public policy, and it was held that a contract as to which there was a doubt as to whether it was within the implied powers of a corporation was not to be condemned because of a remote chance that in the future it would partially disable the corporation from performing its charter duties. The defense that a contract is ultra vires the corporation does not deserve the execration it has received, since in most instances there is a collateral remedy in cases where there ought to be one. Although such contracts are not necessarily illegal, the ultra vires doctrine has its roots, like the rule of par delictum, in public policy; and its chief value lies in the fact that it is a brake upon improper corporate action, more efficacious, perhaps, in its practical results than the public remedy by information. As to cases, however, of mere defects of power, we think that it should be held, in accordance with the clear weight of authority in the United States, that, while the defendant retains the benefit of the contract, the state alone can raise the question. Tested by this 60 L. R. A.

consideration, we hold that, while the appellant continues to use the streets of the city of Muncie to distribute natural gas to private consumers by virtue of said accepted ordinance, it cannot question the right of the city to enter into such contract.

The next question is, Can the city maintain an action by way of injunction to enforce the contract? It is objected that, as the city is not alleged to be a consumer, the inhabitants of the city using the gas can alone sue for the invasion of their rights; and it is further objected that, in any event, injunction on behalf of the city will not lie. As a step in the solution of these questions, we will first consider who it is that brings this action. It is not the common council, for its members merely represent the municipality. The city sues, and the city is composed of the inhabitants of the locality Citizens' Gas & Min. Co. v. Elwood, 114 Ind. 332, 16 N. E. 624; Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 50 Am. Rep. 830; Strosser v. Ft. Wayne, 100 Ind. 443. The rule, both in England and the United States, except as changed by statute, is that it is the attorney general, as the representative of the public, who sues for invasions of the public right, whether by way of purpresture or nuisance, or because of corporate excess. Atty. Gen. v. Richards, 2 Anstr. 603; Atty. Gen. v. Forbes, 2 Mylne & C. 123; Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co. 12 Pet. 91, 9 L. ed. 1012; United States v. American Bell Telph. Co. 128 U. S. 315, 32 L. ed. 450, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 90; Coosaw Min. Co. v. South Carolina, 144 U. S. 550, 36 L. ed. 537, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689; Re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 39 L. ed. 1092, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900; Columbia Athletic Club v. State, 143 Ind. 98, 28 L. R. A. 727, 40 N. E. 914; State v. Ohio Oil Co. 150 Ind. 21, 47 L. R. A. 627, 49 N. E. 809; Atty. Gen. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 35 Wis. 482; Atty. Gen. v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct, 133 Mass. 361; Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 631; Stockton v. Central R. Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 52, 17 L. R. A. 97, 24 Atl. 964; Com. v. Rush, 14 Pa. 186; Kerr v. Trego, 47 Pa. 292. While the state may elect to bring an action to forfeit the franchise of a corporation created by it because of an ultra vires act that tends to the prejudice of the public, yet it is not bound to do so, but may invoke the powers of its courts having general chancery jurisdiction to keep the corporation within the path marked out for it by statute. See cases last above cited. The state may well complain, where a corporation is indulging in ultra vires acts to the prejudice of the public, that the corporation has violated its implied contract to observe the laws of the state. Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950; Columbia Athletic Club v. State, 143 Ind. 98, 28 L. R. A. 727, 40 N. E. 914. This view was forcibly expressed by McGill, Ch., in Stockton v. Central R. Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 72, 17 L. R. A. 106, 24 Atl. 971, as follows: "Water, gas, telegraph, and similar corporations also render to the public benefits which readily suggest themselves to the mind as it contemplates their work. While the state confers special privileges upon these favorites, it at the same time exacts from them duties which also tend to the public welfare. The whole scheme of the laws of their organization is to equip and control them as instruments for the public good. Such corporations hold their powers, not merely in trust for the pecuniary profit of their stockholders, but also in trust for the public weal. The impress for public good is stamped upon their very being, and it becomes a duty, which, though not prescribed in express language of the law, is to be implied from the nature of every power conferred. When, therefore, it appears that such a corporation, unmindful of its plain duty, acts prejudicially to the public, in order to make undue gains and profits for its stockholders, it uses its powers in a manner not contemplated by the law which confers them. The use becomes abuse and is tantamount to excess of power."

We, of course, realize that the people of the city of Muncie are not the public at large, and that the breach of contract here complained of is not an ultra vires act. But the question is whether the analogy is not sufficiently great to justify courts of chancery, whose peculiar boast is the adaptability of their remedies to extend relief where an adequate remedy is wanting, in granting relief in cases of this kind. It was declared by Lord Chancellor Cottenham, in Taylor v. Salmon, 4 Mylne & C. 141, that it is the duty of a court of equity "to adapt its practice and course of proceeding, as far as possible, to the existing state of society, and to apply its jurisdiction to all those new cases which, from the progress daily making in the affairs of men, must continually arise, and not, from too strict an adherence to forms and rules established under very different circumstances, decline to administer justice, and to enforce rights for which there is no other remedy." The people of the city of Muncie—to borrow somewhat from the thought of one of our cases—are the public of that locality, and it appears that the appellant is doing acts to the prejudice of the inhabitants of the city, while exercising a public function by virtue of a contract that has admitted it to the streets of the municipality. The analogy is so close between the case of the state suing to enjoin an ultra vires act by one of its corporations and the case in hand that we think that it ought to be held that the city may maintain an action to restrain appellant, if the facts otherwise warrant equitable intervention. But this case is in principle within existing adjudications as to the power of the municipality to sue on behalf of its inhabitants. In London v. Bolt, 5 Ves. Jr. 129, the court of chancery granted an injunction, upon the application of the city of London, to restrain acts that amounted to a nuisance by endangering the lives of the inhabitants. The case of Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, 27 Am. Dec. 80, was a suit to enjoin the unauthorized erection of a structure upon grounds dedicated to the public of a municipality. In disposing of the case, Chancellor Walworth, after stating that he did not feel disposed to go to the length of holding that the legal title of the land was vested in the village, said: "I can see no valid objection to considering the corporation as the proper representative of the equitable rights of the inhabitants of the village to the use of the public square, so as to authorize the filing of a bill by the corporation in this court to protect those equitable rights against the erection of this nuisance." Guelph v. Canada Co. 4 Grant, Ch. U. C. 632, was an action to restrain the defendant therein from selling certain property within the town that it was claimed had been dedicated by the defendant in laying out the lands of the municipality. It was objected that the attorney general was not a party, but the court said: "The legislature has intrusted the plaintiffs with extensive powers in relation to the public property of the town of Guelph, and has at the same time devolved upon them the duty of protecting the rights of the public from infringement. Now it cannot be denied that the inhabitants of Guelph have a peculiar interest in the market-place. The infringement complained of would obviously inflict a special injury on the inhabitants of Guelph. A private individual sustaining special damage is allowed to file a bill of this sort, and it is difficult to understand why this municipality should not have the same right." In Greenwich v. Easton, 24 N. J. Eq. 217, the court cited approvingly the case of Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, 27 Am. Dec. 80, on the proposition as to the right to an injunction, and pointed out the fact that a township sustains a special injury by the destruction of its highways beyond that of the public in general, because of its burden of repair. See also, as to the right of the city to sue, State ex rel. Bridgeton v. Bridgeton & M. Traction Co. 62 N. J. L. 592, 45 L. R. A. 837, 43 Atl. 715; Florida C. P. R. Co. v. State, 31 Fla. 482, 20 L. R. A. 419, 13 So. 103; Williams v. Smith, 22 Wis. 594. If we appeal to the analogous right of the state to restrain nuisances or to prevent its corporations from committing ultra vires acts, it may be affirmed that it is not necessary to show that the city has itself sustained damage when it sues for the benefit of its inhabitants, but that it is enough to show that the act tends to injure the public of the municipality. Grey v. Greenville & H. R. Co. 59 N. J. Eq. 372, 46 Atl. 638; Atty. Gen. v. Shrewsbury Bridge Co. L. R. 21 Ch. Div. 752. And see Eel River R. Co. v. State, 155 Ind. 433, 57 N. E. 388. In Atty. Gen. v. Ely, H. & S. R. Co. L. R. 4 Ch. 194, it was said: "The question is whether what has been done has been done in accordance with the law. If not, the attorney general strictly represents the whole of the public in saying that the law shall be observed."

We really need no analogies, however, to uphold the right of appellee to maintain this suit. The city, as a corporate entity, represents all of its inhabitants. The streets, over which it has exclusive power, are being used by appellant under a contract with the city that appellant has broken. This would entitle the city to at least nominal damages at law; and its right to restrain the further breach of the contract, which amounts to a negative specific enforcement of the contract, can be affirmed on the ground that it will avoid a multiplicity of actions. This is not an independent source or occasion of jurisdiction, but, as laid down by Prof. Pomeroy, where a party is entitled to even legal relief, and there exists between him and a number of others entitled to relief a common interest, relation, or question as against another party, that can be determined by one suit, such acts afford a distinct basis for an appeal to equity. Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 243 et seq. In such cases it is not necessary that the party suing should himself be threatened by, or compelled to resort to, numerous actions to vindicate his right, because considerations of governmental policy enter into the question. As applied to this case, it is a matter of public expediency that by one suit rights shall be established for the time that the injunction has to run, instead of hundreds of the inhabitants of the city being each compelled to sue to vindicate his right, or otherwise to submit to a small, but annoying injustice. Atty. Gen. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 35 Wis. 432.

But the appellee had a right to appeal to equity on another ground. The city was a party to the contract, and it complains of the breach of a negative covenant. This is a case, so far as the covenant is concerned, for a negative specific performance by means of an injunction. A court of equity, where there is a basis for the assertion of its jurisdiction, will not suffer men to depart from their agreements at pleasure, leaving the party with whom they have contracted to the mere chance of damages which a jury may give. Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 619; De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De G. & J. 282. A well-known writer on injunctions, after stating that there may be cases where a court of equity would refuse to interfere where it is clear that the damages for a breach would be inappreciable, says: "A covenantee has the right to have the actual enjoyment of property modo et forma as stipulated for by him. It is no answer to say that the act complained of will inflict no injury on the plaintiff, or will be even beneficial to him. It is for the plaintiff to judge whether the agreement shall be preserved as far as he is concerned, or whether he shall permit it to be violated. It is not necessary that he should show that any damage has been done. It being established that the acts of the defendant are a violation of the contract entered into by him, the court will protect the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the right which he has purchased." Kerr, Inj. in Equity, *533.

Appellant's counsel contend that the contract in question was made for the exclusive benefit of third persons, and that, therefore, the city is not the real party in interest within § 251, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901. Assuming the correctness of this position, it does not follow that the city may not sue, for the next section of the statute provides that "an executor, administrator, a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue, without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section, shall be construed to include a person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another." We think it may be properly said, in view of the contract, that, if the city cannot sue on its own account, it appears that it is the trustee of an express trust within the meaning of the statute last mentioned. The language of the covenant is not as clear as it might be, but, so far as objection to it is pointed out, we think that it is capable of construction. The first point to ascertain is what the parties themselves meant and understood, but courts cannot adopt a construction of a legal instrument which would do violence to the rules of language or to the rules of law. 2 Parsons, Contr. 5th ed. 494.

It is unnecessary to determine whether § 12 of the ordinance gave the city any power to regulate charges to private consumers within the maximum scale of charges; but it is clear, from language twice repeated, that there was to be a maximum scale. For heating purposes, the price of gas was not to exceed "three quarters of the present current price of wood or coal for fuel," and the cost of natural gas for lighting was not to exceed a like ratio to the cost of artificial gas. Then follows the provision as to the submission of the schedule of charges for heating purposes; next, the provision that the "schedule shall not exceed the price above stated;" and, finally, the then current prices of wood, coal, and artificial gas are fixed. The parties sought a standard, and it ought to be the endeavor of the court, so far as possible, to give to that standard the element of certainty, and not to import elements of uncertainty into it that the parties did not see fit to mention. If there be any question concerning the correctness of this construction, the doubt must be solved in favor of the city, because public contracts should be construed, not contra proferentem, but liberally in favor of the public. Indianapolis Cable Street R. Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 127 Ind. 369, 8 L. R. A. 539, 24 N. E. 1054, 26 N. E. 893; Western Paving & Supply Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 128 Ind. 525, 10 L. R. A. 770, 26 N. E. 188, 28 N. E. 88; Cambria Iron Co. v. Union Trust Co. 154 Ind. 291, sub nom. Union Trust Co. v. Richmond City R. Co. 48 L. R. A. 41, 55 N. E. 745, 56 N. E. 665; Slidell v. Grandjean, 111 U. S. 412, 28 L. ed. 321, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475; Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 843, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 243; Goosaw Min. Co. v. South Carolina, 144 U. S. 552, 36 L. ed. 537, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689; Beach, Modern Law of Contracts, § 726. This principle of construction, it was said, as applied to pub-lie grants, in the Slidell Case, and also in the Coosaw Mining Co. Case, "is a wise one; it serves to defeat any purpose, concealed by the skillful use of terms, to accomplish something not apparent on the face of the act, and thus sanctions only open dealing with legislative bodies."

The views that we have expressed in this opinion dispose of all questions concerning the rulings on the pleadings, except as to the sufficiency of the first paragraph of complaint; but as the special findings set out sufficient facts to warrant a decree under the amended second paragraph of complaint, the error, if any, in sustaining a demurrer to the first paragraph of complaint, was harmless.

The court did not err in overruling the motion for a venire de novo, so called. The finding complained of stated matters of ultimate fact, and did not state the whole issue, as counsel assume. The motion for a supplemental finding does not present any question. Sharp v. Malia, 124 Ind. 407, 25 N. E. 9; Bunch v. Hart, 138 Ind. 1, 37 N. E. 537; Elliott, App. Proc. § 757. We do not find that the motion to modify the decree was incorporated in a bill of exceptions, or that it was otherwise made a part of the record, and therefore the question is not before us. Adams v. La Rose, 75 Ind. 471; Forsythe v. Kreuter, 100 Ind. 27; People's Sav. L. & Bldg. Asso. v. Spears, 115 Ind. 297, 17 N. E. 570; § 662, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901.

We cannot disturb the finding on the evidence. There was a vast quantity of testimony offered as to the comparative values of the fuels and lights in question, and we cannot say that the court erred in its conclusions of fact concerning the same.

The record of the common council showing its rejection of the schedule submitted by appellant was a proper substantive evidence of the fact of such rejection, as a certified copy of the resolution was served upon appellant. After the latter had submitted its schedule of rates for the then ensuing year, it was incumbent upon appellee to reject it before it could sue; and we cannot suppose that the learned judge who tried this case gave credence to any of the interwoven declarations of fact not relevant to the question in issue.

Complaint is made by appellant's counsel as to the action of the trial court in the admission and exclusion of certain items of evidence not already directly or impliedly ruled on in the course of this opinion. For the most part, these objections are insufficiently briefed. Elliott, App. Proc. § 445; Harrison v. Hedges, 60 Ind. 266; Bray v. Franklin L. Ins. Co. 68 Ind. 6; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hazelett, 105 Ind. 212, 55 Am. Rep. 192, 4 N. E. 582. The other objections can be disposed of on practice grounds relative to the condition of the transcript, or for the reason that the objections are not well taken.

STATE of Indiana ex rel. City of INDIANAPOLIS, Appt.,

v.

INDIANAPOLIS UNION RAILWAY COMPANY.

1. On demurrer to an alternative writ of mandamus the question presented is not whether relator is entitled to some relief, but whether he is entitled to the specific relief asked for.
2. Power to require a railroad company to elevate its tracks through the city for the purpose of abolishing grade crossings is not conferred on a municipality by a charter empowering it to define nuisances and require their abatement; to secure the safety of citizens in the running of trains, and to provide protection against injury from their operation; to require railroad companies to change the location, grade, and crossings of their roads; to compel them to raise or lower their tracks to conform to any grade that may be established, and to construct bridges, viaducts, or tunnels across their rights of way at street crossings,—where the conditions at some of the crossings do not require such remedy.
3. General charter authority to define nuisances does not empower a municipal corporation to declare anything a nuisance per se which in fact was not recognized as such by the common law.

(February 4, 1908.)

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Superior Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in a mandamus proceeding to compel the elevation of defendant's tracks for the purpose of abolishing certain grade crossings. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John W. Kern and J. E. Bell for appellant.

Messrs. Baker & Daniel, for appellee:

Upon a demurrer to an alternative writ for the alleged reason of insufficiency of facts, it is not the province of the court to decide whether facts are stated which entitle the relator to some form of relief; it is the province of the court to decide only whether the relator is entitled to the specific relief prayed for.

The requirements of the common law respecting the restoration of street grade crossings by railroad companies are not greater than those of the 5th subsection of said § 5153, of 2 Burns's Revision.

Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. State, 149 Ind. 276, 49 N. E. 2.

The power of the courts in enforcing the duty of railroad companies to "restore" grade crossings does not go so far as to authorize them to compel railroad companies to elevate their tracks.

The fact that appellee's railroad is constructed across the streets which are much traveled, and over which travel is increasing, does not make its railroad which is upon the streets a nuisance.

New Castle v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 155 Ind. 18, 57 N. E. 516.

It is not within the corporate power of the appellee to construct, maintain, and operate elevated railroad tracks as prayed in the complaint and alternative writ.

Without the consent of the state, and without the acquiescence of its stockholders, the appellee could not elevate its tracks; it would be unlawful for it so to do. Courts will not compel by mandate the doing of an unlawful thing.

To construe the Indianapolis city charter as giving the municipality this right of discretion as against the appellee would be placing upon the city charter act a construction which would make necessary a judicial declaration that, as against the appellee, the act is unconstitutional, because it impairs the obligation of a contract.

Jordan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The state of Indiana, on the relation of the city of Indianapolis, instituted and prosecuted this action in the lower court for a writ of mandamus, seeking thereby to coerce appellee, a corporation owning and controlling a series of railroad tracks in said city, to elevate these tracks at and between certain street crossings. An alternative writ of mandate was issued upon the petition filed. This writ contained all of the material facts averred and set out in the petition. The writ, as issued, commanded the defendant to commence, without delay, the work of removing its railroad tracks where the same crossed the streets named, and in lieu thereof to construct elevated railroad tracks "in such a manner as not to interfere with public travel on any of the streets named, and in compliance with the provisions of the ordinance of the common council of the city of Indianapolis, passed on the 23d day of August, 1899." In response to the alternative writ the appellee, defendant below, appeared and demurred thereto for insufficiency of facts. The demurrer was sustained, and judgment was rendered against the relator. Error is assigned on the ruling of the court in sustaining this demurrer, and the question presented in this appeal for our decision is, Do the facts contained in the alternative writ entitle the relator to the specific right which it claims, or do they justify the command or order of the alternative writ? For the rule is well settled in mandamus proceedings that, on a demurrer to the alternative writ, the question presented or raised is not, as is the case in an ordinary action, whether the relator under the facts is entitled to some form of relief, but the question raised is as to whether he is entitled to the specific relief prayed for, or, in other words, can the specific order or command of the alternative writ under the facts therein averred be justified? Vide Merrill on Mandamus, §§ 255 and 256, and cases cited in support of the text. Applegate v. State, 158 Ind. 119, 63 N. E. 16; State ex rel. Hart v. Commercial Ins. Co. (Ind.) 64 N. E. 466, and cases cited.

The following are, in the main, the facts set out in the alternative writ: There is a terminal of some fourteen railroads within the city of Indianapolis, which is an incorporated city and contains a population of more than 100,000, and is acting under and controlled by the provisions of an act approved March 6, 1891, commonly known as the "Indianapolis charter." The defendant is a corporation organized and incorporated pursuant to the statutes governing the incorporation of union railway companies, and is now and has been for many years engaged in maintaining a union railway station in said city, and owning and controlling numerous railroad tracks in said station, extending east and west therefrom through a populous part of said city, across Meridian, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Alabama, New Jersey, and East streets on the east, and Capitol avenue, Senate avenue, and other streets on the west. That passing over said tracks, extending to the east of said Union station, are all the passenger engines and tenders, and all the passenger, baggage, express, and mail cars, run and operated in and through said city by the following lines of railway: (Here follow an enumeration and statement or description of nine divisions of railroads which run into and through the city of Indianapolis.) It is alleged that not less than 80 passenger trains, operated by the various companies named, pass over the said tracks of defendant, which run east from said Union station every twenty-four hours, which trains run at a high rate of speed, and cross the streets named, and that during certain times named the intervals between the passing of such trains are very short. The time of arrival and departure of all of these several trains at and from the Union station is here set out. That passing over the tracks extending west from said station are all the passenger trains of the following lines of railroad: (a) The Chicago Division of the Big Four Railway Company, a thoroughfare extending from Indianapolis to Chicago, and connecting with the various other divisions of said road centering in Indianapolis. (b) The Peoria Division of said Big Four Railway, extending from Peoria, Illinois, and connecting at Indianapolis with the other divisions of that railroad in said city. (c) The St. Louis Division of said Big Four Railway, extending from Indianapolis to St. Louis. (d) The Terre Haute & Indianapolis (commonly called the Vandalia) Railroad, which connects Indianapolis and St. Louis. (e) The Indiana, Decatur, & Western Railroad, which runs from Indianapolis to Decatur, Illinois, having eastern and western connections at terminal points. (f) The Indianapolis & Vincennes Railroad, operated by and as a part of the Pennsylvania Railroad system, extending from Indianapolis to Vincennes, having connections with other points. That not less than 57 passenger trains, operated by the several companies named, arrive and depart from the west end of said station every twenty-four hours, many of them at short intervals, crossing Capitol avenue and Senate avenue at a high rate of speed. The tracks over which said trains are run extend in a general easterly and westerly direction through the central part of said city. That the population of said city when said tracks were first laid was not to exceed 20,000; that said population is now about 180,000; that the principal thoroughfares of said city connecting that part of the city south of the tracks with that part lying to the north thereof are the above-named streets, which are crossed by the tracks aforesaid; that the part of the city devoted to mercantile business, both wholesale and retail, is situated north of the tracks, while on the south side thereof there are large factories, and at least one third of the entire population of said city resides on that side. The streets so crossed by said tracks are constantly used by the people of said city in passing backwards and forwards between the different parts thereof, from factories to stores and from residences to places of business, such streets being the principal thoroughfares for public travel; that in the necessary and proper movement of the people of said city in the transaction of their daily business, in the attending of schools by children, and the attending of churches and other public places by all, large numbers of men, women, and children are each day and night required to travel upon said streets where the same are crossed by defendant's tracks, and that no less than 40,000 people are compelled to and do pass daily on and over said tracks, such travel being by pedestrians and those driving in wagons and other vehicles. That when the trains aforesaid are running across such streets at the intervals above set out, some arriving and others departing, the engines emitting large volumes of smoke, the bells thereof ringing, the whistles thereon sounding, and all running at high speed, there is constant danger to the lives of all persons who are traveling in and upon any of such streets at such points of crossing. That within two years last past many inhabitants of said city have been killed at such crossings, and many more seriously injured by engines and cars running upon and against them while they were endeavoring to travel in said streets, as they had the right to do at the points aforesaid. That, by reason of the increased and increasing volume of railroad traffic, the necessity for more engines and cars and more constant use of said tracks is constantly increasing, while, by reason of the increase in the population of said city on both sides of said tracks, the necessity for more travel across such tracks is also constantly increasing, so that dangers to life and property by reason of such crossings are also increasing in corresponding proportion to such increase of railway traffic and population. That the continued existence of such tracks upon and over the streets named has become and is wholly inconsistent with the use of said streets for public travel, and said continued existence is a constant menace to the lives of all the people using the same at the points aforesaid. That it is necessary, in order to make such streets and highways at such crossings reasonably safe for the inhabitants of said city making proper use thereof, and for property being conveyed along the same, and to restore said streets so occupied by said tracks so that they may be safe and convenient for public travel, that the surface of said streets should not be occupied by such tracks, or any tracks used for the passage of locomotive engines and railroad cars propelled by steam, and that such railway tracks should be removed from the surface of such streets with all reasonable despatch. That the common council of said city, on August 23, 1899, recognizing the evils hereinbefore recited, attempted to remedy the same by the passage of an ordinance entitled "An Ordinance for the Restoration of Highways and Streets in the City of Indianapolis, Whose Surface is Occupied by Railroad Tracks, by the Removal of Such Tracks and for the Removal of Railroad Tracks from the Surface of Streets and Highways in Such City; Providing Penalties for Its Violation, and Fixing a Time when the Same shall Take Effect."—which ordinance, being properly approved, took effect and is now in force. That, by reason of the facts hereinbefore recited and stated, the city ordinance under its terms declares the railroad crossings in said city to be nuisances, and that the continuation of such crossings at grade is entirely inconsistent with the use of such streets for travel by the public, and the ordinance, among other things, provides: That all railroads and railroad tracks and structures upon the surface of the streets and highways, within a designated territory in said city, called the first district, which district included all the streets and crossings described in the complaint and writ, should be removed therefrom on or before the 1st day of September, 1901, and should not thereafter be relaid. That every railroad track existing or being upon any public street or highway at grade, contrary to the provisions of said ordinance, is declared to be a nuisance, the same being a menace to life and property therein, and a serious interference with the comfort, safety, and convenience of the public. That, after the time therein limited for the removal of such tracks, the board of public works of said city shall be authorized and directed to cause the same to be removed and abated. That any corporation, person, or persons who should construct, operate, or maintain any railroad tracks upon the surface of streets, contrary to the provisions of such ordinance, should be liable to a penalty of $200 per day. And said ordinance also provided that, subject to the limitations, conditions, reservations, and exceptions contained therein, "the consent of the common council is hereby given to all persons and corporations now owning or operating any railroad or railroad tracks upon the surface of any of the streets or highways, within the limits of said city, heretofore constructed upon or across the same, in pursuance of lawful authority, to construct, maintain, and operate elevated railroads in lieu thereof." That among the conditions imposed by said ordinance upon which such railroad companies might maintain elevated tracks in lieu of the tracks at grade, as at present, was the condition "that the work of constructing each of said elevated railroads within the first district shall be commenced not later than the 1st day of April, 1900, and completed not later than the 1st day of September, 1901," and the further condition "that each person or corporation desiring to construct any elevated railroad shall first submit plans and specifications therefor to the board of public works for its approval, and that the construction of such elevated railroads shall be upon plans and specifications approved by said board, and not otherwise."

Under the ordinance in question the railroad companies are authorized and required to construct elevated tracks and roadbeds, and it is provided that such roadbeds and tracks shall be upheld by iron and steel cross-girders, these to be supported by iron and steel posts. The girders are required to be fully 14 feet above the established grade of the streets, and the roadbeds and tracks are to be so elevated as not to interfere with the travel of the public upon the streets. The ordinance goes into detail as to the manner of constructing the elevated tracks, and as to the rights of the companies to construct, maintain, and use telegraph, telephone, and signal service for their own exclusive use along and upon said elevated railroad. It further provides "that the persons or corporations constituting or owning any elevated railroads in pursuance hereof, as well as their lessees, successors, and assigns, shall forever indemnify and save harmless the city of Indianapolis from any and all damages, judgments, decrees, costs, and expenses for which it may be made liable, or which may be recovered against it by reason of its having consented to the construction, maintenance, or operation of such elevated railroad." This ordinance is set out and made a part of the petition and alternative writ. It is further alleged in said writ that after the 1st day of April, 1900, a written demand was made upon the defendant and all railroad companies running trains over the tracks in question, requesting and directing them to proceed with the work of constructing elevated tracks in lieu of the tracks now maintained by them and each of them, but that each and all of said companies have failed and refused to comply with said request and demand; that defendant and all said companies have failed to submit to the board of public works of said city any plan or specifications for the construction of such elevated tracks, but that, on the contrary, the defendant and all of the companies, owning or operating through their duly authorized agents and officers, have given out that it is their purpose to ignore the provisions of said ordinance, and their determination to continue to maintain the said tracks at grade, and to operate over and on the same the trains of cars hereinbefore described. That if said work of elevating the tracks in question, and constructing an elevated railroad in accordance with the provisions of said ordinance, should be commenced at the date of the return of this proceeding, it would have to be prosecuted with extraordinary diligence to complete the same by the 1st of September, 1901. That it is the purpose of the defendant to refuse to take any steps looking to the elevation of the tracks until after September 1, 1901, and then to continue such refusal and contest the validity of said ordinance. That such delay will result in a continued loss of life, and the indefinite continuation of the perils and dangers hereinbefore recited. That the construction of elevated railroads or tracks by said defendant and by said other corporations is the proper and only feasible remedy for the evils and dangers complained of, which will give to the people the free, safe, and unobstructed use of their public streets and thoroughfares for travel, without in any wise interfering with the running of the trains of the said railroad companies, which are necessarily used in the transportation of passengers throughout the country.

An examination of the facts set out in the petition and alternative writ discloses that the relator does not base the right which it seeks to enforce against the appellee upon 60 L. R. A.

the 5th clause of § 5153, Burns's Rev. Stat., of the general law relating to the organization and control of railroad companies, but founds the right which it claims and asserts upon the ordinance adopted by its common council, wherein the crossings as they are maintained are declared to be nuisances. The relator, under the circumstances, then, in maintaining the right which it claims, must stand or fall upon the ordinance which it advances in support of its claim. The question, therefore, with which we have to deal is one relating to the power of the city under the law to adopt the ordinance involved, and thereunder compel appellee to remove the surface tracks of its railroads, and substitute instead thereof a system or series of elevated tracks in the prescribed district over which it must operate or run its cars. Counsel for appellant argue that the ordinance in question is sustained by the police power of the state, which it is said may be exercised directly by the latter, or that it may be delegated by it to municipal corporations. It may be conceded, arguendo, that the authority of the relator herein, if it is invested with such power to require appellee to abolish its grade crossings and elevate the tracks of its roads above the surface of the public streets in order to protect the lives and property of those using the same, rests upon the police power of the state, which the latter through its legislative department may delegate to or confer upon municipal corporations. That this power extends to and may be exercised to protect the lives and property of the people, and also to promote their health and morals, is universally recognized. That the right to exercise this power cannot be bargained or bartered away, either by the state or by any of its governmental subdivisions upon which it has been conferred, is equally well settled. In State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 33 L. R. A. 313, 44 N. E. 469, this court, in speaking in regard to the extent of the police power, said: "The police power of a state is recognized by the courts to be one of wide sweep. It is exercised by the state in order to promote the health, safety, comfort, morals, and welfare of the public. The right to exercise this power is said to be inherent in the people in every free government. It is not a grant, derived from or under any written constitution. It is not, however, without limitation, and it cannot be invoked so as to invade the fundamental rights of a citizen. As a general proposition, it may be asserted that it is the province of the legislature to decide when the exigency exists for the exercise of this power, but as to what are the subjects which come within it is evidently a judicial question."

These well-settled propositions, however, do not solve the question which confronts us in this appeal, for the inquiry still remains, Has the legislature delegated to or conferred upon the relator herein any such power as will authorize that which it seeks to enforce under the ordinance in controversy? Counsel for appellant refer us to § 23 (Burns's Rev. Stat. § 3794) of the act commonly known as the "Charter of the City of Indianapolis." It is claimed that under the several provisions of that section ample power to deal with the problem presented has been conferred upon relator's common council. This section provides that the common council shall have power to enact ordinances for the following purposes:

" . . . To declare what shall constitute a nuisance, to prevent the same, require its abatement, authorize the removal of the same by the proper officers, and provide for the punishment of the person or persons causing, continuing, or suffering the same to exist, and to assess the expenses of its removal against such person or persons, and provide for collecting such expenses either by placing the same on the tax duplicate or by suit. . . . To secure the safety of citizens and others, in the running of trains, in or through such city; to require persons or corporations, owning or operating railroads, to fence their respective railroads, to construct cattle guards, street-crossings, and viaducts, and public roads, and to keep the same in repair and safe condition for persons on foot, in vehicles, or otherwise; to keep flagmen at railroad crossings, and provide protection against injury to persons or property from the operation of said railroads. To authorize and require railroad companies to change the location, grade, and crossings of their respective railroads; to compel them to raise or lower their railroad tracks to conform to any grade which may be established by such ordinance; to compel persons or companies owning or operating railroads to construct bridges, viaducts, or tunnels, and approaches thereto, across their respective railroads or rights of way, at street or alley crossings; to compel railroad companies to make and keep open and in repair ditches, drains, sewers, and culverts, along and under their respective tracks. To compel railroad corporations, or persons owning or operating railroads, to keep gutters and street crossings clean along their right of way. To prohibit the laying of any railroad track across any street or alley or public place without permission first obtained therefor from the department of public works, and to provide for the taking up and removing any track so laid, without notice, and charge the expense thereof against the offending person or corporation. To require any person or company, owning or operating any railroad, to take up and change the location of any railroad track or switch heretofore or hereafter laid within the limits of said city.

It cannot in reason be asserted, from the mere fact that the relator is invested with some of the police power of the state in regard to the running or operating of railroads within its corporate limits, that it necessarily follows, under the circumstances, that it has unlimited power to deal alike with all of appellee's railroad crossings and confine it to the particular or specific method or means of elevated tracks to be constructed by it at all of its crossings, regardless of the existing conditions and circumstances applicable thereto, in order to afford safety or protection to the public.

In regard to the power of the state to confer or delegate the extraordinary authority which the relator under its charter claims to have, we need not discuss nor decide, for that is not the question herein involved.

Under the provisions of § 23, supra, by which the relator is empowered to require railroad companies to change the grade and crossings of their respective roads, and to raise or lower their tracks in order to conform to any grade which may be established by ordinance, certainly the broad and extraordinary power of abolishing grade crossings within the city, and compelling the companies to construct and maintain a system of elevated tracks, as exacted by the ordinance in issue, was not intended or contemplated by the legislature. It appears that, in order to afford protection to the public using the streets of the city, § 23 points out or enumerates some of the means which the city may compel railroad companies to employ for that purpose, among which is mentioned to keep flagmen at their crossings, and to construct bridges, viaducts, or tunnels at street or alley crossings, but there is nothing in the section to indicate that it was the legislative intent to invest relator's common council with the extraordinary power to impose upon railroad companies the duty or obligation of removing their railroad tracks from the surface of the streets, where they were legally authorized to be located, and construct in lieu thereof a series of elevated tracks as contemplated by the ordinance involved over which they must run or operate their cars. Under the plain language of this section there is no room to work out or hold by judicial construction that the legislature intended to confer upon the relator the power, either expressly or impliedly, to compel appellee to employ the particular and specific method, regardless of all others, of elevating its railroad tracks as prescribed by the ordinance. If we entertained a reasonable doubt, which we do not, of relator's being invested with such power, we would be required under such circumstances to solve the doubt against it and deny the existence of the power. Pittsburgh, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Crown Point, 146 Ind. 421, 422, 35 L. R. A. 684, 45 N. E. 587; Bogue v. Bennett, 156 Ind. 478, 480, 481, 60 N. E. 143; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 89; Crawfordsville v. Braden, 130 Ind. 149, 14 L. R. A. 268, 28 N. E. 849; Adams v. Shelbyville, 154 Ind. 467, 49 L. R. A. 797, 57 N. E. 114.

The general rule is well affirmed that municipal corporations derive their powers from the legislature, and, where a power to such corporations is expressly granted or necessarily implied or inferred, it should not be defeated or denied by a stringent judicial construction, but, nevertheless, the proposition that they can do no act for which authority is not expressly granted or may not be reasonably inferred or implied is well settled by the authorities. Kyle v.

Malin, 8 Ind. 34; Smith v. Madison, 7 Ind. 86; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 90.

The power of relator may be conceded, arguendo, either under its charter law or under Burns's Rev. Stat. clause 5 of § 5153, supra, where any particular railroad crossing over its public streets by reason of the peculiar or particular circumstances or conditions thereof can only be made safe for public travel thereover by elevating the tracks of the road, to compel the railroad company to discharge such duty or obligation. But certainly such authority under the existing laws cannot be extended by construction so as to warrant the relator in coercing appellee to construct and maintain a system of elevated tracks for all of its various roads running into and through the city of Indianapolis. The ultimatum presented to appellee by the ordinance in question was to remove the surface tracks of its roads and construct and maintain elevated tracks over all of the crossings in the prescribed district, without regard to the conditions or circumstances of any particular crossing. The same means, without distinction, were to be provided for all crossings, irrespective of circumstances or conditions. This court in Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. State, 158 Ind. 189, 63 N. E. 224, quoted with approval § 1107 of Elliott on Railroads, where the author says: "Each particular crossing presents different conditions, but the general rule . . . is that the company must erect whatever structures are reasonably necessary to the safety and convenience of the traveler using the crossing." The fact that relator's common council under the ordinance in controversy has by its own fiat declared all of the appellee's railroad crossings to be nuisances does not justify the demand that, by reason of such declaration, appellee must remove its surface tracks and construct, instead thereof, a series of elevated ones. The general authority as granted by its charter to declare what shall constitute a nuisance does not empower it to declare anything a nuisance per se which in fact was not recognized as such by the common law. Its common council, under such general grant of power, may, within recognized limits, by ordinance define or declare what things or classes of things may, and under what circumstances or conditions they may become or shall be deemed to, constitute a nuisance, and may prescribe, within the authorized limit, what the penalty shall be upon conviction of the offending party. Certain things by reason of their nature or character are considered by the law a nuisance per se, while on the other hand there are other things which may or may not be a nuisance, their character as such being a question of fact depending on the particular circumstances of the case. Evansville v. Miller, 146 Ind. 613, 38 L. R. A. 161, 45 N. E. 1054; First Nat. Bank v. Sarlls, 129 Ind. 201, 13 L. R. A. 481, 28 N. E. 434; 40 L. R. A.

Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet, 79 Ill. 25; St. Louis v. Edward Heitzberg Packing & Provision Co. 141 Mo. 375, 39 L. R. A. 551, 42 S. W. 954; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 374.

Judge Dillon, in the section cited, in considering the powers of municipal corporations to declare and abate nuisances, properly says: "Such power conferred in general terms cannot be taken to authorize the extrajudicial condemnation and destruction of that as a nuisance which in its nature, situation, or use is not such."

The crossings of appellee's railroads over the public streets of the city were authorized by law, and, if they are so maintained as to become nuisances, that is a question of fact to be judicially determined upon a case properly presented. Counsel for appellant assert that the facts set out in the petition and alternative writ disclose such a condition of affairs as a court cannot afford to tolerate. But it must be remembered that this action is not one to abate a nuisance, but is a suit wherein the extraordinary remedy of mandate is sought, and, in testing the sufficiency of the pleading, consideration must be had only for facts well pleaded, and not for legal conclusions. We have previously shown that in cases of the character of the one at bar the only province of a court is to decide whether, upon the facts alleged in the alternative writ, the relator is entitled to be awarded the specific relief or right demanded. The functions of a court are not of a legislative character, and while the state of affairs, as counsel claim, may possibly be of a very grievous or intolerable nature, nevertheless it is not in our power to declare a law under which the relator may be enabled to secure the relief which it seeks by way of the particular method which it advances and demands for the object or purpose in view. If it has unsuccessfully exercised all of the power in the premises with which it has been invested by the legislature, and believes that the only remedy for the evil complained of is to compel appellee to construct and maintain an elevated railroad within the prescribed territory over which it must run or operate its cars, then it would appear that its appeal should not be to the courts, but to the legislature for a further or additional grant of power under which the vast undertaking upon the part of the appellee as contemplated by the ordinance involved could be enforced.

We have given this case a patient consideration, and have examined all of the authorities cited by appellant, and as a final conclusion we are constrained to adjudge that the relator had not, under the existing laws, the power to adopt the ordinance in question, and therefore is not entitled to the specific relief or right demanded. The demurrer to the alternative writ of mandamus was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

Augusta T. VORSE

v.

NEW JERSEY PLATE-GLASS INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The breaking of a plate-glass window by the explosion of gas generated by the use of gasoline to clean clothes is not caused by the blowing up of the building, within the meaning of an insurance policy thereon which exempts the insurer from loss caused by the blowing up of buildings.
2. Fire is not the cause of the breaking of a window, within the meaning of an insurance policy exempting the insurer from liability for losses which happened by or in consequence of any fire, where the loss was caused by the explosion of gas ignited by a match or light.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy insuring against loss or damage to plate glass. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McVey, McVey, & Graham, for appellant:

The principle that governs the case at bar is laid down by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Scripture v. Lowell Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Cush. 366, 57 Am. Dec. 111, and is that where gunpowder or other inflammable or explosive or expansive substance or material is ignited by the flame of a lamp, match, or any agent, the moving factor of which is fire, and combustion and explosion occur simultaneously, causing the loss, the proximate cause of the loss is fire, and is covered by a fire policy, unless loss by such explosion is especially excepted by the contract.

If a combustible substance in the process of combustion produces explosion, it is not easy to perceive why, of the two diverse, but concurrent, results of the combustion, the one should be ascribed to fire any less than the other.

The combustion of gas is a fire, under a fire policy which does not except loss by explosion.

This case appears to be a pioneer in "plate-glass insurance" litigation.

The words of a policy of insurance are to be considered by the court in the popular sense in which they are used and understood by ordinary people, and not in the sense they would be used. A lighted match coming in contact with gasoline vapor, and "causing an explosion, is not to be considered as 'fire' within the meaning of the policy."

Mitchell v. Potomac Ins. Co. 183 U. S. 42, 46 L. ed. 74, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 42; Boatman's F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Parker, 23 Ohio St. 85, 13 Am. Rep. 228.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is on a policy insuring plaintiff against loss or damage by breakage, through accident, of certain plate glass in a building owned by her in the city of Des Moines. The policy contained these, among other, stipulations: "This company is not liable to make good any losses or damage which may happen by or in consequence of any fire. . . . and is not liable for any losses or damage to glass caused by the blowing up of buildings." During the life of the policy the insured property was broken and destroyed, and the cause thereof, according to the agreed statement of facts on which the case was tried, was as follows: "Third. That the cause of said breakage and destruction in said west storeroom was the explosion of gas generating from gasoline being used in the rear of said room for the purpose of cleaning clothes, which gas was ignited by a match or light in the room, and said explosion was not caused wilfully or by intention on the part of this plaintiff or her tenant; that the said breakage and destruction of the glass and explosion in said west room occurred prior to the fire in said building. Fourth. That on the same day other plate glass in the said building was broken and destroyed as set out in count 2 of plaintiff's petition, as amended and substituted; that said glass was broken by firemen intentionally, and in order to gain access to the building for the purpose of extinguishing a fire which was then burning in the said storeroom; that the doors were fastened, and it was necessary to break in the front of the building for the purpose of gaining admission to put out the fire." During the trial the plaintiff withdrew the second count of her petition; hence we have nothing to consider but the statements above made as to how the damage occurred.

Defendant contends that the damage was caused by the "blowing up" of the building. These words should be given their ordinary signification, in arriving at the intent of the parties; and we think, when defined in this light, and applied to the agreed facts which we have quoted, that it does not sufficiently appear that the building was blown up. Ordinarily the term means to scatter or destroy by an explosion of some kind. When we speak of a building as having been blown up, we ordinarily intend to convey the notion that its constituent parts have been scattered, and the integrity of the structure destroyed. This is evidently what is meant by the terms employed in the policy now before us. In any event, the policy, if susceptible of two constructions, should be given that one which is most favorable to the insured. Collins v. Merchants' & B. Mut. Ins. Co. 95 Iowa, 540, 64 N. W. 602; Goodwin v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Asso. 97 Iowa, 226, 32 L. R. A. 473, 66 N. W. 157. With this rule in mind, we have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the breakage was not due to the blowing up of the building. See, as supporting these conclusions, Breuner v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 51 Cal. 101, 21 Am. Rep. 703.

The next contention made by defendant is much more difficult of satisfactory solution. It is argued that the damage to the glass happened by, or was in consequence of, fire. The real point made is that the explosion was due to, or was in consequence of, fire, if not fire itself. The term "explosion" has no fixed and definite meaning either in ordinary speech or in law. It may be described, in a general way, as sudden and rapid combustion, causing violent expansion of the air, and accompanied by a report. It may and does vary in degrees of intensity and in the vehemence of the report, and it is not always due to the presence of fire. Indeed, it may result from decomposition or chemical action. In the case before us, it was undoubtedly caused by fire, or, as stated in the agreed statement of facts, "by a match or light in the room," which transformed the gasoline gas into heat, which was propagated from one particle of air to another, and finally against the glass, the shock of which caused the breakage complained of. The stipulation says that the breakage and explosion occurred prior to the fire in the building, which, we assume, means that the glass was broken before any part of the structure, or of the goods stored therein, were ignited, for it is clear that there must have been a match or light in the room, which caused the explosion. Did the breakage, then, happen by, or was it in consequence of, any fire? The question is a nice one, and by no means free from doubt; but we are inclined to the view that the loss here did not happen by, nor was in consequence of, any fire, as those terms are used in the policy in suit. Of course, but for the lighted match, or other light in the room, the explosion would not have happened, and the explosion itself was due to rapid combustion. But in ordinary parlance the damage was due to the explosion, or to the concussion produced thereby, or, as said in the agreed statement of facts, the explosion and breakage occurred prior to the fire in the building. The lighted match, or other light in the building, was not contemplated by the parties as the fire which was excepted by the terms of the policy. It was not a destructive fire, against the immediate effects of which the condition in the policy was intended as a protection. It was, it is true, the possible means of putting the destructive force in motion, but was not the excepted peril. Had there been no fire after the explosion, it seems to us it could not fairly be claimed that the damage done the glass was due to, or in consequence of, any fire. The immediate cause of the breakage was concussion produced by the ignition of gas, it is true; but that such an effect was due to or in consequence of fire, as that term is ordinarily used, or as the parties intended it in this case, is hardly supposable. In Wood, Ins. vol. 1, 2d ed. p. 245, it is said: "Where, however, the explosion is caused by fire, the damage must be traceable directly to the fire, as the proximate cause, and not merely as the result of the explosion. The fire must be shown to be the causa proxima, and not the causa remota. If the injury is entirely due to concussion, the fact that it was caused by fire does not make the fire the proximate cause, but the cause of the cause; and consequently the causa remota, instead of the causa proxima. 'It were infinite for the law,' says Lord Bacon, 'to consider the causes of the causes, and their impulsion one of another. Therefore it contenteth itself with the immediate cause, and judgeth of acts by that, without looking to any further degree.' 'If that were not so,' said Byles, J., 'and a ship was in the neighborhood of Ætna or Vesuvius, and was violently shaken by an eruption, that would be damage by fire; or if a gun were fired off, loaded with small shot, among crockery, that would be damage by fire; or it might be said that, if the heat of the sun was too great, that would be damage by fire." Policies of insurance should not have a technical construction for the purpose of defeating the insured. He has nothing to do with the wording of the policy, and must accept it as tendered. Hence the rule of construction hitherto quoted. Indeed, we think language such as that on which defendant relies should be given its ordinary and common signification, and not its scientific and technical meaning. The insured went to the company for a policy of insurance on the plate glass in her building, and received a policy providing indemnity for breakage not caused by, nor in consequence of, any fire. She had the right to assume that the policy covered damage by an explosion, such as the one in question, and was not called upon to go to some scientist for a technical definition of fire. After all, the question is, What would an ordinary man understand from the use of the term? Would such a person, having no technical information on the subject, understand that a gasoline explosion, caused by a lighted match, was a fire, in the absence of proof that something aside from the gas was ignited? We think not. At any rate, the trial judge was authorized to find the negative of this proposition. We cannot too strongly emphasize the thought that the match or other light referred to in the agreed statement of facts was not a fire, within the meaning of the condition of the policy now under consideration. See United Life F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Foote, 22 Ohio St. 340, 10 Am. Rep. 735; Transatlantic F. Ins. Co. v. Dorsey, 56 Md. 70, 40 Am. Rep. 403; Briggs v. North American & M. Ins. Co. 53 N. Y. 446. If, then, the lighted match, or other fire which caused the explosion, was not a fire, within the condition of the policy, and there was no ignition of the building, or of the goods stored therein, which caused the breakage, but all damage was done before the fire was started, as stated in the agreed statement of facts, then it is clear that plaintiff had a right to recover, and that the district court was correct in its holding. The parties themselves have distinguished the explosion from the fire in their agreed statements of facts, from which we have quoted. Giving the language used in the policy its ordinary signification, and applying it to the agreed statement of facts, we think the damage did not happen by, nor in consequence of, any fire. See, as further supporting our conclusions, Everett v. London Assurance, 19 C. B. N. S. 126; Mitchell v. Potomac Ins. Co. 183 U. S. 42, 46 L. ed. 74, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 42; Kenniston v. Merrimack County Mut. Ins. Co. 14 N. H. 341, 40 Am. Dec. 193; Dous v. Merchants' Ins. Co. 127 Mass. 346; Millaudon v. New Orleans Ins. Co. 4 La. Ann. 15, 50 Am. Dec. 550; Transatlantic F. Ins. Co. v. Dorsey, 56 Md. 79, 40 Am. Rep. 403; Louisville Underwriters v. Durland, 123 60 L. R. A.

Ind. 544, 7 L. R. A. 399, 24 N. E. 221; Boatman's F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Parker, 23 Ohio St. 85, 13 Am. Rep. 228; Commercial Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 64 Ill. 265, 16 Am. Rep. 557; Caballero v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. 15 La. Ann. 217.

We must take notice, it is said in argument, of the fact that the condition in the policy in suit exempting the company from liability for fire was for the purpose of avoiding double insurance, and that, if the property was destroyed by fire, it was covered by the fire policy on the building, of which the plate glass was a part. Conceding the rule, the conclusion by no means follows. If we are to consider these matters, we are also justified in assuming that the fire policy, if there was one, on the property, contained the usual stipulation exempting the company from liability for losses occasioned by explosions. It is well known that policies of insurance usually contain such exceptions. See standard forms in the states of Michigan, Minnesota, New Jersey, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, as set forth in the appendix to Clement, Fire Insurance Digest; also at page 8 of table of contents. With such an exception in a fire policy, it is manifest that it would not cover such a loss as happened in this case.

Keeping in mind the fact that the language of a policy of insurance is to be given its ordinary and popular signification, rather than its technical meaning, and that, when capable of two constructions, it is to be given that which is most favorable to the insured, we reach the satisfactory conclusion that, under the agreed statement of facts in this case, the defendant is liable for the breakage.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in an action to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Action to quiet title. Plaintiff, who is a minor, suing by his father, James C. Daily, as his next friend, brings this action to quiet title to 40 acres of land, against the defendants, who are the heirs at law of John Cochrane, deceased, who during his lifetime was the owner of the land. The defendants deny plaintiff's title; and C. A. Minnick, the husband of one of the heirs of Cochrane, who was also made a defendant, by cross petition asks to have title to an undivided interest in the property quieted in him, claiming to be the owner thereof by conveyances from the several heirs. The trial court quieted title in the plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Messrs. Kinkhead, Mentzer, & Granger, for appellants:

The burden of proof is upon plaintiff.

Equity, as well as law, contemplates that all contracts relating to real estate shall be evidenced by some writing signed by the party to be charged; and, when it is sought to bring a case within any of the exceptions allowed, to avoid the operation of the statute, the court should never be left to conjectures, or upon proofs loose and indeterminate in their character.

In order to take this contract out of the statute by payment of the purchase money, in whole or in part, it was necessary that some writing evidencing the payment of said obligation, and signed by plaintiff, should have been delivered to Cochrane. In the absence of such written evidence the contract was nudum pactum.

Gorman v. Brossard, 120 Mich. 611, 79 N. W. 903; Brown v. Wade, 42 Iowa, 647; Brabin v. Hyde, 32 N. Y. 519.

The consideration of surrendering to Cochrane the right to name said child could not have passed in reliance upon Cochrane's promise to convey this particular 40, because it is admitted that at that time he did not agree to convey the 40 in controversy.

and, unless plaintiff has established the fact by clear and unequivocal evidence that he has taken and held exclusive possession of said land and made permanent improvements thereon upon the faith of such oral contract, this court cannot aid him by decreeing specific performance.

Though the contract may have been so indefinite as to the land as to be incapable of enforcement at the time of the payment of the consideration, still, if it was afterwards, by the acts of the parties, or performance, made certain and definite, specific performance will lie. And it is sufficient if the contract is thus made certain and definite at any time before the commencement of the action.

Whether the conveyance be a quitclaim or not, is dependent upon the intent of the parties to it, as that intent appears from the language of the instrument itself. If the deed purports, and is intended, to convey only the right, title, and interest in the land, as distinguished from the land itself, it comes within the strict sense of a quitclaim deed, and will not sustain the defense of an innocent purchaser. If it appears that it was the intention to convey the land itself, then it is not such quitclaim deed, although it may possess characteristics peculiar to such deeds.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff's claim of title to the land is based upon an alleged agreement between his parents and John Cochrane, during his lifetime, whereby he, the said Cochrane, orally promised that, if they would name the plaintiff (then a small infant) after him (Cochrane), he would give the child 40 acres of land. No particular 40 acres was named, nor did Cochrane own the land now claimed by the plaintiff at the time the promise was made; but it is contended that he subsequently purchased the subject-matter of the litigation for the plaintiff, taking title thereto, however, in his own name, and that ever thereafter he, by acts and declarations, recognized the tract as the property of plaintiff, and gave the possession thereof to the father to hold for him (plaintiff). Bearing on this last proposition, it appears from the evidence that James C. Daily, the father of plaintiff, had lived with Cochrane, as a member of his family, from childhood until his marriage, and that for some time thereafter he and his wife continued to reside with Cochrane, who in the meantime had become a widower. He was treated by Cochrane as a son, and after his marriage had largely the control of Cochrane's business affairs; acting with him in carrying on the farm on which they lived, in making contracts for him, and otherwise acting as his agent and assistant. James C. Daily suggested to Cochrane the purchase of the 40 acres in question as a suitable tract to be used in performance of the original agreement to give plaintiff 40 acres of land for his name, but the purchase was made by Cochrane in his own way and with his own money, and the title was taken in his name. Subsequently he discussed with James C. Daily the management of this 40-acre tract, permitted him to cut timber therefrom and to raise crops thereon, and from time to time declared to others that he intended the tract 60 L. R. A.

for the plaintiff; saying that he would deed it to him when the latter was old enough, but would not give it to plaintiff's father, for fear he would squander it. Daily not only cut timber and raised crops upon the land, but he also opened a coal bank thereon, cleared it, and dug a well thereon. Cochrane built a house upon the land with Daily's consent, which was occupied for a time, at least, by Cochrane's brother-in-law. The declarations made by Cochrane generally related, it is true, to an intent to give the land to plaintiff in the future, but it is clear to our minds that they amounted to a recognition of the contract, and a designation of the land intended to be conveyed in fulfillment thereof. It is suggested that all of these matters may have had reference to some other arrangement between Cochrane and plaintiff's father, but this is purely speculative, for no other arrangements or agreements are shown.

The promise to convey the land was oral, and is clearly within the statute of frauds, unless it be shown that there has been part performance, or payment of the purchase price, or a part thereof, as provided in §§ 4625 and 4626 of the Code. That the privilege of naming a child is a valid and legal consideration for a promise is well established by all the authorities. See Eaton v. Libbey, 165 Mass. 218, 42 N. E. 1127; Wolford v. Powers, 85 Ind. 297, 44 Am. Rep. 16; Parks v. Francis, 50 Vt. 626, 28 Am. Rep. 517; Nightingale v. Withington, 15 Mass. 272, 8 Am. Dec. 101. In making such contracts, parents act as the natural guardians of the child, and are presumed to act for its interest. The child was named according to the agreement, and plaintiff has continued to bear the name down to the present, and by the bringing of this suit has ratified the contract made by his parents. Moreover, there was such a privity between plaintiff and the promisee that he (the plaintiff) may enforce the contract, although not made directly by him. Dutton v. Poole, 2 Lev. 210; Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 193, 47 Am. Rep. 20; Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195.

But it is said that at the time the contract was made it was so uncertain and indefinite that it cannot be enforced, that no particular tract was designated at the time the contract was entered into, and that therefore it is void. The mere fact that Cochrane did not then own the land which he agreed to convey to plaintiff is not controlling. One may agree to procure land for another, or to sell land which he does not own; and the question is not whether or not the contract was uncertain when executed, but, May a court of equity put its finger on the subject-matter of the contract when it is called upon to act? Thompson v. Myrick, 20 Minn. 205, Gil. 184; Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 407; Allerton v. Johnson, 3 Sandf. Ch. 72; East v. Cayuga Lake Ice Line, 50 N. Y. S. R. 362, 21 N. Y. Supp. 887; Collins v. Vandever, 1 Iowa, 573; Ottumwa, O. F. & St. P. R. Co. v. McWilliams, 71 Iowa, 164, 32 N. W. 315. It goes without saying that if the contract be so uncertain as to subject-matter, when executed, that the court cannot identify it in the light of admissible extrinsic evidence, and it so remains at the time action is brought, it cannot be enforced, or, as some of the authorities put it, it is void. But ambiguity or uncertainty may be removed by the acts, conduct, declarations, or agreements of the parties. Wallace v. Ryan, 93 Iowa, 115, 61 N. W. 395. In other words, an uncertain agreement may be so supplemented by subsequent acts, agreements, or declarations of the parties as to make it certain and enforceable. Alabama G. S. R. Co. So. 286; Stone v. Clark, 1 Met. 378, 35 Am. Dec. 370; Lovejoy v. Lovett, 124 Mass. 270. Cochrane's declaration in this case as to the land he intended to convey to the plaintiff in fulfilment of his promise was both a construction and an execution of his contract, and cleared the agreement of all uncertainty. South & North Ala. R. Co. 84 Ala. 570, 3 theretofore existing. It is fundamental that the acts of practical construction placed upon a contract by the parties thereto are binding, and may be resorted to to relieve it from doubt and uncertainty. Kelley v. Andrews, 102 Iowa, 119, 71 N. W. 251. This is simply an extension of the maxim, Id certum est quod certum, etc. The case is not different from that of a lease to one for so many years as he shall name. In such a case although the term is at present uncertain, yet when the lessee names the term it is then reduced to a certainty. Broom, Legal Maxims, *599. So if A should give B money with which to purchase unidentified land, and B should make a purchase, and thereafter say, "This is the land I purchased for you," equity would compel him to make conveyance thereof to A.

These illustrations simply confirm the principle which should be applied to the case now before us. But another aspect of the case is even more conclusive than the one we are now considering. Plaintiff's parents at the request of Cochrane named him (plaintiff) after Cochrane. Thereafter, and in consideration therefor, Cochrane agreed to give plaintiff a certain definite 40 acres of land. This is the effect of the transaction between these parties if we treat the original contract as void for uncertainty. Defendant received the benefit of the name, and the parents parted with the right to give the child such name as they might choose. This, as has been seen, is a valuable consideration. At the time Cochrane agreed to give the child 40 acres of land, but the contract was invalid because of uncertainty of the subject-matter. Thereafter Cochrane agreed to give the child a certain and definite 40 acres, pursuant to his original promise, and because of the consideration passing at that time. Is such a contract valid? The authorities furnish no uncertain answer to this proposition. It is quite generally held that a mere moral obligation is not sufficient consideration to support a subsequent promise, but it is as generally held that a past legal consideration, especially where the past consideration was based upon a previous request, or a new promise when the original is in violation of the statute of frauds, or otherwise illegal, when the illegality is not based upon public policy or positive statute, is sufficient. Indeed, there seems to be no dissent from this doctrine. Boothe v. Fitzpatrick, 36 Vt. 681; Jilson v. Gilbert, 26 Wis. 637, 7 Am. Rep. 100; Silverthorn v. Wyllie, 96 Wis. 69, 71 N. W. 107; Pool v. Horner, 64 Md. 131, 20 Atl. 1036, and authorities collected in an excellent note found in Trimble v. Rudy (Ky.) 53 L. R. A. 353.

This view of the case seems to settle the validity of the contract, unless it be for the statute of frauds, which requires contracts relating to an interest in lands to be in writing. That the contract is unenforceable under this statute is certain, unless it be found that the purchase money, or some part thereof, has been paid, or that possession of the property was taken by the vendee, with the consent of the vendor, under the exceptions to that statute found in § 4626 of the Code. These exceptions did not prevail at common law; hence authorities from other states do not give us much light on the question at issue, and are likely to be misleading. At common law, payment of the consideration was not regarded as part performance, so as to take the case out of the statute. Browne, Stat. Fr. § 463; Puterbaugh v. Puterbaugh, 131 Ind. 288, 15 L. R. A. 341, 30 N. E. 519; Townsend v. Houston, 1 Harr. (Del.) 532, 27 Am. Dec. 745, and cases cited. The reason for this was that nothing was regarded which did not put the party performing in such a position that a fraud would be allowed to be practised upon him if the contract was not enforced. The money or the purchase price could be recovered back, and the parties thus restored to their original position. This rule has not received universal assent in this country. Rhodes v. Rhodes, 3 Sandf. Ch. 279. It fully explains the holding, however, in Maddison v. Alderson, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 467; Ellis v. Carey, 74 Wis. 176, 4 L. R. A. 55, 42 N. W. 252; and other like cases. In this state and in Delaware, however, the statute, in express terms, makes an exception where the purchase money, or any part thereof, has been paid. It then becomes important to determine what is meant by "purchase money." That has been settled by numerous previous decisions of this court. Thus, in Devlin v. Himer, 29 Iowa, 297, it is held that such term means the consideration received, in whatever form it may exist. See also Mitchell v. Colby, 95 Iowa, 202, 63 N. W. 769. In many cases the performance of services has been held to be the payment of the purchase price. Bonnon v. Urton, 3 G. Greene, 228; Stem v. Nysonger, 69 Iowa, 512, 29 N. W. 433; Franklin v. Tuckerman, 68 Iowa, 572, 27 N. W. 759, and cases cited. The cancellation of a pre-existing indebtedness has also been held to be part payment. Peake v. Conlan, 43 Iowa, 297. At common law neither marriage nor the performance of services was sufficient to take the case out of the statute. Wallace v. Long, 105 Ind. 522, 55 Am. Rep. 222, 5 N. E. 666; Peek v. Peek, 77 Cal. 106, 1 L. R. A. 185, 19 Pac. 227;

Ducie v. Ford, 8 Mont. 233, 19 Pac. 414; Maddison v. Alderson, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 467. When it is conceded that the contract between plaintiff's father and Cochrane is supported by a sufficient consideration, whether past or present, it follows that Cochrane has received that consideration, and the agreement, by the express language of the statute, is enforceable. The consideration has been paid. But it is said that the consideration had no reference to this particular tract of land, because Cochrane did not own it when he made the promise. We have seen that whatever of ambiguity or uncertainty there may have been in the contract when first made was rectified by the parties, who thereafter fixed and identified the tract intended to be conveyed. That this was more than two years after the child was named is unimportant, for, under our own cases, uncertainty in the original contract may be cured at any time before attempt is made to enforce it. See cases heretofore cited, and particularly Collins v. Vandever. This latter case also answers the suggestion that there was no mutuality in the contract. It is therefore entirely immaterial whether we say that what the parties did after the naming of the child made that certain which was theretofore uncertain, or that it amounted to a new contract, based upon a past legal consideration. If the former, the designation of the land related back to the making of the original agreement, and the land is thus identified; and, if the latter, the consideration, being past, was treated by Cochrane as a present and continuing one, and it is so connected with the land in question that the objects and purposes of the statute are as fully conserved as if the consideration had been so much money received by Cochrane, or was past services rendered at his request, and for which he agreed to convey the land. When part payment of the consideration is relied upon alone as taking a case out of the statute, the identification of the land must always rest in parol, and it is no objection to the enforcement of the contract that there is nothing in the act performed which serves to identify the land. Under common-law rules, as modified by equitable exceptions, which were introduced for the purpose of preventing the statute from becoming an instrument of fraud, appellants' contention would undoubtedly be sound, and the authorities relied upon by them in point. But under our statutory exceptions the rule is so much broader that the cases on which they rely are not controlling. Counsel practically concede in argument that the contract, if valid, is not within the statute, and we may well accept their concession, in view of the provisions of our statute. The parties, by agreement, brought consideration and subject-matter together, and, if the consideration was paid, there was no necessity for any writing. The uncertainty of the subject-matter does not in any manner affect the consideration, nor cancel the legal obligation Cochrane was under in virtue of the child's having been named for him, at his request. Should we treat the contract as void for uncertainty, there was nevertheless a legal obligation on the part of Cochrane, which was a sufficient consideration for his subsequent promise; and, when he agreed to give a certain tract of land in satisfaction of that obligation, he as surely received the consideration as if plaintiff's father had canceled a debt which he held against him. This latter, as has been seen, is sufficient to take a case out of the statute. In Palmer v. Albee, 50 Iowa, 429, there was no attempt to show that the parties had subsequently agreed upon the land, which was described with such uncertainty that it could not be identified. The case was decided upon a demurrer to the petition, and it is clear that the description was so uncertain that a court of equity could not enforce it. Moreover, there was no subsequent promise, as in this case. If it be said that the contract, as originally made, was void for uncertainty, this did not relieve Cochrane of an obligation on his part. Keener, Quasi Contracts, pp. 326 et seq. He had received the benefits of the contract, and, when he thereafter agreed to give the land in satisfaction of this obligation, he made a valid and binding contract, based upon an adequate consideration received by him. The law will not attempt to measure the benefits received by him in the perpetuation of his name. He said it was worth the 40 acres of land, and courts should accept him at his word. In many states, equity has specifically enforced parol contracts made in consideration of services performed, which were not in writing, in the absence of a statute such as our own. Carney v. Carney, 95 Mo. 353, 8 S. W. 729; Warren v. Warren, 106 Ill. 568; Lester v. Lester, 28 Gratt. 737; Hinkle v. Hinkle, 55 Ark. 583, 18 S. W. 1049. But other courts have refused to enforce them. Our statute was undoubtedly passed to settle this proposition; and there is no doubt, under our decisions, that performance of services, like the payment of money, is alone sufficient, in itself, to take a case out of the statute of frauds.

These views seem to dispose of the case, but the writer and perhaps some other members of the court are satisfied, not only that the case is taken out of the statute by reason of the payment of the purchase price, but for the further reason that plaintiff's father took possession of the land under the contract with the express consent of Cochrane, held it, made improvements thereon, and otherwise treated it as belonging to his son, for nearly the whole time after it was purchased, down to the time of the commencement of this action. This, with payment of the purchase price, would, under all the authorities, take the case out of the statute. There is no other ground on which to account for the conduct of the parties, unless, we indulge in surmises which to my mind are not justified by the evidence. It is cold comfort to say to the plaintiff in this case that, while Cochrane's obligation to him has not been extinguished, he cannot have the land which was purchased for him, but must sue someone for damages, or, rather, for benefits conferred, in taking Cochrane's name. The measure of damages in such a case would be rather difficult to estimate. This is another reason for enforcing the contract. Of course, if it is clearly within the statute, or is so uncertain that it should not be enforced, these equitable considerations must stand aside. There is, however, no tenable objection to the enforcement of the contract.

The trial court saw and heard the witnesses, and was in a better position than we to weigh their evidence, and it is some consolation to know that its conclusion as to the facts coincides with the finding herein made.

The decree is right, and it is affirmed.

McClain, J., dissenting:

Two propositions of law are announced in the majority opinion to which I cannot give assent, to wit: First, that a contract to convey land can be modified by subsequent parol agreement so as to apply to land not covered by or contemplated in the original contract, there being no payment of purchase price or taking of possession which has reference to such subsequent agreement; second, that an oral agreement to convey land on a past consideration is not within the statute of frauds.

It is elementary that a contract so indefinite as to subject-matter that it is impossible to determine to what the agreement of the contracting parties relates, or to know that as to the matter under consideration there was a meeting of the minds of such parties, is void for uncertainty and of no effect. Church v. Noble, 24 Ill. 291; Atkins v. Van Buren School Twp. 77 Ind. 447; Thomson v. Gortner, 73 Md. 474, 21 Atl. 371; Wainwright v. Straub, 15 Vt. 215, 40 Am. Dec. 675; Erwin v. Erwin, 25 Ala. 236; Cole v. Clark, 3 Pinney (Wis.) 303; Guthing v. Lynn, 2 Barn. & Ad. 232. Pertinent quotations might be made from many of these cases, but it is sufficient here to cite them. That the expression "40 acres of land," without other designation, described nothing to which the alleged agreement in connection with the naming of plaintiff could be considered as having relation, is clear. 40-acre tracts of land — even agricultural land — cannot be regarded as interchangeable. Would it have been competent for plaintiff's father to have selected and demanded under the agreement any one of the various tracts containing 40 acres which he might select out of the land owned by Cochrane when his promise was made,—for instance, the 40 on which his farm buildings were situated? On the other hand, could Cochrane have properly tendered the poorest 40-acre tract he owned? It is plain that, until the parties attempted to agree further as to the specific land which was to pass, there was no agreement for conveyance which could have been enforced in behalf of plaintiff. The majority say, Id certum est quod certum reddi potest; but I had supposed that this maxim related solely to the establishment of a pre-existing valid contract, and not to the creation of a new contract; that is, that it applied only when the parties had indicated and agreed upon some means by which the uncertainty might be removed, or the evidence tended to show the understanding of the parties when the contract was made. It is true that subsequent acts of the parties to a contract may be shown for the purpose of construction in the case of a latent ambiguity, and that is the rule supported by the cases which the majority cite. Such evidence is not received for the purpose of showing a new agreement. If any of the cases cited go beyond this, they clearly, as it seems to me, go beyond reason and the weight of authority. Undoubtedly the parties to a valid contract may by mutual agreement change it, and become bound by a subsequent agreement based upon the consideration of mutual relinquishment of rights under the previous agreement; but how can there be any such relinquishment in consideration of the new agreement if the first agreement was so indefinite as to confer no rights? Undoubtedly, also, if one party to the contract which is void for uncertainty has parted with a consideration, he may recover back its value; and I should not object to an allowance to plaintiff, as against Cochrane's estate, in a proper proceeding, of the money value of any detriment he suffered or any advantage Cochrane gained by the affixing to plaintiff of Cochrane's name as a Christian name. Until there was a new agreement, this was the measure of plaintiff's right. I might further admit, for the sake of argument, that the parties could subsequently agree upon the conveyance of this particular 40-acre tract in extinguishment of the indefinite claim arising to plaintiff from the transaction, provided the agreement was reduced to writing or possession was given as contemplated by the statute of frauds. In other words, if, in view of plaintiff's having been named for Cochrane with the understanding that he was to have some pecuniary benefit, Cochrane should subsequently have agreed to give plaintiff $10,000. I will admit for present purposes that such subsequent agreement was based on a valid consideration; but the fact that the intention to make a pecuniary return for the name was indicated by the expression of an intention to give him 40 acres of land would not make the case any stronger. The fundamental difficulty is that the statute of frauds requires that an agreement to convey lands shall be in writing, even though there is a valid consideration; and the question here is whether or not in this case the subsequent agreement to convey specific land was taken out of the statute of frauds, for it seems to me perfectly clear that, whether the contract itself is void because not made in contemplation of any specific land, or whether it refers to specific land, and the attempt is subsequently made to substitute other land than that originally intended, any substitution or new agreement must be in writing, or taken out of the statute by some exception. See Alabama Mineral Land Co. v. Jackson, 121 Ala. 172, 25 So. 709. Will it do to say that, under a valid contract to convey particular land, the parties may by subsequent oral agreement, without any new payment of purchase price and without any changing of possession, substitute wholly different land from that intended when the first contract was made?

We reach, then, the second proposition of the majority opinion,—that a past and wholly executed consideration, having at the time of its execution no relation to the agreement subsequently sought to be supported by it, is a sufficient “payment of the purchase price” to take the contract out of our statute of frauds as to contracts for the conveyance of lands. If this proposition is sound, then there can hardly be any imaginable contract to convey, which has a sufficient consideration to support it, that will not be within the statutory exception. Any relinquishment of a claim or advantage, no matter how vague or indefinite, and established by parol evidence alone, will justify the introduction of parol evidence of an agreement to convey. And why stop here? Is not an oral and binding agreement to pay in the future just as much the payment of the purchase price, by way of furnishing a consideration, as an oral agreement to release a claim? It may be the legislature ought to repeal the statute of frauds as to contracts to convey land, and allow such agreements, based on considerations, executed without reference to the contract, to be established by parol evidence, but I am not yet willing to do this by judicial legislation. The construction of the words “payment of the purchase price” for which I contend is payment of the price or execution of the consideration, whatever it may be, with direct reference to and in reliance on the very parol agreement to convey which is sought to be enforced. As the majority aptly say, there are very few authorities on the precise question, because the exception found in our statute is not in the statute of frauds as enacted in England, or in most of the states of this Union, and goes further than that of part performance recognized by courts of equity. But for this very reason I think it should not be extended beyond the meaning plainly indicated by the language used. It is said that it is not the policy of courts of equity to enlarge the exceptions to the statute of frauds (Webster v. Gray, 37 Mich. 37), and I think it is equally impolitic for courts of law to extend them by unreasonable interpretation. The construction for which I contend, which would limit “payment of the purchase price” to something done in reliance upon the specific agreement to convey which is sought to be brought within the exception, is supported by the reasoning in the following cases: Ellis v. Cary, 74 Wis. 176, 4 L. R. A. 55, 42 N. W. 252; Atlee v. Bartholomew, 69 Wis. 43, 33 N. W. 110; Maddison v. Alderson, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 467. The majority cite many cases in regard to the sufficiency of a past consideration to support a contract, but none of them relate to past consideration as constituting “payment of the purchase price,” or similar expressions used with reference to the provisions of the statute of frauds in relation to the conveyance of land.

If the affirmance were based solely on the ground that the evidence shows the taking of possession and making of improvements by James C. Daily, I should not dissent, though I am satisfied that such evidence does not clearly and satisfactorily establish (as it should do in order to bring the case within the exception of taking and holding possession with the actual or implied consent of the vendor, as recognized by Code, § 4626) that possession was ever taken by James C. Daily or improvements made by him under the alleged contract. Lich v. Lich, 81 Iowa, 84, 46 N. W. 763; Benedict v. Bird, 103 Iowa, 612, 72 N. W. 768; Mahana v. Blunt, 20 Iowa, 142; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Michigan C. R. Co. 86 Fed. 840.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

W. E. MATTHEWS.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Only what a passenger takes with him for his own personal use and convenience is within the meaning of a statute requiring carriers to check baggage.
2. A carrier may assume liability for merchandise delivered to it by a passenger, equal to that which is imposed upon it in case of baggage, by accepting it for transportation as baggage, with knowledge of its character.

3. Notice to the carrier that a package delivered to it for transportation as baggage contains articles which are not such is not imputed by the fact that the passenger pays a charge for excessive rate.
4. A traveling salesman who is responsible to his employer for the loss or damage to samples in his possession has such an interest in them that, in case they are checked as baggage by a railroad company, and injured in transportation, he may maintain an action to recover for the injury.

NOTE.—For other cases in this series as to liability of carrier in transporting merchandise of traveling salesman as baggage, see Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Higdon (Ala.) 14 L. R. A. 515, and note; Kansas City, P. & G. R. Co. v. State (Ark.) 41 L. R. A. 338; and Trimble v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 48 L. R. A. 115.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hickman County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injury to the contents of a trunk, sustained while in defendant's possession for transportation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. P. Moss, Firtle & Trabue, and J. M. Dickinson, for appellant:

A passenger has no right to carry other people's goods at the risk of the carrier.

Dunlop v. International S. B. Co. 98 Mass. 371; Mississippi C. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 41 Miss. 671; Pettigrew v. Barnum, 11 Md. 449, 69 Am. Dec. 212; Doyle v. Kiser, 6 Ind. 242; Pardee v. Drew, 25 Wend. 460.

Merchandise is not baggage, except sometimes drummer's samples.

Humphreys v. Perry, 148 U. S. 647, 37 L. ed. 595, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 711.

Mr. J. W. Bennett for appellee.

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee was a traveling salesman or drummer for certain wholesale dealers in dental instruments. He bought a ticket and took passage on one of appellant's trains, and had his trunk checked for transmission by that train to his point of destination. The trunk was heavier than was allowed as free baggage to one passenger, and appellee was required to and did pay 60 cents extra as overweight charges. The trunk contained about $1,700 worth of dental goods—steel instruments, presumably. These goods were used, not only as samples by which other goods of a like quality were sold for future shipment, but they were sold from the stock in custody of appellee, and then delivered by him to the customers, if they so desired. The goods belonged to appellee's employers, the wholesalers. While the trunk was in appellant's possession it got wet, and the instruments were damaged by rust, it is claimed, to the extent of about $500. There was evidence for appellee that when the trunk was being loaded on the train the person handling it (whether a porter, roustabout, or baggage master, or whether connected with the railroad he did not know) remarked as to its extraordinary weight, and that appellee replied that it contained dental instruments. For appellants, its baggage master at the station at which the trunk was checked and shipped testified that he was in sole charge of the checking of baggage at that station, and that he was not apprised of the nature of the contents of the trunk; but that it was customary with that road to ship drummers' sample trunks as baggage. The cause of the damage, and the extent of it, do not seem to be controverted by the proof. On this state of case the court gave the jury the following instructions: "No. 1. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence the defendant, while the plaintiffs' trunks were in its custody, left them exposed to rain, and that said trunks or contents became wet, and thereby damaged, they should find for the plaintiffs the actual damages which said trunks or merchandise therein sustained by reason of such injury, not exceeding the sum set out therefor in the petition. No. 2. If the jury believe from the evidence the plaintiffs' trunk, while in the custody and care of the defendant, was bursted or torn in 60 L. R. A.

handling, through the negligence or carelessness of the defendant's agents or servants, and that it was thereby damaged, they will find for the plaintiffs such damages as they sustained for this injury to their trunks, not exceeding the sum claimed therefor in the petition." Appellant asked for this instruction, which was refused: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the trunks shipped by plaintiff contained merchandise which he was carrying for sale, and said merchandise was checked as baggage on the passenger cars by defendant, and at the time of said shipment plaintiff failed to make known to the agent of defendant who checked said baggage, or other agent authorized to ship and have said baggage checked and shipped on its passenger trains, the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find." From a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for $531.50 damages, this appeal is prosecuted.

The first instruction given to the jury assumes, as a matter of law, that the common carrier is accountable, under its liability as carrier, for all damage to the contents of trunks shipped as baggage, without reference to the nature or ownership of such contents, and regardless of the carrier's knowledge or notice or agreement as to such contents. The second instruction is not questioned on this appeal. The only legislation in this state on the subject of baggage is that found in Ky. Stat. § 783, as follows: "Every company shall furnish sufficient accommodation for the transportation of all such passengers and property as shall, within a reasonable time previous thereto, offer, or be offered, for transportation, at places established by the corporation for receiving and discharging passengers and freight, and shall, when requested, check every parcel of baggage taken for transportation, if there is a handle, loop, or fixture, so that the same can be attached, and shall give to the person delivering such baggage a check for the same." We are thus left to determine what is meant by the term "baggage" by reference to the common law. A very considerable number of adjudications have been rendered on this subject, as might naturally be expected. From them it may be stated that the word "baggage," as used in the connection under discussion, refers only to what the passenger takes with him for his own personal use and convenience, and which he has committed to the care of the carrier. Generally, the articles allowed as baggage to accompany the passenger, and which the carrier is bound to transmit as an insurer, are the personal apparel of the passenger, but may include a number of other articles, which may not unreasonably be designed for his pleasure, business, or convenience upon the journey which he is prosecuting. "In a general sense, it may be said to include such articles as it is usual for persons traveling to take with them for their pleasure, convenience, and comfort, according to the habits and wants of the class to which they belong." Oakes v. Northern P. R. Co. 20 Or. 392, 12 L. R. A. 318, 26 Pac. 230. Story, Bailments, § 499, thus states it: "By 'baggage' we are to understand such articles of necessity or personal convenience as are usually carried by passengers for their personal use; and not merchandise or other valuables, although carried in the trunks of passengers, which are not designed for any such use, but for other purposes, such as sale or the like." Bomar v. Maxwell, 9 Humph. 624, 51 Am. Dec. 682; Macrow v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 612. Rorer, Railroads, 988, states it this way: "It is difficult to enumerate the articles that may be included, in each particular case, in the term 'baggage.' This depends much upon the condition, habits, and circumstances of life of the passenger. Ordinarily, it includes a trunk or trunks, with the necessary wearing apparel for both comfort and dress suitable to the condition in life of the person; . . . but not money in larger amount than for necessary expenses, nor articles of merchandise or of virtu. . . ." As, ordinarily, only the wearing apparel and similar kindred articles are included in the personal baggage of the traveler, the carrier knows the probable extent of his liability in the event of the loss or damage of the baggage, and may reasonably be presumed to have regulated his charges and provided means for its safe-keeping proportioned to that liability. If, on the other hand, the passenger might include in his parcel valuable jewels, not properly classed as baggage, or plate, or merchandise, bonds, or money, of many thousands of dollars in value, and the carrier made liable for its loss without knowledge or notice of its extraordinary value, he is compelled to assume a responsibility for which he has not been paid in fact, and without an opportunity to provide that extraordinary care and attention which, by common prudence, would be due to such a valuable charge. Baggage, to a certain reasonable limit, and belonging to a passenger, is carried free, as an incident of the passenger's contract for passage. The common-law definition of baggage forms a part of the carrier's undertaking as though expressly stated and assented to at the time of the passage. The parties may, of course, vary this contract by agreement. If the carrier elects to receive and transport that as baggage which in fact is freight, and which it would have the right to refuse to take as baggage on its passenger trains, it ought to be liable therefor upon the same terms as if it were baggage. But this is not because of its common-law liability therefor, but because it has agreed by special contract, for a consideration, to be so bound. The elements of such a contract are sufficiently satisfied by an acceptance of the package or trunk by the carrier for transportation as baggage, with knowledge of its contents. Hutchinson, Carr. 1st ed. § 685; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Capps, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 33, p. 35; Jacobs v. Tutt, 33 Fed. 412; Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 39 Fed. 417; Humphreys v. Perry, 148 U. S. 627, 37 L. ed. 587, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 711. The fact that the passenger paid for the extra weight of the trunk does not vary the rule; 60 L. R. A.

for, if the trunk or trunks contained enough of those articles clearly entitled to be classed as personal baggage of the passenger as to be over the weight allowed, and reasonably allowable, to each passenger for free carriage, he would have to pay a just compensation for its being carried. This fact alone is not notice that the package contains anything besides the usual articles entitled to be taken as personal baggage, the nature and probable value of which are generally well known. The carrier might refuse to carry on its passenger train articles not properly baggage. It could not be required to carry freight on passenger trains. Delivering to the carrier a trunk or closed package, ostensibly ordinary baggage, without a statement as to its contents, is equivalent to a representation by the passenger that it belongs to him, and contains only such articles as are properly classed as personal baggage. Haines v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 29 Minn. 160, 43 Am. Rep. 199, 12 N. W. 447; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Carrouc, 73 Ill. 348, 24 Am. Rep. 248. If it contains other articles, and the carrier is not informed of the fact, it is a deception upon the carrier as to such articles, and as to such they are not covered by the carrier's contract. Story, Bailments, 9th ed. § 565. In the event of loss of, or damage to, such articles while in the carrier's possession, without notice of their character when received and checked as baggage, or without a special agreement with reference thereto, it is not liable, except as in case of a bailee without hire. But notice in terms of the contents of the trunks is not required. It is sufficient if, from all the circumstances of the case, the jury may reasonably infer that the carrier's agent, charged with the duty of receiving and checking baggage over its lines, knew of the extraordinary contents of the package when he received it and checked it as baggage for the passenger; that is, knew that they contained merchandise or other articles than the traveler's wearing apparel. Sloman v. Great Western R. Co. 67 N. Y. 208; Brown v. Camden & A. R. Co. 93 Pa. 316.

While it is true that a carrier cannot be made liable for the goods of another than the passenger or a member of his family traveling with him, which may be included in the passenger's baggage, yet the facts in this case tend to show that, although the goods belonged to the wholesale merchants, by an agreement between them and appellee he had such an interest in them, by reason of his being responsible to them for their loss or damage, and required to replace them in such event, that they may fairly be treated as his for the purposes of this action. The damage fell upon him. They were being carried for him. He was the passenger. We therefore conclude that the court erred in assuming appellant's liability for the damage to the dental instruments shipped as baggage.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial under proceedings consistent herewith.

CUMBERLAND TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

G. A. HENDON.

(.....Ky.....)

1. The measure of damages for wrongfully disconnecting a telephone because of mistake as to payment of rent is the amount which will compensate the patron for the injuries caused by the breach of contract.
2. The compensatory damages to be awarded a patron of a telephone company for wrongful discontinuance of the service is the amount paid for the service for the time during which it was refused, in the absence of any proof of specific loss because of the disconnection.

(January 7, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for wrongfully discontinuing plaintiff's telephone service. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fairleigh, Straus, & Eagles, for appellant:

The action cannot be treated as one for slander of the business of appellee, because there is no averment of malice. This allegation is absolutely necessary in such an action.

Morgan v. Booth, 13 Bush, 480; Louisville Courier-Journal Co. v. Weaver, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 599, 17 S. W. 1018.

The action is, therefore, one for breach of contract; and it was necessary that the appellee should state what damages he suffered because of the breach of the contract.

The verdict is excessive and unconscionable, and ought to be set aside.

Southern R. Co. v. Marshall, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 813, 64 S. W. 418.

Messrs. O'Neal & O'Neal, with Messrs. Pryor & Sapinsky, for appellee:

The case presented here by the pleadings is that of tort, in which the appellee is entitled, not only to the actual damages sustained, but also to exemplary or punitive damages growing out of the breach of the appellant's duty to him and the wanton and reckless disregard of the appellee's rights in the premises.

In an action of tort for a wilful injury to the person, the manner and manifest motive of the wrongful act may be given in evidence as affecting the question of damages; for, when the merely physical injury is the same, it may be more aggravated in its effects upon the mind if it is done in wanton disregard of the rights and feelings of the plaintiff than if it is the result of mere carelessness.

Hawes v. Knowles, 114 Mass. 518, 19 Am. Rep. 383; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 7.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, Hendon, is a physician, living in Louisville. He was a patron of the appellant, the Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company, and had one of its instruments in his office. Appellant discontinued the telephone from 3 o'clock P. M. of October 23, 1900, to 8:45 A. M. the next morning, or something less than eighteen hours, and this action was brought to recover damages therefor. The reason the telephone was disconnected was that the bookkeeper made a mistake in posting the amount paid. His book did not show that Hendon had paid for the month of September, although he had in fact paid. On October 22d a notice was sent to him that his 'phone was discontinued for this reason, and, he having paid no attention to the notice, twenty-four hours afterwards the connection at the office was severed, although the instrument was not removed. When he got home at 6 o'clock that evening and found that he had been cut off, he tried to 'phone to the office, but failed to get them. The next morning he went down, the mistake was at once corrected, and the instrument was no longer discontinued. The proof showed that he had not only paid for September, but had also paid in advance for October, November, and December. It also showed that one person who needed the doctor for his wife that night, being unable to reach him by 'phone, walked to his office and waked him up. It also showed that three other persons who wished to talk with him were unable to reach him on the 'phone, and that, when one of them asked at the office what was the matter, the assistant manager answered that his 'phone had been discontinued for nonpayment of rent. It is not shown that he suffered any pecuniary loss by the suspension of the service, although it would seem that he was considerably annoyed about it. On these facts the jury found for him a verdict for $200, on which the court entered judgment. The court instructed the jury that they should find for the plaintiff at least nominal damages, and, if they believed from the evidence he suffered inconvenience by reason of his telephone service being discontinued, then they should further find for him such sum as would fairly and reasonably compensate him for the inconvenience so sustained. There was nothing in the case to warrant an instruction on punitive damages, and the court properly refused to instruct the jury on this subject. The plaintiff had by contract acquired the right to a certain service, and, this contract being broken, the measure of damages is compensation for the breach, as in other cases of broken obligations. The case is entirely different from those where there is a physical trespass, as in the case of the expulsion of a passenger from a train, where there is not only a breach of contract but an actual tort. The proper measure of damages to compensate for the breach of the contract is a matter of some difficulty, and we have been referred to no authorities directly in point. Where the contract is to deliver a specific message, and is broken, the measure of damage has been often adjudicated, and we see no reason why the same principles should not apply to the case before us, for the contract here was, in substance, an undertaking to convey all messages the subscriber might wish to send, or others might wish to send to him, over appellant's line, within the time paid for by him. In the absence of proof of special damage for the failure to carry a message, the recovery would be limited to the amount paid for the service which was not furnished. Mere inconvenience or annoyance cannot be recovered for except in peculiar cases. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 855-863; Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Ky. 265, 13 S. W. 880. Where there is a contract, not for a specific message, but for the carriage of all messages within a certain time, the refusal to carry any messages for a certain part of the time is a breach of contract not different in character from the neglect to carry a specific message, and the measure of damages, in the absence of any proof of specific loss is the amount paid for the service for the time during which it is refused. In case of special damage, this, in addition, may be recovered under proper averments. Robinson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 452, 57 L. R. A. 611, 68 S. W. 656. Under the evidence, the court should have instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff the amount paid by him for the service for the time his 'phone was discontinued, taking for the basis the amount paid by the month, and allowing for the time lost such part thereof as they deemed right.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

City of WELLINGTON.

(.....Kan.....)

*A waterworks plant owned and operated by a city is exempt from taxation, and the fact that water is furnished by the city to citizens and other consumers at prescribed rentals does not affect the exemption.

(April 11, 1903.)

*Headnote by JOHNSTON, CH. J.

NOTE.—Taxation of municipal waterworks.

Property owned by municipal corporations and devoted to public use is generally exempt from taxation, and an attempt has been made to bring the property connected with a plant for supplying water to the municipality and its inhabitants within this rule.

Property of private company.

So far as the property belongs to a private corporation organized for the purpose of supplying water, there is, in the absence of express contract or statutory exemption, no ground for claiming it.

A waterworks plant that supplies the city with water, the rates for which are regulated by the council, and which for the term of the ordinance under which it was constructed may be purchased for a fixed price by the city, is the property of a private corporation, and is as such subject to taxation, and is not public property. Re Des Moines Water Co.'s Appeal, 48 Iowa, 324.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ready & Ready, with Mr. Emmera E. Wilson, for plaintiffs in error:

In order for any property such as is described in the plaintiff's petition to be exempt from taxation, said property must be used exclusively for such purpose, and not be used for gain and profit.

Water companies are not exempt from taxation in the absence of express statutory exemption and an act of legislature amending the charter of a water company by declaring such company the property of a municipal corporation, and therefore thereby exempted from the payment of taxes of every kind or character, does not apply to taxes due or imposed before such act was passed. Louisville Water Co. v. Hamilton, 81 Ky. 517.

The property of a waterworks company is not exempt from taxation as a fire engine or the implements for extinguishing fires, or as grounds used exclusively for the buildings and

It is the use to which property is put, and not ownership, that determines the question as to its exemption from taxation.

Mr. C. E. Elliott, with Mr. J. S. Dey, for defendant in error:

The legislatures of the several states have meetings of the fire companies, as its primary and exclusive use is not the extinguishing of fires. Re Des Moines Water Co.'s Appeal, 48 Iowa, 324.

A municipal waterworks system is subject to state and county taxation when only public property held for public purposes, or property from which no revenue is derived, can be exempt. Chadwick v. Maginnes, 94 Pa. 117.

The franchises and privileges of a waterworks company may be taxed under a statute requiring all property not exempted to be taxed. Fond du Lac Water Co. v. Fond du Lac, 82 Wis. 322, 16 L. R. A. 581, 52 N. W. 439.

A water company which has contracted to furnish water to a municipal corporation is not a governmental agency so that its property will be exempt from taxation. People ex rel. Mills Waterworks Co. v. Forrest, 97 N. Y. 97, Affirming 29 Hun, 548.

A plant used to supply a municipal corporation with water under a contract is not exempt from municipal taxation in the absence of any express contract for such exemption. Athens City Waterworks Co. v. Athens, 74 Ga. 413.

The water pipes, hydrants, and conduits of a water company are taxable as real estate in the city or town where they are laid, where the statutes state that "lands" shall include "all tenements and hereditaments connected therewith, and all rights thereto and interest therein." Paris v. Norway Water Co. 85 Me. 380, 21 L. R. A. 525, 27 Atl. 148.

The lessee of the waterworks of an aqueduct company is not entitled to exemption from municipal taxation thereof under a contract for supplying the municipality with water for a period of years with the privilege of purchase by the municipality upon the expiration of the term, where there is no provision in the contract by which the right of the city to impose taxes is taken away. Stein v. Mobile, 17 Ala. 234, 24 Ala. 591, 54 Ala. 23.

One who takes from a city owning a plant for a municipal water supply the right to use and enjoy the plant for a term of years with the right to sell water and take the rents and profits has such an interest in the works as to be subject to taxation. Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Waterworks Co. 49 Cal. 638.

In England water seems generally to be supplied to municipalities by local authorities charged with that duty, or by a company organized for that purpose. In the English cases the liability of the companies seems not to be doubted.

In a number of cases the only questions are as to the manner, extent, or measure of rating 60 L. R. A.

Works owned by municipality.

When the works are owned by the municipality itself there is more reason for claiming an exemption, and in some cases it has been allowed.

Where waterworks are owned and run by a municipality for public purposes, and not as a private enterprise for pecuniary gain or profit, such property is exempt from taxation, although there is no express statutory exemption; and a revenue act requiring water companies to pay the state an annual privilege tax does not apply in this case. Nashville v. Smith, 86 Tenn. 213, 6 S. W. 273.

Where a municipality owns and conducts waterworks under authority conferred by its charter, for the purposes of extinguishing fires, sprinkling the streets, and of supplying water to its citizens, such waterworks are public property, used for a public purpose, and are exempt from all taxation unless expressly included within the statutes levying such taxes; and this exemption is not defeated where its citizens are charged for the water furnished them, and thereby a considerable revenue over and above operating expenses is derived, which is applied to the purposes of the municipality. Smith v. Nashville, 88 Tenn. 464, 7 L. R. A. 469, 12 S. W. 924.

Lands acquired by a city under an act authorizing construction of waterworks when reasonably necessary therefor, and held in good faith, not speculatively nor for remote contingencies, are exempt from taxation although not in actual use. *State, Jersey City Water Comrs., Prosecutors, v. Land taken by a municipal corporation by authority of the legislature to aid in furnishing a water supply to the municipality is not subject to taxation. Wayland v. Middlesex County, 4 Gray, 500.

But the furnishing of water for compensation is very close to a business enterprise, and some of the courts have regarded it as so much so as to remove the exemption.

A waterworks system owned by a city is taxable where the citizens are charged for water. Negley v. Henderson, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 912, 50 S. W. 19.

Waterworks belonging to a city are not exempt from state and county taxes under § 170 of the Constitution of Kentucky. Id. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1394, 55 S. W. 554.

A municipality selling water generally to the public occupies as to its waterworks the same position as would a private corporation; so that, not only is all its tangible property used by the city for waterworks purposes taxable as nonmunicipal property, but its franchise is, under the statute, subject to a franchise tax. Newport v. Com. 106 Ky. 434, 45 L. R. A. 518, 50 S. W. 845, 51 S. W. 433.

The fact that the waterworks of a municipal corporation is owned and operated by it for the comfort and advantage of its inhabitants does not constitute a valid consideration for an act of legislature exempting the same from taxation, as such property is owned and operated by such municipality in its private, and not its governmental, character, and is not necessary to the execution of its duties as a political or governmental power; and therefore such property under such circumstances cannot constitutionally be exempted from taxation except in consideration of public services. Clark v. Louisville Water Co. 90 Ky. 515, 14 S. W. 502.

An act of legislature exempting the waterworks owned by a certain municipality from taxation is repealed by the adoption of a new Constitution containing a clause exempting public property used for public purposes, and only 60 L. R. A.

The use to which the property was put is, in law and in fact, a public use.

The property was acquired and full ownership obtained at a time when no tax of any such, from taxation, inasmuch as such property is not "public property used for public purposes" within the meaning of such clause. Covington v. Com. 107 Ky. 680, 39 S. W. 836.

Property outside limits of municipality.

A statute exempting from taxation a town's real estate which is used for public purposes does not apply to real estate with appurtenances thereto used for waterworks situated outside of its geographical limits. Newport v. Unity, 68 N. H. 587, 44 Atl. 704.

Property lying outside the limits of a municipality and acquired by it for the purpose of a municipal water supply is subject to taxation under a statute providing for the exemption of property of a municipal corporation of the state held for the public use except the portion of such property not within the corporate limits. Rochester v. Coe, 25 App. Div. 300, 49 N. Y. Supp. 502.

A pipe line of a city maintained for the purpose of a water supply beyond its limits is established as real property irrespective of the franchise under the general tax law, and is not exempt as a special franchise under N. Y. Laws 1899, chap. 712. People ex rel. Rochester v. De Witt, 59 App. Div. 493, 69 N. Y. Supp. 366.

A pump house, pipe lines, and crib maintained by a city for water-supply purposes outside of the municipal limits are taxable under the general tax law as real estate in the town where they may be situated, and are not exempt under a statute providing for a tax on special franchises such as mains and pipes, but exempting the property of municipal corporations therefrom: since the intent was not to exempt property theretofore taxable, but to restrict the assessment of property subject thereto to the special franchise tax. People ex rel. Auburn v. Duryea, 59 App. Div. 488, 69 N. Y. Supp. 383.

Such portion of the waterworks system of a municipal corporation as is outside of its corporate limits is subject to government taxation where located, under the New York act of 1896. People ex rel. Amsterdam v. Hess, 157 N. Y. 42, 51 N. E. 410.

But lands acquired under legislative direction by a municipal corporation within the bounds of a township for the preservation for its water supply are not, in the absence of express legislation, liable to taxation by the town. Rochester v. Rush, 80 N. Y. 302, Affirming 15 Hun. 239.

kind was due on the property; and the moment the municipality became the owner of it, according to the law of its organization, that moment the developing liability ceased, and no tax ever became due on it, and will not under the law while the defendant in error owns it.

Real estate and certain appurtenances thereto, owned and used by a town as its waterworks, which are situated within the limits of another town which does not use such real estate for any public purpose, are taxable in such latter town in the absence of statutory exemption. Newport v. Unity, 68 N. H. 587, 44 Atl. 704.

Where a city purchases a larger tract of land than necessary for the construction of its reservoir, for the reason that it can obtain the whole for a less price than a part, the excess lying in an adjacent town is not exempt from taxation. West Hartford v. Hartford Water Comrs. 44 Conn. 360.

But land purchased in a town by a municipality for the purpose of constructing a reservoir as part of its water system does not lose its exemption from taxation by reason of the fact that it is held by a board of water commissioners which sells the water to consumers, paying the interest on the investment and the operating expenses from the proceeds, or by the fact that during the year the question was submitted to the court, a surplus remained after paying the annual interest and operating expenses. Ibid.

When land and a dam were purchased by a city in pursuance of a scheme to supply the city with pure water, they were purchased "for the purposes of its water supply," so as to be within the exemption of taxation prescribed by Pub. Stat. 1893, chap. 352, § 1, when it cannot be held that any revenue in the nature of rent is received by the city from any person occupying or using the same. Miller v. Fitchburg, 180 Mass. 32, 61 N. E. 277.

A city will not be rendered liable for a privilege tax levied on her waterworks for "exercising the privilege of running a water company" within her own limits in a city "of 40,000 or over" because she furnishes water to persons and factories beyond her corporate limits, where there is nothing in the record to show that such persons and factories were in any city, town, or taxing district, which is a prerequisite to the exaction of the tax under the statute. Smith v. Nashville, 88 Tenn. 464, 7 L. R. A. 469, 12 S. W. 924.

Exemptions.

A municipality cannot exempt the works of a water-supply company from municipal taxation. Altgelt v. San Antonio, 81 Tex. 436, 13 L. R. A. 383, 17 S. W. 75.

The legislature can only exempt the property of a municipal water company from taxation so far as the exemption is granted in consideration of services actually rendered to the municipality. 60 L. R. A.

Any property used exclusively for such purposes as mentioned in § 1 of article 2 of the Constitution, the legislature cannot tax; but the Constitution nowhere says that the legislature cannot exempt other property if it so desires.

Francis v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 19 Kan. 311; Ottawa County v. Nelson, 19 Kan. 237.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The officers of Sumner county undertook to levy and impose taxes upon a waterworks plant owned by the city of Wellington. Originally, the city granted to C. W. Hill and his assigns, upon certain conditions, the right to construct and maintain waterworks for the purpose of providing the city and its inhabitants with water. Under the franpality. New Orleans v. New Orleans Waterworks Co. 36 La. Ann. 432.

A municipal corporation has no authority to exempt the property of a company supplying it with water from municipal taxation by contract. The company can neither take the exemption by way of gratuity, nor purchase it by way of commutation. Cartersville Waterworks Co. v. Cartersville, 89 Ga. 689, 16 S. E. 70.

An act of the legislature exempting from taxation the property of a water company is unconstitutional and void, although all the stock of the company is owned by a city; and the fact that such act also makes it the duty of such company to furnish water free of charge for fire protection, which may incidentally protect from fire the public buildings of the state, will not support the exemption, where the consideration recited in the act for the making of such exemption, and the real consideration, was in fact that the stock of such company was owned by the sinking fund of the city; therefore the company belonged to the city. Clark v. Louisville Water Co. 90 Ky. 515, 14 S. W. 502.

In exercising the power granted to a municipal corporation by an act of the legislature to construct and operate waterworks such municipality acts in the capacity of a private corporation for the convenience and profit of its citizens, and not in the capacity of a municipal government; and an act of legislature exempting such waterworks from taxation is unconstitutional, where such municipality rendered no public service in consideration for such act. Com. v. Makibben, 90 Ky. 384, 14 S. W. 372.

An agreement by a municipality to release a water company from municipal taxation on its franchises is valid so far as the same is granted for services actually rendered by the company. Grant v. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396.

An ordinance by a city under legislative authority exempting property of a water company from taxation is valid where the consideration is a free supply of water for schools and other public buildings and for the extinguishment of fires, the corporation being under other considerable obligations to the city and state. Portland v. Portland Water Co. 67 Me. 135.

An agreement whereby a city agrees for a valid consideration to save a water company harmless from certain taxes on its property applies, not only to the property then in existence, but to all which it is subsequently necessary to erect in the proper conduct of its business. Alpena City Water Co. v. Alpena (Mich.) 9 Det. L. N. 141, 90 N. W. 323.

As to the validity of contracts by the municipality to assume the tax as part of the compen-chise so granted the plant was constructed, and it was operated as a private enterprise for several years when it was purchased by the city. Since that time the plant has been operated by the city, and, in addition to supplying water to the public buildings and places of the city, and also for fire protection, it furnishes to the people, at fixed charges, water for domestic purposes, and also to private and public corporations for their needs, at prescribed rentals. The plant was located partly within and partly without the corporate boundaries of the city, and consisted of both real and personal property of the value of about $50,000.

The questions in the case are raised upon the pleadings, and the turning point in the case is whether a waterworks plant owned and operated by a city is, under the Constitution and laws, exempt from taxation. Under the statute a city of the second class (in which Wellington belonged) had full power "to purchase, procure, provide . . . waterworks . . . for the purpose of supplying such cities and the inhabitants thereof with water . . . for domestic use, and any and all other purposes." Gen. Stat. 1901, § 1017. There was undoubted legislative authority for the city to municipalize the plant. The supplying of water to the inhabitants, while not strictly a governmental function, so much affects the health and welfare of the people as to be closely akin to it. The plant was purchased with public funds. It is operated by the public officers and agents, and rentals derived from its operation go into the public treasury, and are expended for the public benefit. The ownership and the purpose being public, there are good reasons why the property should be exempted from taxation. It is inconsistent with our theory of government to place a tax or burden upon one of the instrumentalities of government, and to thus impede its operation, and in some jurisdictions immunity from such taxation has been adjudged where there were no express constitutional or statutory exemptions. 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 368. In our state the legislature has unequivocally declared that all property belonging exclusively to the United States, the state, and to any county, city, township, or school district, shall be exempted from taxation. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7504. This statute only re-enforces and confirms the general principle that the nation for water supplied, see note to State ex rel. Hallauer v. Gosnell, post, —.

Construction of statutes.

A waterworks system for supplying the inhabitants of a city with water for domestic and irrigation purposes, and charging therefor, is not exempt from taxation under a statute exempting therefrom "all rights to the use of water and means of diverting water . . . in all cases where the land or other property upon which the water pertaining to such right is assessable for taxation," as the intention of that act is to exempt the right to use water from taxation only where it is appurtenant to land which is subject to taxation. Bear Lake & R. Waterworks & Irrig. Co. v. Ogden City, 8 Utah, 494, 33 Pac. 135.

Mountain land held by a water company for the sole purpose of protecting the purity of its water supply, if a part of its capital stock is liable to taxation by the state, is exempt from local taxation. Spring Brook Water Supply Co. v. Schadt, 3 Lack. Legal News, 170.

When the ownership by a water company of vast tracts of wild mountain land is not necessary to protect the purity of its water supply, it is not such an appurtenance to the exercise of its franchise as to exempt them from local taxation, because the capital stock is subject to state taxation. Roaring Creek Water Co. v. Northumberland County, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 473.

A law that the necessary property of a water corporation shall be exempt from taxation, and authorizing it to hold such lands along and contiguous to streams of water or reservoirs from which its supply is obtained as may be necessary to preserve them from contamination, cannot by fair intentment be held to include a whole watershed or area of catchment. Spring Brook Water Co. v. Kelly, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 347.

A statute authorizing the maintenance of a water-supply plant "for such time and upon such terms and conditions as may be deemed proper, including therein the power and authority to exempt pipes and reservoirs from taxation," does not apply to pipes already laid, or reservoirs constructed. Bowen v. Newell, 16 R. I. 238, 14 Atl. 873.

A water company exempted from local taxation on realty used exclusively for corporate purposes is exempt from taxes, for county, municipal, school, and road purposes, on all realty indispensably necessary for the exercise of charter privileges. Lehigh County v. Bethlehem South Gas & Water Co. 4 Pa. Dist. R. 723.

A contract whereby a city agrees to relieve a water company from the payment of any city or school tax includes a highway tax. Alpena City Water Co. v. Alpena (Mich.) 9 Det. L. N. 141, 90 N. W. 323.

Where taxable.

A waterworks company holding an interest in real estate so long as it shall continue to use the property by the operation of its waterworks, upon which it has built for pumping works a building of brick 36 by 100 feet resting upon a solid foundation of masonry occupied by the building, engines, pumps, and other machinery, the plant being both extensive and substantial, when connected with it is a system of mains and pipes in a neighboring city, together with the hydrants, a filter, and a standpipe also situated in the city,—is taxable for the whole plant, including the mains, pipes, hydrants, standpipes, and filter in the taxing district in which the pumping works are situated. Oskaloosa Water Co. v. Oskaloosa Bd. of Equalization, 84 Iowa, 407, 15 L. R. A. 296, 51 N. W. 18.

The land, building, machinery, and water mains of a waterworks company are real estate; and, although the mains may be in different townships, they are subject to assessment in the township in which the works are situated. Re Des Moines Water Co's Appeal, 48 Iowa, 324.

A water-supply company is not a manufacturing corporation within the meaning of a statute providing for taxation of property of such corporations where situated, so as to render its pipes, gates, shut-offs, and other things connected with its plant taxable in the jurisdictions where they are located, if they are used in connection with a distributing plant located elsewhere. Dudley v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. 100 Mass. 183.

instrumentalities of government shall be exempt from taxation, and it, in effect, declares that neither the state nor any of its subdivisions shall tax itself to raise money for itself. The statute makes public ownership of property the ground of immunity from taxation, and, as the plant in question is absolutely owned by the city, it is strictly within the terms of that exemption.

As against this view it is argued that the statute is in conflict with the constitutional provision that "the legislature shall provide for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation; but all property used exclusively for state, county, municipal, literary, educational, scientific, religious, benevolent, and charitable purposes, and personal property to the amount of at least $200 for each family, shall be exempted from taxation." Const. art. 11, § 1. It will be noticed that the provision quoted does not require that all property in the state shall be taxed, but does provide that all which is subject to taxation shall be assessed and taxed at a uniform and equal rate. Certain exemptions are therein prescribed which the legislature cannot ignore; but it does not forbid the exercise of the inherent power of the legislature to exempt property from taxation when, in its judgment, it may conduce to the public welfare. In Francois v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 19 Kan. 311, and in Ottawa County v. Nelson, 19 Kan. 237, 27 Am. Rep. 101, it is, in effect, said that the Constitution does not in terms prohibit the exemption of property not therein enumerated, nor provide that no property shall be exempt except such as is named in that section; and that it actually contains an implication that power exists to make exemptions beyond those expressly enumerated. Our Constitution limits, rather than confers, power, and hence we look to it to see what it prohibits, instead of what it authorizes. Unless the sovereign power of taxation, which includes the power to make exemptions, is actually prohibited by the Constitution, it may be exercised by the legislature. In the absence of constitutional restrictions, the general rule is that the legislature has full power to grant exemptions from taxation; and, there being no such limitation, we cannot say that property like that in question, owned by a city, may not be exempted by the legislature. If use, rather than ownership, were applied as the test to the right Amount.

In estimating the value of waterworks for the purpose of municipal taxation, there should be considered, in connection with each other, the land on which the reservoir is situated, the pipes through which the water is conducted into the city, and the privilege of charging all who might use it, and the value of the whole thus estimated is subject to taxation. Stein v. Moblie, 17 Ala. 234, 24 Ala. 591, 54 Ala. 23.

The purchase price cannot be considered in determining, for the purpose of taxation, the market or real value of the plant and works of a water company or its profit-yielding capacity, where they were purchased or constructed some years previous. State v. Blenville Water Supply Co. 89 Ala. 325, 8 So. 54.

Character of property.

Water mains and hydrants laid in the public streets and alleys of a city, and the machinery connected therewith and necessary to the operation of a waterworks plant, are realty for the purpose of taxation, under a statute including as real estate for the purpose of taxation improvements, defined as including "buildings, structures, fixtures, and fences erected upon or affixed to land, whether title has been acquired to said land or not." Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. v. Pueblo Water Co. 11 Colo. App. 352, 53 Pac. 282.

The water mains of a water plant for a city, lying under the streets of the same and being connected with the pumping machinery of the plant, constitute a part of such machinery; and where, by statute, the engine and boilers of such plant are, for the purposes of taxation, taken and treated as personal property, the water mains will for the same purpose be also regarded as personal property. Shelbyville Water Co. v. People ex rel. Craddock, 140 Ill. 545, 16 L. R. A. 605, 30 N. E. 678.

Water conducted in the pipes of a waterworks system for supplying the inhabitants of a city with water is personal property, and not appurtenant to any land within the meaning of 60 L. R. A.

statutes relating to taxation. Bear Lake & R. Waterworks & Irrig. Co. v. Ogden City, 8 Utah, 494, 33 Pac. 135.

Further cases upon the question of the character of water and gas mains for purposes of taxation will be found in a note to Oskaloosa Water Co. v. Oskaloosa City Bd. of Equalisation (Iowa) 15 L. R. A. 296.

Enforcement.

Suit against a water company to compel it to pay its delinquent taxes cannot be maintained in the absence of express statutory authority, although no other adequate remedy exists, by reason of the fact that the safety, health, and comfort of the city and the inhabitants where such company is situated depend upon the continued use of its corporate franchise for their water supply, and therefore an interference therewith by seizure and sale by a collecting officer in the usual way could not be permitted. Louisville Water Co. v. Com. 89 Ky. 244, 6 L. R. A. 69, 12 S. W. 303.

Owing to the public nature of the duties of a water company, supplying water to the inhabitants of a city, its property cannot be seized and sold for delinquent taxes so as to deprive the public of the benefits derived from its continued use; but, if no property can be found the sale of which will not affect the operation of its franchise, the court will order the appointment of a receiver to take possession of and operate such property until such debt is discharged, unless the money is paid into court by such company within the time fixed by the court. Louisville Water Co. v. Hamilton, 81 Ky. 517.

Water plants being essential to the comfort, protection, and good health of a city, such property may not be sold for taxes. The taxing district may, however, after a reasonable demand for the payment of the taxes, maintain an action for the appointment of a receiver over the property, and for the collection of the taxes. Covington v. Highlands District, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 438, 68 S. W. 669.

of exemption, the result would have been the same. The fact that in establishing and carrying on a system of waterworks the city furnishes water to citizens and consumers for rental charges does not make it a mere business enterprise, nor would it affect the exemption. West Hartford v. Hartford Water Comrs. 44 Conn. 360. The earnings derived from the water furnished for domestic use and to consumers is, as we have seen, paid into the city treasury, used in carrying on the city government, and thus inures to the benefit of the people of the municipality.

We think that the trial court reached a correct conclusion, and its judgment will be affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

KENNEBEC WATER DISTRICT

v.

City of WATERVILLE et al.

(97 Me. 185.)

1. Franchises possessed, but not in fact exercised, are included in a statute authorizing one water company to acquire, by right of eminent domain, "the entire plant, property, and franchises" of another.
2. The financial returns which a water plant can be made to bear must be considered in determining the value of the franchises of its owner when taken by right of eminent domain.
3. In determining how much income a water plant can be made to produce, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the franchises of its owner which are sought to be taken by right of eminent domain, it must be allowed a fair amount, based upon the fair value of its property, taking into account the cost of maintenance or depreciation and current operating expenses, allowing something for the risk of the original enterprise, if any, over and above income which it has received at rates which would have been excessive but for such risk, so far as such fair amount can be allowed, and no more should be exacted from the public than the service is worth.
4. Whether or not the franchises of a water company are exclusive, and how far it is without competition, as well as the period for which they are to endure, are to be taken into consideration in determining their value, when sought to be taken by the right of eminent domain.
5. Whether or not the franchises of a water company are exclusive is a question for the court, where the instruments granting them were before it under the pleadings in a proceeding for instructions to appraisers who are to value the property of the company which is to be taken by right of eminent domain; and the question should not be referred to the appraisers to be answered after the charters are put in evidence before them.
6. Evidence of the actual cost of the plant and property of a water company, together with a proper allowance for depreciation, is admissible, but not controlling, upon the question of the amount which must be allowed for it when the plant is taken by right of eminent domain.

7. The actual rates which have been charged by a water company, and its actual earnings, are admissible in evidence in determining the value of its franchises which are to be taken by right of eminent domain.
8. The selling price of the stock of a water company is not competent evidence of the value of a portion of its system which is to be taken from it by right of eminent domain.
9. The quality of water furnished and of the services rendered, and the fitness of the plant, and the source of the water supply to meet reasonable requirements in the present and future, are to be considered in determining the value of a water plant taken by eminent domain.
10. The faithfulness, or unfaithfulness, even to the extent of rendering the franchises liable to forfeiture of a water company in performing its duties, should not be considered in determining the value of its plant when taken by eminent domain.
11. That a water company has received more than reasonable rates for services rendered should not be considered in determining the amount which must be paid for its plant when taken by eminent domain.
12. Upon taking, by eminent domain, the system supplying one municipal corporation from a water company operating several plants in different places, no increased burden upon, or impairment of value of, the remaining plants because of the severance of the property can be considered as an element of damage, where the various plants are separate and distinct, although some additional cost of management may be thereby imposed upon the remaining ones.
13. Property of a water company not directly connected with the water system or plant which is taken from it by right of eminent domain should be appraised at its fair market value, not at a forced sale, but at what it is fairly worth to the seller under conditions permitting a prudent and beneficial sale.
14. The cost of replacing a water plant with one substantially like it must be considered in determining its value when appropriated by eminent domain; but such consideration must be made in the light of the fact that the plant is a completed structure and a going concern.
15. The element of good will should not be considered in estimating the value of a water plant to be taken by eminent domain so far as the system is practically exclusive.

NOTE.—The question of the measure of damages to be awarded for the condemnation of a water plant is considered at great length in the above case, the right to condemn the plant not being involved.

16. In determining the structure value of a plant for a municipal water supply to be taken by eminent domain, the appraisers should consider the present efficiency of the system, the length of time necessary to construct the same de novo, the time and cost needed after construction to develop the new system to the level of the present one in respect to business and income, and the added net incomes and profits, if any, which, by its acquirement as a going concern, would accrue to a purchaser during the time required for the new construction and development of business and income.
17. The possibility of future development of the use of the franchises of a water company should be considered in determining the amount to be allowed for them when taken by eminent domain, in the light of the facts that further investigation may be necessary therefor, and that at any stage of the development the owner of the franchises will be entitled to charge only reasonable rates under the conditions then existing.
18. That a statute provides for the taking of the property and franchises of a water company by eminent domain in no way impairs the value for which compensation must be made.
19. The capitalization of the income of a water company, even at reasonable rates, cannot be adopted as a test of the present value of the plant, upon which to calculate the amount to be paid to it when the plant is taken by eminent domain,—especially where the franchises are not exclusive or perpetual.

(December 27, 1902.)

R EPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Kennebec County for the opinion of the full bench of requested instructions to appraisers appointed to determine the compensation which should be awarded for a municipal water-supply plant, which was sought to be taken by eminent domain.

The requests on behalf of plaintiff, which are not sufficiently set out in the opinion, were as follows:

(1) The appraisers are directed to state separately in their report what part of the amount fixed by them as the valuation of the plant, property, and franchises of the Waterville Water Company and the Maine Water Company is fixed as the value of the plant and property, and what part is fixed as the value of the franchises, and further to state what property and what franchises they have considered in fixing these values.

(7) The franchises of the Waterville Water Company are fixed by Priv. & Sp. Laws 1881, chap. 141, as amended by Priv. & Sp. Laws 1887, chap. 59, and Priv. & Sp. Laws 1891, chap. 14.

(8) The franchises of the Maine Water Company material to these proceedings are those of the Waterville Water Company, and those granted by Priv. & Sp. Laws 1893, chap. 352, and no others.

(9) The appraisers shall regard the franchises of the companies as entitling them to continue business as a going concern, but subject to all proper legal rules governing public service companies; it being further understood that said franchises are in no way exclusive. The franchises shall not be otherwise appraised or valued.

(14) The appraisers may view the premises, so far as they see fit.

(15) They shall procure a stenographer to be in attendance, who shall take notes of all testimony, and furnish transcripts thereof.

(16) They shall make a report showing their doings and findings under each branch of the instructions above given, and also the date as of which the valuation was fixed.

Those by defendants were as follows:

(1) If the court shall be of the opinion that either party at this stage of the case is entitled to instructions under the 8th section of the act above mentioned, the defendants respectively ask the court for the following instructions to said appraisers: the defendants understanding that preliminary requests for instructions are authorized by said 8th section, and that they will be asked for on the part of the plaintiff, and not deeming it right that requests should be presented and considered by the court on the one part, and not on the other.

(5) That, as to the remaining property constituting the water system to be taken, and the franchises, rights, and privileges connected therewith, neither the total construction cost of the entire water system, measured at the date selected for valuation, nor such construction cost less wear and tear and depreciation, nor such construction cost, thus reduced, and afterwards increased by any adjudged percentage or bonus of profit thereon, can constitute the legal criterion of the total values to be awarded under the terms of this act.

(15) That the Constitution of the United States, independent of the terms of this act, requires that just compensation should be made to said water company for all its plant, property, franchises, rights, privileges, good will, incomes, and revenues to be taken under this act, at their full value, not to the taker, but to the seller; and, to secure just and full compensation for all the same, the defendants are entitled, under the Constitution of the United States, to have the court give, and the appraisers follow, as legal rules and material elements of value, in language or in substance, the several foregoing requests; and this request applies to each of said foregoing requests, separately and without reference to any other.

Savage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By chapter 200 of the Private and Special Laws of 1899, the Kennebec water district was incorporated; and by § 6 it was empowered to acquire, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, "the entire plant, property, and franchises, rights and privileges now held by the Maine Water Company within said district and said towns of Benton and Winslow, including all lands, waters, water rights, dams, reservoirs, pipes, machinery, fixtures, hydrants, tools, and all apparatus and appliances owned by said company and used in supplying water in said district and towns, and any other real estate in said district." This act was held constitutional and valid in Kennebec Water Dist. v. Waterville, 96 Me. 234, 52 Atl. 774. The act further provides that, in the process of the condemnation proceedings, the court shall appoint three appraisers for the purpose of fixing the valuation of the property mentioned in § 6; that the "appraisers shall, upon hearing, fix the valuation of said plant, property, and franchises at what they are fairly and equitably worth, so that said Maine Water Company shall receive just compensation for all the same," and that "upon payment or tender by said district of the amount fixed, and the performance of all other terms and conditions imposed by the court, said entire plant, property, franchises, rights, and privileges shall become vested in said water district."

It is further provided that, "before a commission is issued to the appraisers, either party may ask for instructions to the appraisers, and all questions of law arising upon said requests or upon any other matters in issue may be reported to the law court for determination before the appraisers proceed to fix the valuation of the property." And it is at this last stage that the proceedings have now arrived. The bill in equity for the judicial appraisal and condemnation of the property having been sustained (Kennebec Water Dist. v. Waterville, 96 Me. 234, 52 Atl. 774), both parties have asked for instructions to the appraisers, and the questions of law arising upon the requests for instructions have been reported to this court for its determination.

To say the least, the method thus authorized and adopted is an anomalous one. The questions before the court, which are comprehensive in scope and minute in detail, in effect relate to the admissibility of evidence; and yet they must be decided before the court knows or can know what specific evidence will be offered or relied upon, or to what conditions the evidence will be applicable. In such case, it is evident that the answers must be general in character. The conditions surrounding properties like the one here proposed to be taken are so variant that it is difficult, and in some particulars impossible, to lay down rules of value which will properly apply to all cases without modification. It was intimated in Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 4 Inters. Com. Rep., at page 848, 64 Fed., at page 178, that no hard and fast rule could be made applicable to all properties under all conditions.

And it may be said, further, that, owing to this fact, and to the fact that in scarcely any two cases are the statutes authorizing condemnation proceedings alike, so far as they provide for an estimate of the different elements of value, the expressions of other courts, and results arrived at by them, are frequently of less authority than they otherwise would be.

It should be noticed that this is a bill in equity, to be heard and determined, except as otherwise provided, according to the practice in equity. The hearings, except upon questions of law reserved upon report or exceptions, are to be before a single justice. A single justice is to make all necessary orders and decrees. And the act contemplates that the justice who directs the issuing of a commission to the appraisers may instruct them in regard to the manner of the performance of their duties. The requests for such instructions can be considered by this court only when they raise questions of law. So we construe the act in question. In this view, plaintiff's requests 1, 14, and 15 are not open for consideration by this court. They relate to details of procedure, and raise no questions of law. They relate to questions concerning which the sitting justice may, in his discretion, give or withhold instructions, according as he may think they are, or are not, practicable, and useful to the parties, the appraisers, and the court. The same remarks apply to plaintiff's request 16, in part. Of course, the appraisers must make a report of their doings, and the statute requires that in their report they shall state the date as of which the valuation is fixed. But beyond this, it is for the sitting justice below to pass upon this request, and not for this court.

Before entering upon a consideration of the requests seriatim, we think it will be expedient to discuss certain general propositions which concern and must qualify or limit the answers to be given to many or all of the requests.

First, as to the subjects of valuation: In substance, it is claimed by the defendants (request 2), and conceded by the plaintiff, that the latter, if it takes anything, must take every item of property held by the Maine Water Company in the Kennebec water district (the city of Waterville and the Fairfield village corporation), and in Benton and Winslow, at the date of the appraisal, whether specifically named in the act or not. We think it must be so held. And for every such item of value the Maine Water Company is entitled to "just compensation." This includes the real estate or other property, if any, not connected with the water system. It includes the plant, or physical system, real and personal. It includes all the franchises, rights, and privileges held by the Maine Water Company in the territory described, except the franchise to be a corporation. It is unnecessary to particularize further. The plaintiff criticizes the use of the phrase "capable of being exercised," in speaking of franchises in request 2. But we think it is unobjectionable. Whatever franchise the Maine Water Company holds in this territory is to be taken from it, and must be paid for. Its existence is the criterion, not whether it is being exercised or not. Joy v. Grindstone-Neck Water Co. 85 Me. 109, 26 Atl. 1052. It may be doubted whether the Maine Water Company has any franchise in this territory which it is not now exercising. It has some franchises which undoubtedly will be more fully exercised than at present, in the course of the development of its system, if it is allowed to continue in possession of it. It would be, however, rather the extension of the use or exercise of a franchise, than the exercise of an unused franchise.

Secondly, as to reasonable rates: We think it is clear that the pecuniary value of the property of the Maine Water Company, both plant and franchises, depends, to a considerable extent, upon the financial returns it can be made to yield to the stockholders; that is, upon its net income. The franchise or right to do business, if unproductive, is of little value; and it stands to reason that the plant, as a structure, irrespective of franchise, if the business were profitable, would be worth more, and would sell for more, than if the business were unprofitable. The basis of income, of course, is the tolls charged and received. If the Maine Water Company were doing a private business, knowing its present net income, and the facts tending to show a probable increase in the future or otherwise, it would be comparatively easy to approximate the present value of its plant and franchises. But it is not doing a private business. It is not a private corporation. The value of its property cannot be appraised as if it were a private corporation, doing a private business. Cotting v. Kansas City Stock-Yards Co. 82 Fed. 850. It is a quasi-public, or public-service, corporation. In pursuit of legitimate gain, it has devoted its property to a public use. In that way the public have acquired an interest in the use of the property. The company owes a duty to the public as well as to its stockholders. It must serve the public faithfully and impartially, and must charge no more than reasonable rates for service. Brunswick Gaslight Co. v. United Gas, Fuel, & Light Co. 85 Me. 532, 27 Atl. 525. The legislature may limit the tolls of such a corporation so that they shall be reasonable. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 60 L. R. A.

466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418. Unreasonable charges may be reached by the restraining hand of the court. Thus far the parties agree. And it may be said that the fair and equitable value of the system of the Maine Water Company, as a whole, may, in a large sense, be measured by its net income at reasonable rates, taking into account future probabilities. But the plaintiff (request 4) asks us to say that "what would be reasonable rates can be determined only after and by means of a valuation of the companies' property," and that "the actual rates which may have been charged by the companies, and their actual earnings, have no bearing on the value either of the companies' plant or property, or of their franchises, and are immaterial." On the other hand, the defendants state their proposition in these words (request 11): "That the value of a franchise depends on its productiveness or net earning power, present and prospective, developed or capable of development, within the entire territory embraced by the taking; that whenever net earning power, or net incomes and revenues, is to be determined under this act, it is to be so determined under reasonable water rates, after due allowance for operating expense and maintenance or depreciation."

Waiving other questions for the time being, it will be seen that "reasonable water rates" lie at the foundation of this proposition. But so far we are not in any way aided in determining how they should be ascertained. The differing forms in which the parties have presented their requests upon this subject have given rise, in argument, to the question whether the reasonableness of the rates depends upon the value of the property, or whether the value of the property depends upon the income derived at reasonable rates. But the requests do not present the question in this form. The plaintiff asks that reasonable rates be made to depend upon the value of the property, and we think this is correct, as far as it goes, as we shall have occasion to show hereafter. The defendants say that the value of the franchise (that is, of the right to do the business) depends upon the net income at reasonable rates. And this is also correct, as far as it goes. Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 37 L. ed. 463, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 622. One refers to the value of the property in gross; the other, to the value of the franchise. But the value of the property is not the only element to be considered in determining what are reasonable rates. As declared in Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418, the basis of all calculation as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a public-service corporation is the fair value of the property used by it for the convenience of the public. Yet, while the company is entitled, so far as this case shows, to a fair return upon the value of the property used for the public at the time it is being used, the public (that is, the customers) may demand that the rates shall be no higher than the services are worth to them, not in the aggregate, but as individuals. The value of the services in themselves is to be considered, and not exceeded. These views seem to be consonant with reason. They are also established by the highest judicial authority in our country.

In Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, at page 544, 169 U. S. at page 848, 42 L. ed., and page 433, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep., the court said: "Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the state. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, and to charge tolls, was given primarily for the benefit of the public. It is under governmental control, though such control must be exercised with due regard to the constitutional guaranties for the protection of its property. . . . It cannot, therefore, be admitted that a railroad corporation maintaining a highway under the authority of the state may fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests, and ignore the rights of the public. But the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad are exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public, or the fair value of the services rendered, but in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to stockholders." Again, at page 547, 169 U. S., at page 849, 42 L. ed., and page 434, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep.: "What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth." Of course, the same principles apply to the water rates as to railroad rates. San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804. In the case last cited it was claimed by the appellant, as bearing upon just or reasonable rates for water service, that the court should take into consideration the cost; the cost per annum of operating the plant, including interest paid on money borrowed, and reasonably necessary to be used in constructing the same; the annual depreciation of the plant from natural causes resulting from its use; and a fair net profit. The court said, at page 757, 174 U. S., page 1161, 43 L. ed., and page 811, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep.: "Undoubtedly, all these matters ought to be taken into consideration, and such weight be given them, when rates are being fixed, as, under all the circumstances, will be just to the company and to the public. The basis of calculation suggested by the appellant is, however, defective, in not requiring the real value of the property, and the fair value in themselves of the services rendered, to be taken into consideration. What the company is entitled to demand, in order that it may have just compensation, is a fair return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it is being used for the public."

In Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. San-

ford, 164 U. S. 578, 41 L. ed. 560, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198, it was held that the nature and value of the service rendered by a turnpike company bear upon the reasonableness of rates charged. And in the same case it was held that other considerations were involved, such as "the reasonable cost of maintaining the road in good condition for public use, and the amount that may have been really and necessarily invested in the enterprise."

In Cotting v. Kansas City Stock-Yards Co. 183 U. S. 79, sub nom. Cotting v. Godard, 46 L. ed. 92, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 30, decided since these proceedings were begun, Mr. Justice Brewer declared (p. 91, 183 U. S., p. 101, 46 L. ed., and p. 35, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep.) that the present value of the property is the basis by which the test of reasonableness is to be determined, although the actual cost is to be considered, and that the value of the services rendered to each individual is also to be considered.

We deem the principles established by the Supreme Court of the United States as affecting the reasonableness of rates of public-service corporations to be authoritative. The rates of such corporations are within the protection of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362, 38 L. ed. 1014, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1047; Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sanford, 164 U. S. 578, 41 L. ed. 560, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804. And the declarations of the highest Federal court thereon are of controlling force.

The elemental principles thus far noted may be summarized as, on the one hand, the right of the company to derive a fair income based upon the fair value of the property at the time it is being used for the public, taking into account the cost of maintenance or depreciation, and current operating expenses; and, on the other hand, the right of the public to have no more exacted than the services in themselves are worth.

In some of the cases to which we have referred, it is suggested that there may be instances where these two principles will clash,—where public service rendered at rates not higher than the service in itself is worth may produce less than a fair income, or no net income at all. But we assume that it is unnecessary to discuss this question here, for neither upon the face of the bill and answer, nor in the requests for instructions, nor in the arguments of counsel, is there any suggestion that what will be reasonable rates for the public in this case will not also be reasonable rates for the company.

There is another matter which we think may fairly be considered in connection with the reasonableness of rates. We think something may be allowed in this respect for the risks of the original enterprise, if there were any. It is common sense that they who invest their money in hazardous enterprises may reasonably be entitled, for a time, at least, to larger returns than would be the case if the success of the undertaking were assured from the beginning. The plaintiff, in request 11, concedes that such risks may be considered in valuing the franchise. But inasmuch as the value of the franchise depends chiefly upon the net income which may be produced by its exercise at reasonable rates, as has already been stated, it follows, we think, that the reasonableness of the rate may be affected by the degree of risk to which the original enterprise was naturally subjected. This does not mean unforeseen or emergent risks, but such as may have been justly contemplated by those who made the original investment. We use the word "chiefly," because we apprehend that a franchise, even of an unprofitable business, might have a temporary value for some purposes. But that condition does not seem to exist in this case. The element of risk, however, is not controlling. It is only one element. It is to be fairly considered in connection with the other elements named. To say just how much allowance should be made, and for how long a period, requires the exercise of a careful, conservative, and discriminating judgment. If allowance be sought on account of this element of original risk, we think it will be permissible at the same time to inquire to what extent the company has already received income at rates in excess of what would otherwise be reasonable, and thus has already received compensation for this risk. This latter inquiry should be limited to this specific purpose, and is not open, as we shall hold, under plaintiff's request 13.

Thirdly, as to the character and duration of the franchises: It must be evident that the value of the plant and the franchises themselves, whether taken separately or as a whole, is affected by the character and duration of the franchises. Bristol v. Bristol & W. Waterworks, 19 R. I. 413, 32 L. R. A. 740, 34 Atl. 359; Re Brooklyn, 143 N. Y. 596, 26 L. R. A. 270, 38 N. E. 983. An exclusive franchise to do a profitable business is worth more than one which is not exclusive. A perpetual franchise to do a profitable business is, or may be, worth more than one which is subject to repeal.

The plaintiff (request 9) asks an instruction that the franchises now held by the Maine Water Company are in no way exclusive. The defendants suggest that whether the franchises are exclusive, or not, is a question for the appraisers to answer after the charters have been put in evidence, and not for the court, in the first instance, at least. We do not think so. Certain acts incorporating the Waterville Water Company and the Maine Water Company, and granting to them powers and franchises, are referred to in the bill and are admitted by the answer. They are necessarily in the case without further proof. The plaintiff may properly ask for a construction of the franchises granted by those acts. Such construction is a matter of law.

We have not searched for other grants of franchises than those contained in plaintiff's requests 7 and 8. It is not our duty to do so. But we have no hesitation in saying that, so far as the franchises granted by those acts are concerned, they are not exclusive. The legislature may at any time, according to its own wisdom, grant to the municipalities within which this water system is situated franchises similar to the ones in question. It may grant similar franchises to one or more corporations like the Waterville Water Company or the Maine Water Company. Re Brooklyn, 143 N. Y. 596, 26 L. R. A. 270, 38 N. E. 983; Long Island Water Supply Co. v. Brooklyn, 166 U. S. 685, 41 L. ed. 1165, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 718. It has granted similar franchises to this plaintiff, a municipal district, and has even authorized it to take away from the defendant water company all the franchises it holds within the district and Benton and Winslow. Kennebec Water Dist. v. Waterville, 96 Me. 234, 52 Atl. 774. But the defendants say that the Maine Water Company was "practically in the enjoyment of an exclusive franchise," because it had no competitor, although its franchise may not be legally an exclusive one; citing Gloucester Water Supply Co. v. Gloucester, 179 Mass. 365, 60 N. E. 977. And we say that the fact that the company was doing its business without competition may and should be considered by the appraisers when they are valuing the property of the defendant as a going concern. That fact is one of the characteristics of the going business, and may enhance its value. We are considering now only the legal situation of the company. There is a difference between a franchise which is practically exclusive and one which is actually exclusive, as there is a difference between uncertainty and certainty. The distinction is vital in principle, and it may be important in fixing value. Of how much or how little importance it is can only be estimated by the appraisers after hearing the evidence.

Again, the charters under which the company operates are subject to repeal by the legislature. Rev. Stat. chap. 46, § 23. The franchises are not perpetual and irrevocable.

It may be that it is extremely unlikely that the legislature would repeal the charters without providing for compensation in some way. The probabilities are fairly open to consideration. But the legal condition exists. It is a factor to be considered for what it is worth.

Having considered these general propositions, which are far-reaching, and which affect substantially all of the requested instructions, it will now be comparatively easy to pass upon the several requests in the form in which they are presented.

(1) Plaintiff's requests.

The plaintiff, in request 2, asks that the actual cost of the plant and property, together with proper allowances for depreciation, be declared to be legal and competent evidence upon the question of the present value of the same. We so hold. It is competent evidence, but it is not conclusive. It is not a controlling criterion of value, but it is evidence. National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City, 27 L. R. A. 827, 10 C. C. A. 653, 27 U. S. App. 165, 62 Fed. 853; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804; Cotting v. Kansas City Stock-Yards Co. 183 U. S. 79, sub nom. Cotting v. Godard, 46 L. ed. 92, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 30; West Chester & W. Pl. Road Co. v. Chester County, 182 Pa. 40, 37 Atl. 905; Griffin v. Goldsboro Water Co. 122 N. C. 206, 41 L. R. A. 240, 30 S. E. 319. Of course, this element is subject to inquiry as to whether the works were built prudently, and whether they were built when prevailing prices were high, so that actual cost, in such respects, may exceed present value. Rugan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362, 38 L. ed. 1014, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1047; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804.

The remainder of plaintiff's request 2 asks that the companies be directed to produce their book accounts and other documentary evidence bearing upon the question of cost before the appraisers. This request raises no question of law, and cannot be considered by us.

Plaintiff's request 3 ought not to be given in the form in which it is presented, which is that "under no circumstances can the value of the plant of the companies be held to exceed the cost of producing at the present time a plant of equal capacity and modern design." Among other things, it leaves out of account the fact that it is the plant of a "going concern," and it seeks to substitute one of the elements of value for the measure of value itself. Montgomery County v. Schuylkill Bridge Co. 110 Pa. 54, 20 Atl. 407. We shall discuss further the competency of the cost of reproduction when we consider defendants' requests 6 and 7.

We have already discussed sufficiently the first two propositions of plaintiff's request 4. The deduction sought to be established by 60 L. R. A.

the third proposition is that "the actual rates which may have been charged by the companies, and their actual earnings, have no bearing on the value either of the companies' plant or property, or of their franchises, and are immaterial." We cannot say this as a matter of law. As a matter of proof, we think the evidence of such facts is admissible and material. The value of the evidence, however, depends upon whether the appraisers shall find that the rates charged have been reasonable or not. If reasonable, these facts furnish one important test, but not the only one, in fixing the present value of plant and franchises. Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 37 L. ed. 463, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 622. But if the charges have been excessive, past receipts should not be regarded by the appraisers as a proper test of value. Cotting v. Kansas City Stock-Yards Co. 82 Fed. 850.

We omit plaintiff's request 5. In argument, the counsel on both sides seem to agree that the selling price of the capital stock of the water company is not to be considered as affecting the valuation of the property. The plaintiff does so in part on general principles; the defendant, because of the special circumstances of this particular case; and it is immaterial to the present discussion which is right. If the claim of the defendants that the entire capital stock of the Waterville Water Company is owned by the Maine Water Company, and that the capital stock of the Maine Water Company represents, not only the property in the Waterville system, but also of many others in other towns and cities of the state, is found to be correct, certainly the selling price of capital stock will afford no aid in fixing the value of the Waterville system.

We think the appraisers should be instructed in accordance with plaintiff's requests 6 and 10, without any qualification. They ask that the quality of the water furnished and of the service rendered, and the fitness of the plant and of the source of water supply to meet reasonable requirements in the present and future, be deemed material upon the question of present value.

We have already discussed sufficiently plaintiff's requests 7 and 8, and to some extent its request 9. This last request is that "the appraisers shall regard the franchises of the companies as entitling them to continue business as a going concern, but subject to all proper legal duties governing public-service companies." So far, we think the instruction should be given. National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City, 27 L. R. A. 827, 10 C. C. A. 653, 27 U. S. App. 165, 62 Fed. 853; Newburyport Water Co. v. Newburyport, 168 Mass. 541, 47 N. E. 533. The matter of exclusive franchise referred to in this request has already been disposed of. The remainder of the request is that "the franchise shall not be otherwise appraised or valued." In its present form, this is not approved. It is, to say the least, likely to be misleading. If it means to include all of the franchises of the companies, so far as they have been disclosed to us, it is unobjectionable. But if it is intended to include all franchises not now exercised by the going concern, or future extensions of the use of franchises now exercised, it is objectionable. The plaintiff will take all of the franchises of the companies, except the franchise to be a corporation, and for all of these franchises of which it will be deprived the Maine Water Company will be entitled to just compensation.

Plaintiff's request 11, in so far as it says that "in fixing the value of the companies' franchises the appraisers may give such regard as is demanded by ample and fair public policy to the past investment, risks, and services of the companies, and to the reasonably just expectations which those who made the investment had in mind when so investing," is approved. We have already discussed this proposition in a former part of this opinion, relating to reasonable rates, to which we think it properly relates.

The remainder of request 11 is not approved. It is that in fixing the value of the companies' franchises the appraisers may give regard "to the faithfulness or unfaithfulness shown by the companies in the performance of their public duty and obligation to furnish pure water at reasonable rates." We do not think that past faithfulness or unfaithfulness in the exercise of a franchise bears any such relation to the present value of it as to make it a proper matter for consideration. It is the franchise as it now exists which is to be taken and paid for. It is the right to do business now, under and within the charter, which must be appraised, irrespective of the past use of that right. If past misconduct has incidentally resulted in lessened business, that matter will have due consideration under other heads. But in this process of condemnation of property, the owner is not to be punished for past misuse of it.

Requests 12 and 13 may be considered together. They seem to imply that the companies in the past have been unfaithful in the performance of their public duties, both by furnishing impure water and by charging excessive rates, and by reason thereof it is claimed that the companies "have rendered themselves liable to such processes as are appropriate to work legal forfeiture" of their rights and franchises, and that this liability to forfeiture is to be considered in fixing the value of the property. We cannot give our assent to this doctrine. If these franchises have become forfeitable for misbehavior of the companies, the remedy is found in quo warranto brought by the state, and only by the state. Any individual affected by the wrongful conduct of the companies might have invoked the intervention of the state. But this does not seem to have been done. On the contrary, it is proposed to take these franchises as they are. Even if forfeitable, they have not been forfeited. They are in full force and vigor. They must be valued as living franchises, not as dead or moribund. Whether the state would ever institute process for forfeiture, and, if it did, whether the court would find the facts as the appraisers might, are questions so very uncertain that an inquiry concerning them must be purely speculative and unfruitful. To permit this inquiry would be to permit the appraisers to speculate upon what the judgment of the court might be at another trial, under other conditions. We think the franchises must be appraised as they are now held and used by the companies. Whatever the past misconduct may have been, we do not see how it can affect the value of the present right and ability to exercise the franchises. We think, however, that this liability to forfeiture arising from misconduct is to be distinguished from liability to legislative repeal to which we have already alluded. The latter is a limitation of the franchise which inheres in the franchise itself, from its creation. There is no franchise, except as so limited. It is the only kind of a franchise the companies ever held.

Plaintiff's request 13 asks that, if it be found that the companies have actually received more than reasonable rates for the services rendered since operations began, then the amount of such excess shall be deducted from the amount to which the companies would otherwise be entitled. It is not approved. It is sufficient to say that this is not a process of accounting, but one of condemnation of property, for which the owner is entitled by statute and Constitution to just compensation at its present value, without any deduction.

(2) Defendants' requests.

The first paragraph of the defendants' requests presents no question of law, and the second request has already been considered.

Their request 3 is "that any increase of pecuniary obligation or burden or duty, or any damage to or impairment of the value of its remaining property or franchises, in any way resulting to said Maine Water Company by reason of the exercise of the right of eminent domain contemplated by said act of 1899, should be considered by said appraisers, and just compensation therefor should be included." It seems to be assumed in argument, and we assume, that this request is based upon the fact that the Maine Water Company is the owner of other water systems situated at other places. Of course, it cannot refer to any remaining property at Waterville, for there will be none. The argument is that, by depriving the company of its Waterville plant, the general expense of supervision and management will still remain practically unchanged, and will be a proportionately heavier burden upon the remaining property. The language of counsel is that "the economy and efficiency of administration which are sought and obtained by the combination are inevitably more or less impaired by breaking it up, either in whole or in part." The compensation asked is not for property taken, but for incidental damages to other property having no physical connection with or contiguity to that taken, and having no relations whatsoever with the property taken, except those which grow out of common ownership. The defendants rest their claim upon the familiar doctrine of damages for severance, namely, that, when a portion of a property is taken, the impaired value of the remainder, by reason of the severance, may and should be considered, and compensation awarded therefor. But we think this case cannot be brought within that rule. That rule applies only when the property taken and the property left may fairly be considered one property, and not when they are separate and distinct. In Bangor & P. R. Co. v. McComb, 60 Me. 290, Kent, J., after stating the reasons for allowance of damages for severance, uses this language: "The constitutional provision cannot be carried out, in its letter and spirit, by anything short of a just compensation for all the direct damages to the owner of the lot, confined to that lot, occasioned by the taking of his land. The paramount law intends that such owner, so far as that lot is in question, shall be put in as good a condition, pecuniarily, by a just compensation, as he would have been in if that lot of land had remained entire, as his own property. How much less is that lot . . . worth . . . than the whole lot, intact, was the day before such taking?" The implication of this language clearly is that the parcels must be of the same property,—in that case, the same lot. In 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1166, title, Eminent Domain, it is said that, "to entitle an owner to recover damages to the whole tract when a part of his lands have been taken, there must have been a unity of contiguous parcels. The land must have been together. All of it must have been used as a single tract." In 3 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed., at p. 413, the rule is laid down that, "in assessing damages or benefits, the inquiry is limited to the tract of land immediately affected. This is held to be so much as belongs to the proprietor whose land is taken, and is continuous with it, and used together for a common purpose. . . . When land is divided into blocks by the owner, and dealt with as such by himself and purchasers, it is held that each block is to be considered as a separate tract, in estimating damages." Laflin v. Chicago, W. & N. R. Co. 33 Fed. 415. Nor are the two cases which the learned counsel for the defendants say are the only ones found, in which the question of damages for the dismemberment of a public-service corporation by a compulsory taking has been raised, opposed to this doctrine. In Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 37 L. ed. 463, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 622, the general government was proceeding to condemn, under the power of eminent domain, one of the seven locks and dams owned by the navigation company. The court, calling attention to the doctrine of damages by severance, said: "This is a question which may arise, possibly, in this case if the seven locks and dams belonging to the navigation company are so situated as to be fairly considered one property,—a matter in respect to which the record before us furnishes no positive evidence. It seems to be assumed that each lock and dam by itself constitutes a separate structure and separate property, and the thoughts we have suggested are pertinent to such a case." The other case so cited and referred to by counsel is United States v. Gettysburg Electric R. Co. 160 U. S. 668, 40 L. ed. 576, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427. But this case seems rather to be within the rule of the "single tract" cases. The court simply says: "If the part taken by the government is essential to enable the railroad corporation to perform its functions, or if the value of the remaining property is impaired, such facts might enter into the question of the amount of the compensation to be awarded." It was alleged by the company that the effect of the condemnation of the strip of land in question would be to cut off a particular branch railway or extension belonging to it, and destroy its continuity, and prevent its construction. It seems to us clear that the several parts of an electric railway system may properly be regarded as a single property. No other authority cited by the defendants upon this point aids them. The damages occasioned to the company by the taking of the Waterville property, considered with respect to its other and distinct property, if any, will be incidental and consequential. And such damages are not within the statutory and constitutional requirements of "just compensation." Cushman v. Smith, 34 Me. 247; Brooks v. Cedar Brook & S. O. River Improv. Co. 82 Me. 17, 7 L. R. A. 460, 19 Atl. 87.

The defendants' request 4 should be given. It relates to property not directly connected with the water system or plant. It should be appraised "at its fair market value, not at a forced sale, but at what it is fairly worth to the seller, under conditions permitting a prudent and beneficial sale." Chase v. Portland, 86 Me. 367, 29 Atl. 1104; Somerville & E. R. Co. v. Doughty, 22 N. J. L. 495; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1152; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 37 L. ed. 463, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 622; Montgomery County v. Schuylkill Bridge Co. 110 Pa. 54, 20 Atl. 407; West Chester & W. Pl. Road Co. v. Chester County, 182 Pa. 40, 37 Atl. 905. In Chase v. Portland our own court quoted with approval from Laurence v. Boston, 119 Mass. 126, the following: "'Market value' means the fair value of the property, as between one who wants to purchase and one who wants to sell any article; not what could be obtained for it under peculiar circumstances, when a greater than its fair price could be obtained; not its speculative value; not value obtained from the necessities of another. It is what it would bring at a fair public sale, when one party wanted to sell, and the other to buy." Palmer v. Penobscot Lumbering Asso. 90 Me. 193, 38 Atl. 108. The statute provides for fixing the "just compensation" for the property taken at its fair and equitable value, but it does not provide for compensation for consequential damages.

Defendants' request 5 has already been discussed. It should not be given, except as already qualified. We hold that the construction cost is admissible, but not controlling, on the question of present value. It must be borne in mind, as said by Mr. Justice Brewer in National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City, 27 L. R. A. 827, 10 C. C. A. 653, 27 U. S. App. 165, 62 Fed. 853, that "'original cost' and 'present value' are not equivalent terms," and that besides the elements of wear and tear, and depreciation in physical structure or in value, the property may have cost more than it ought to have cost. San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804.

Defendants' requests 6 and 7, as limited in their brief, are that neither the reproduction cost of the existing plant, nor the cost at present of a new one differently constructed, but equal or even superior in efficiency to the one now existing, is the legal criterion of the total values to be awarded, or even of the plant or structure value. This is undoubtedly true, if by "criterion" is meant a sole or controlling test of present value. There are other elements besides cost of reproduction or replacement which affect present value. The present value of the property is of vital importance, for, as we have seen, the value of the property at the time it is being used for the public is one of the elements essential in determining what are then reasonable rates, and question of franchise value depends upon the rates which may reasonably be charged. San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804. We think it will be proper for the appraisers to consider what the existing system can be reproduced or replaced for, because evidence of cost of reproduction will have some tendency to show what is the present value. Such cost will not, however, be conclusive. There are other elements, still to be noticed, which should be considered in fixing present value. In Newburyport Water Co. v. Newburyport, the cost of the reproduction of all of that part of the physical plant used in pumping and delivering water, less any depreciation, was considered without objection and seems to have been approved by the court. Gloucester Water Supply Co. v. Gloucester, 179 Mass. 365, 60 N. E. 977; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 486, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418. But the mere cost of reproduction is not enough. Judge Brewer, in National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City, 27 L. R. A. 827, 10 C. C. A. 653, 27 U. S. App. 165, 62 Fed. 853, calls attention to two additional elements,—one, that it is a completed structure, connected with buildings prepared for use; and the other, that the company is a going concern. He says (p. 827, 27 L. R. A., p. 685, 10 C. C. A., p. 177, 27 U. S. App., and p. 865, 62 Fed.): "Nor would the mere cost of reproducing the waterworks plant be a fair test, because that does not take into account the value which flows from the established connections between the pipes and the buildings of the city. It is obvious that the mere cost of purchasing the land, constructing the buildings, putting in the machinery, and laying the pipes in the streets,—in other words, the cost of reproduction,—does not give the value of the property as it is to-day. A completed system of waterworks, such as the company has, without a single connection between the pipes in the streets and the buildings of the city, would be a property of much less value than that system connected, as it is, with so many buildings, and earning in consequence thereof the money which it does earn. The fact that it is a system in operation, not only with a capacity to supply the city, but actually supplying many buildings in the city,—not only with a capacity to earn, but actually earning,—makes it true that the 'fair and equitable value,' is something in excess of the cost of reproduction."

The court, in San Diego Water Co. v. San Diego, 118 Cal. 556, 38 L. R. A. 460, 50 Pac. 633, holds that the method of fixing present value by ascertaining cost of replacement is not applicable to property of this character, because, chiefly, the construction and development of waterworks is a matter of growth. At the outset the company owning them is a pioneer. It must keep pace with, or anticipate, municipal growth. The works must be constructed, and usually no reward can be realized by the constructors until some time has elapsed. In the meantime, as the city grows, the facilities of building such works are increased, and the cost of construction thereby diminished. But we think that, at the most, these considerations suggest only that other elements are also taken into account in fixing present value. So far as they relate to the original hazard, we have discussed them in an earlier part of this opinion. We think the inquiry along the line of reproduction should, however, be limited to the replacing of the present system by one substantially like it. To enter upon a comparison of the merits of different systems—to compare this one with more modern systems—would be to open a wide door to speculative inquiry, and lead to discussions not germane to the subject. It is this system that is to be appraised, in its present condition and with its present efficiency.

Defendants' request 8 is, in effect, that, in estimating even the structure value of the plant, allowance should be made, in addition to the value as otherwise established, for the fact, if proved, that the water system is a going concern, with a profitable business and good will already established, and with a present income assured and now being earned. We think this instruction, with a modification to be noted, should be given. Newburyport Water Co. v. Newburyport, 168 Mass. 541, 47 N. E. 533; National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City, 27 L. R. A. 827, 10 C. C. A. 653, 27 U. S. App. 165, 62 Fed. 853; Gloucester Water Supply Co. v. Gloucester, 179 Mass. 365, 60 N. E. 977; Bristol

v. Bristol & W. Waterworks, 19 R. I. 413. But the term "good will" may be misleading. Lord Eldon said that good will is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place. Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. Jr. 335. See Flagg Mfg. Co. v. Holway, 178 Mass. 83, 59 N. E. 667. Under any possible definition, it involves an element of personal choice. This phrase is inappropriate where there can be no choice. So far as the defendants' system is "practically exclusive," the element of good will should not be considered. Bristol v. Bristol Waterworks, supra.

The defendants, in request 9, ask that in determining the amount to be added to structure value, in consideration of the fact that the system is a going concern, the appraisers should consider, among other things, the present efficiency of the system, the length of time necessary to construct the same de novo, the time and cost needed after construction to develop such new system to the level of the present one in respect to business and income, and the added net incomes and profits, if any, which, by its acquirement as such going concern, would accrue to a purchaser during the time required for such new construction, and for such development of business and income. We think this instruction should be given. These are all proper matters for consideration "among other things." They are not controlling. Their weight and value depend upon the varying circumstances of each particular case. Of course a plant, as such, already equipped for business, is worth more, if the business be a profitable one, than the mere cost of construction.

The defendants' request 10 should also be given. It asks, in effect, that, in addition to structure values already considered, the appraisers should consider all the franchises, rights, and privileges now held by the Maine Water Company within the Kennebec water district and Benton and Winslow, and allow just compensation for them as such. This valuation, however, must be made with reference to the character and duration of the franchises. So far as appears, they are not exclusive, and they are subject to repeal. This we have already discussed. A franchise is property, and it has value. In this case the franchises have value in themselves, inasmuch as they give the owner the privilege of doing what is called a "profitable business." We have already shown that the existence of such franchises may also enhance the value of the plant by which they are exercised. It should be remembered, however, that a franchise has only one appraisable value, and care should be taken that that value is appraised only once.

The defendants' request 11 should be given in this case. It has been given in part already. It is that the value of a franchise depends upon its net earning power, present and prospective, developed and capable of development, at reasonable rates; that the value to be assessed is the value to the seller, and not to the buyer; and that "just compensation" means full compensation for everything or element of value taken. Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 145 U. S. 312, 37 L. ed. 463, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 622. The appraisal must be made, having in mind what we have already said concerning the character and duration of the franchises and the reasonableness of rates. While, with these limitations, the owner is entitled to receive the value of the franchises, having reference to their prospective use as now developed, and to the future development of their use, consideration must also be had of the fact that further investment may be necessary to develop the use, and of the further fact that at any stage of development the owner of the franchise will be entitled to charge only reasonable rates under the conditions then existing. But subject to such limitations, we think it should be said that the owner is entitled to any appreciation due to natural causes—such as, for instance, the growth of the cities or towns in which the plant is situated. Cotting v. Kansas City Stock-Yards Co. 82 Fed. 850.

Defendants' request 12, "that the fact that the franchises, rights, and privileges of said Maine Water Company are to be taken under this act in no respect destroys or impairs their value to said water company, and cannot diminish or affect the amount to be awarded as just compensation therefor," is approved, and the instruction should be given.

Subject to the suggestions we have made under defendants' request 11, their request 13 is approved, and the instruction should be given. It is as follows: "That in estimating said franchises, and the present and future net earning power included therein, the appraisers should duly weigh the nature and extent of these franchises, rights, and privileges, whether the same are perpetual or otherwise; also, so far as proved, the rights of the Maine Water Company under all existing contracts, and the value thereof; the extent of existing business, and of the net incomes or revenues now derived or derivable therefrom; the existing demand for new and additional services, and for the development and increase of said business, incomes, and revenues; the past and probable future growth or decay of the territory now served, or capable of being served, under said franchises, in population, in wealth, and in needs and uses for water to be supplied by some water system; and the past and probable future increase or decrease in said net incomes and revenues as affected by these or other surrounding conditions; also the fact that by said taking said water company will be wholly and forever deprived of all said franchises, rights, privileges, earning power, incomes, and revenues, and that it is the duty of said appraisers to make, in their sound judgment, just and full compensation to said water company for all the same."

Defendants' request 14 is as follows: "That the true measure of value, under the terms of this act, and under the requirements of the Constitutions of this state and of the United States, is just and full compensation to said water company for each and every thing of value of which it is to be deprived by this taking; that, in addition to the special property covered by request 4, the plant, property, franchises, rights, and privileges now held by said water company within the territory embraced by this act contain distinct elements of value—First, as an asset; and, second, as a source of income, having, or not, present and prospective net earning power; that by the taking under this act said water company will be deprived, wholly and forever, both of said asset and of said source of income; that just compensation to said company for what is thus compulsorily taken from it requires that the sum to be awarded as a substitute therefor shall be the full equivalent of everything taken, both in value as an asset, and in net earning power, and such a sum as, in the sound judgment of the appraisers, will be the full money equivalent of all the plant, property, franchises, rights, and privileges aforesaid, and at the same time, if prudently invested at fair current rates of interest, will yield to said company the same net incomes and revenues, and for the same term, that it will be deprived of by this taking; the net earning power, incomes, and revenues aforesaid to be determined under reasonable water rates, after due allowance, on the one hand, for operating expense and maintenance or depreciation, and, on the other hand, with due regard to the probable future increase or decrease thereof under all conditions affecting the same."

Some portions of this request have already been considered so fully that it is unnecessary to repeat. It is doubtless true that the property to be taken, both plant and franchises, are to be appraised, having in view their value as property in itself, and their value as a source of income. The physical property has value irrespective of the franchise, and the franchise without reference to the physical property. But these two kinds of value practically shade into each other. The value of the physical property is enhanced by the existence of franchises which make it usable. The value of franchises is enhanced by the existence of physical property by which they may be profitably exercised. There are these items of property, but only one entire system. There are all of these elements of value, from which is to be estimated the value of the entire property, tangible and intangible, as a whole. The plaintiff is not to take the physical property without the franchises, nor the franchises without the physical property. It will pay one gross sum as an entire value, and take all the property. The consideration of the elements will be useful only as it will enable the appraisers to fix the just compensation to be paid for the entire property as a whole.

But we cannot assent to the proposition that the capitalization of income, even at reasonable rates, can be adopted as a sufficient or satisfactory test of present value. Such a capitalization would fix at the present time a specific value which would continue for all time to come, as a fixed and unvarying source of income, no matter how conditions may be changed.

Our attention has been called to no case, resting on the same principles as this one does, where the capitalization of profits has been adopted as the test of present value,—certainly not in this country. Take, for instance, the case of Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Edinburgh [1894] A. C. 456, cited by defendants. It does not support the doctrine. In that case the arbitrator declined to value the tramway lines by capitalizing the rental, and upon appeal his assessment was affirmed, and the appeal dismissed. It was held that the statute under which the proceedings were had limited the appraisal to construction value, which the arbitrator had considered in the light of the fact that the tramways were then successfully constructed and in complete working condition; in other words, that the company was a going concern. Lord Watson, in the same case, at page 475, said that valuation by rental "is not a satisfactory method in the case of a tramway line which has never been let, and has no competing line within its district." How much importance is attributed to the last suggestion, is not stated. See National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City, 27 L. R. A. 827, 10 C. C. A. 653, 27 U. S. App. 165, 62 Fed. 853; Newburyport Water Co. v. Newburyport, 168 Mass. 541, 47 N. E. 533. If the franchises were exclusive, if they were perpetual, and if it could be known that what are reasonable rates now would continue to be reasonable, there would be more ground for sustaining such a test. But the franchises are not exclusive. Competition is possible,—even, as the event has shown, more than probable. They are not perpetual, but may be repealed. And what may be reasonable rates at any given time will depend upon conditions which not only may vary, but are likely to vary. Therefore the basis for capitalization is too uncertain to afford a satisfactory test of value. By this we do not mean to say that, while not a test, present and probable future earnings at reasonable rates are not properly to be considered in determining value. We have already stated that they are.

Defendants' request 15 raises no new question of law. It is sufficient to say the Constitution of the United States requires that just compensation should be made to said water company for all its property, of every nature, taken under the act in question, at its full value, not to the taker, but to the seller.

To conclude: The appraisers should be instructed to receive and consider all evidence offered, so far as admissible under the general rules of law, which is pertinent under the rules stated in these requests, so far as they have been approved by this court, and as limited or explained in this opinion.

So ordered.

ALBERT LEA COLLEGE

v.

H. N. BROWN, Admr., etc., of Horatio D. Brown, Deceased, et al., Appts.

(.....Minn.....)

*B. in his lifetime made and delivered to plaintiff, an incorporated charitable educational institution, dependent for the most part upon voluntary contributions for its support (formed under title 3, chap. 34, Gen. Stat. 1894), his promissory note, by which he promised to pay it the sum of $2,500 at a future date; the same to form, by itself, or with other like contributions, a permanent endowment fund for the college. Before it became due, B. died. Plaintiff, through its board of directors, by resolution, accepted the donation before the death of B.; and in reliance thereon, and upon other like donations, continued its work, when without the same it would have been necessary to suspend, and abandon the purposes for which it was incorporated. It was induced thereby to incur debts and obligations, and to solicit subscriptions from others, all of which was known to B. Held, that the promise was sufficiently supported by a consideration, was not revoked by the death of B., and is valid and enforceable against his estate.

(February 13, 1903.)

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Freeborn County directing judgment for plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of a subscription. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Morgan & Meighen, for appellants:

The instrument in question was a complete and independent offer to make a gift, and could not be enlarged or extended by any act of the plaintiff. It was subject to withdrawal or revocation at any time until executed, and could only be executed by payment or some act of the donor in furtherance or execution of the gift; and it was completely annulled and revoked by the death of the donor before the time fixed for fulfillment.

Rice v. Rice, 68 Ala. 216; 1 Parsons, Contr. 6th ed. p. 454.

Mr. H. C. Carlson, for respondent:

The instrument in question is a promise to pay upon condition that the payee undertake the obligation stipulated in the instrument.

In case it is accepted by the payee, there are certain obligations prescribed which must be performed by the payee.

Amherst Academy v. Cows, 6 Pick. 427, 17 Am. Dec. 387; Williams College v. Danforth, 12 Pick. 541; Troy Conference Academy v. Nelson, 24 Vt. 189; Maine Cent. Inst. v. Haskell, 73 Me. 140; Barnett v. Franklin College, 10 Ind. App. 103, 37 N. E. 427.

The acceptance of Mr. Brown's conditional offer constituted a promise for a promise, and made a valid contract, and the assuming of obligations and incurring of liabilities in reliance thereon were a valid consideration for Mr. Brown's promise.

Where the subscription is coupled with a condition or request to be performed by the payee, and the payee has accepted the subscription so conditioned, or has complied with the conditions upon which the subscription is made, it constitutes a promise for a promise, and the instrument is held valid.

Although the original subscription paper was void for want of consideration, yet, if, relying thereon, the promisee had properly expended money for the common object, or incurred liabilities upon the faith thereof, it might recover.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover against the estate of Horatio D. Brown, deceased, the amount of a promissory note by him delivered to plaintiff in his lifetime, by which he promised to pay plaintiff the sum of $2,500 for the purposes and upon the terms and conditions therein specified. Plaintiff had judgment in the court below, and defendants, heirs of the deceased, appealed from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The facts are as follows: Plaintiff, Albert Lea College, is a corporation formed January 13, 1881, under and pursuant to title 3, chap. 34, Gen. Stat. 1894, for the purpose of conducting a college for the education of young women, with power to establish and conduct a preparatory or academic department, on principles in sympathy with the religious teachings of the Presbyterian Church. Soon after its incorporation it acquired suitable buildings and other property for its accommodation, and has ever since carried on and conducted the college in all respects as required by law and its articles of association. It is charitable in its nature, and not conducted for a pecuniary profit to its members. The government of its affairs has been at all times vested in a board of trustees, one of whom, from the organization of the college until his death, was decedent, Brown, whose efforts in its support, pecuniary, and otherwise, from the time of its formation, were of substantial benefit, and contributed much to its success. On May 23, 1901, he executed and delivered to its trustees a promissory note, in form and effect, though not negotiable, in the following language: "On or before one year from date, for value rec'd, I promise to pay to the Albert Lea College twenty-five hundred dollars, to be used as an endowment,—either as a separate endowment, or toward a larger one. The income to be used as directed by the board of trustees. This does not draw interest either before or after date." Thereafter, on June 12th, following the delivery of the note, the board of trustees accepted the same, and, to that end, duly adopted a resolution in the following language: "Resolved, that the board of trustees hereby accept the donation of Hon. H. D. Brown of the sum of $2,500 toward an endowment for Albert Lea College, and the board hereby extends to Mr. Brown its hearty thanks for this manifestation of his generosity, which, in connection with his many previous contributions of time, money, and effort, will make possible a future for Albert Lea." Decedent was duly notified of the acceptance by a copy of the resolution being transmitted to him. On August 3, 1901, subsequent to the delivery of the note and its acceptance by the plaintiff, Brown died, but prior thereto no part of the note had ever been paid; it was not yet due; and the trustees presented the same to the probate court having jurisdiction of the administration of his estate for allowance. From the decision of that court an appeal was taken to the district court, where, after trial without a jury, plaintiff had judgment. The trial court found, among other matters of fact, that, in addition to the sums of money received from tuition from time to time, it has always been necessary to meet the expenses of the college, to a large degree, by voluntary donations from persons charitably disposed, who were interested in the perpetuation of the college and the accomplishment of its objects, without which it would have been obliged to abandon the purposes for which it was incorporated; that on the 23d of May, 1901, the trustees deemed it necessary, for the relief of the college from financial embarrassment, and for its continued existence, to authorize the solicitation of money for the purpose of paying outstanding indebtedness, and of establishing a permanent endowment fund for the college; that decedent, being a member of the board of trustees, and an active supporter of the college, was familiar with its condition, and with the purposes of the board in soliciting such subscriptions, and, to aid and assist this object, delivered to them the note in question. The court further found that if the said Brown and others had not contributed to the support of the college, either toward an endowment fund, or for the payment of its debts, it would have been necessary for the college to have suspended its work, and to have abandoned the objects for which it was incorporated, all of which was known to Brown at the time he made and delivered the note in question; that, relying upon this subscription, the trustees were encouraged to continue, and have since then continued, the work of the college, solicited other subscriptions, and expended money received therefrom in the payment of teachers' wages and other expenses of the institution. Upon these facts the court below ordered judgment for plaintiff. Three questions are presented to this court: (1) Whether certain evidence offered by plaintiff for the purpose of showing a consideration for the execution of the note was competent and admissible; (2) whether the findings of the trial court in the respects just referred to are sustained by the evidence; and (3) whether, upon the whole record, the note upon which the action is founded was a valid and binding obligation.

1. At the trial plaintiff offered certain testimony upon which it relied to establish consideration for the note. This testimony tended to show that decedent was a trustee of the college; was familiar with its financial condition, and its inability to continue in its objects without voluntary contributions; that without such contributions it would have been necessary to suspend; and that the trustees relied upon this and other like contributions in the further prosecution of the work of the college. Defendants assign the admission of this evidence, which was properly objected to on the trial, as error. Whether this error is well assigned will depend, to a certain extent, upon the legal principles applicable to executory agreements of this character, which will be considered in connection with the third question. It may be observed, however, in passing, that, generally speaking, evidence to show the actual consideration of a written contract, when the writing does not fully and distinctly express it, is always admissible. The note given by Brown does not express the consideration of his agreement to pay the college the amount of money there mentioned, any further than the words "for value rec'd" may be said to disclose it; and it was clearly competent, in view of the fact that the principal question in the case was whether a consideration was received for the note, to offer any evidence which would tend to prove that fact. Bolles v. Sachs, 37 Minn. 315, 33 N. W. 802; Keuka College v. Ray, 167 N. Y. 98, 60 N. E. 325; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 765.

2. As to the second proposition, namely, that the findings of the trial court are not sustained by the evidence, we have only to say that the record has been very carefully examined, and, though the evidence is not so clear and specific in some respects as might be desired, we regard it as sufficient to sustain them. And we pass to the principal question,—whether, upon the facts as found, in the light of the evidence as it appears in the record, the note in question is valid and enforceable against the estate of decedent. It was a promise to donate or give the amount stated in the note at a future day, but before the time for its performance the promisor died, and the question presented is whether his death revoked the promise. The contention of appellant is that the note was a complete and independent offer to make a gift, and could not be enlarged or extended by any act of the plaintiff, by resolution of acceptance or otherwise; that it was subject to withdrawal or revocation at any time until executed, and could only be executed by payment, or by some act of the donor in furtherance or execution of the gift; and that it was completely annulled and revoked by the death of the donor before the time fixed for its fulfillment.

3. The question as to the validity of executory agreements or contracts of the character of that here involved has often been before the courts, from the earliest period of reported cases to the present time. In the earlier cases such agreements were almost uniformly held invalid, for want of a sufficient consideration to support them. They were treated as mere naked promises of a future gift, and subject to revocation, either by refusal to perform, or by the death of the promisor. But by some of the later authorities a very different view has been taken, and such contracts have been sustained upon broad and substantial grounds. Several distinct phases of the question are presented by the authorities, which are summed up in a note to Cottage Street M. E. Church v. Kendall (Mass.) 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 548. In most of the earlier reported cases such promises were held void for want of a consideration,—i. e., a pecuniary consideration moving to the promisor,—and this without regard to whether the promisee had expended money or incurred liabilities in reliance upon the promise. It is held in other cases that, where several persons sign a subscription paper by which they agree to pay a specified amount for a common public purpose, the promise of each is a consideration for the promise of the others, and the payee may enforce the promise against each and all. This class of cases can have no application to that at bar, for here the promise was by Brown alone, and was not induced by, nor dependent upon, the promise of any other person or persons. Still another class of cases, to which this case may properly be said to belong, holds that, though no consideration passed to the promisor at the time of his promise, yet if, relying thereon, the promisee incurred liabilities or expended money in furtherance of the purposes of the subscription, or assumed and became responsible for the performance of the conditions imposed by the donor, the promise is valid and enforceable. The liabilities incurred in reliance upon the promise, and the obligations assumed by its acceptance, are treated as a sufficient consideration to support the contract. The cases we have referred to involved donations or subscriptions to charitable, religious, or educational institutions, and disclose a very decided conflict of authority upon the question. They are cited in the note to Cottage Street M. E. Church v. Kendall (Mass.) 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 548. One of the first cases to depart from the earlier decisions, which held strictly to the necessity of a pecuniary consideration moving to the promisor, is Collier v. Baptist Education Soc. 8 B. Mon. 68. In that case a promissory note was given, whereby the maker promised and agreed to pay the Kentucky Baptist Educational Society the sum of $250, to further the interests and aid in the payment of the expenses of its management. The maker refused to pay the note when due, and an action was brought against him to recover thereon. There was no pecuniary consideration moving to him, nor does it appear that the society to which it was given ever incurred any debts or obligations upon the strength of it; but the court held the maker of the note liable, on the ground that as the charter of the society authorized it to accept and receive such donations and gifts, and it was required, under the law, to carry out the directions of donor, 60 L. R. A.

a sufficient consideration was shown. A well-considered case (also a departure from the old rule) is Troy Conference Academy v. Nelson, 24 Vt. 180. In that case defendant, with others, signed a subscription paper, thereby promising to pay to the trustees of the academy the sum of $100 for the purpose of enabling them to pay its debts, provided the sum of $20,000 was subscribed for the same purpose by a certain date. This amount was fully subscribed. Defendant paid one half of his subscription, but refused to pay the balance. The court held that the obligations imposed upon and assumed by the trustees of the academy to make application of the money as directed by the subscribers to the fund so consummated the contract that defendant could not avoid payment on the ground that there was no consideration for his promise, and that, whether the relation each subscriber bore to the other, or the relation each bore to the academy itself, be considered, defendant was estopped from denying the obligation of the contract. It will be observed in that case that the executory promise of defendant was for the purpose of raising a fund to discharge a past-due indebtedness of the academy, and nothing appears to have been done by the officers in reliance on the promise. In the case of Amherst Academy v. Cowle, 6 Pick. 427, 17 Am. Dec. 387, the court held a promissory note by defendant, by which he agreed to pay plaintiff, an educational institution, a sum of money to further its objects and purposes,—viz., to educate indigent young men of promising talents and hopeful piety,—valid and enforceable, though it does not appear that any particular obligations were contracted by the officers of the institution on the faith of the promise. The court said: "Was there a consideration for this note? In one sense, there was not, that is, the promisor received nothing from the payees [at the time it was given] which was of a pecuniary value; but it is quite sufficient to create a consideration that the other party, the payee, should have assumed an obligation in consequence of receiving the note, which he was compellable, either at law or equity, to perform, unless the promisor should be able to show, when sued, that the payee had refused, or was unable, or had unreasonably neglected to perform the engagement on his part, in which case a defense might be raised on the ground of a failure of the consideration." The case of Irvin v. Lombard University, 56 Ohio St. 9, sub nom. Irvin v. Webster, 36 L. R. A. 239, 46 N. E. 63, sustains the validity of an executory agreement similar to that involved in the case at bar. The court there said, in part: "The general course of decisions is favorable to the binding obligation of such promises. They have been influenced, not only by such reasons as those already stated, but in some cases, at least, by state policy, as indicated by constitutional and statutory provisions. The policy of this state, as so indicated, is promotive of education, religion, and philanthropy. In addition to the declarations of the Constitution upon the subject, the policy of the state is indicated by numerous legislative enactments providing for the incorporation of colleges, churches, and other institutions of philanthropy, which are intended to be perpetual, and which, not only for their establishment, but for their perpetual maintenance, are authorized to receive contributions from those who are in sympathy with their purpose and methods,—the only source from which, in view of their nature, their support can be derived. Looking to the plainly declared purpose of the law-making department, promises made with a view to discharging the debts of such institutions, to providing the means for the employment of teachers, to establish endowment funds to give them greater stability and efficiency, and whatever may be necessary or helpful to accomplish their purpose or secure their permanency, must be held valid. A view which omits considerations of this character is too narrow to be technically correct. It is not contemplated by the parties, nor is it required by the law, that in cases of this character the institution shall have done a particular thing in reliance upon a particular promise. . . . All promisors understand that the proceeds of their promises will be mingled with prior and subsequent donations, and together constitute the financial support of the enterprise." And the accomplishment of the purposes of the enterprise, and the binding obligation to devote contributions to the purposes intended by the donors, was held a sufficient consideration to support the promise. Some of the cases go so far as to spell out a consideration by implication. Maine Cent. Inst. v. Haskell, 73 Me. 140. In that case the promised gift or donation was for the purpose of aiding in the erection of a school building, and the promisor died before the time for its performance. His executors defended in an action to recover upon his promise, upon the ground that it was without consideration and void. But the court held that, as the trustees of the donee had accepted the donation, and entered upon the work of constructing the building, there was a sufficient consideration, and the estate was held liable. The court said: It is true that no consideration was actually received by the donor, "but one is plainly implied, if not expressed, from the language used. The promise was of money for a specified purpose, 'to make up a building fund for said institution.' . . . It is not, of course, binding upon the promisor until accepted by the promisee, and may, up to that time, be considered as a revocable promise. But when so accepted, and much more when the execution of the trust has been entered upon,—when money has been expended in carrying out the purpose contemplated,—it becomes a completed contract, binding upon both parties: the promise to pay, and at least the implied promise to execute, each being a consideration for the other."

Many of the authorities cited by appellants sustain and support their position, but we prefer not to follow them. They apply with too much strictness the general principles of law applicable to ordinary contracts,—usual and everyday business transactions,—where a substantial pecuniary consideration or benefit to each of the parties is the object they have in view in entering into contracts. A legal consideration does not necessarily mean a pecuniary gain, and it is not essential to the validity of a contract that a benefit or gain of such a nature move to the person assuming an obligation. It is sufficient if any advantage or benefit result to him, or any detriment or injury to the other party, by his failure to keep his agreement. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 677 et seq. In the case at bar the trustees, upon the delivery of the note to them, expressly accepted the same, and thereby assumed the obligations imposed by the terms of the promise; and upon the strength of this promise, and others, were enabled to continue the purposes of the college, when, without it, it would have been necessary that they suspend operations and dissolve the corporation. As already stated, plaintiff was incorporated as an educational institution, and depended for its support, and to enable it to carry out its purposes, upon donations of philanthropists, and other charitably disposed persons. Such institutions are expressly authorized, under the provisions of the statute under which plaintiff was incorporated, to accept and receive such donations, and may be compelled and required by the courts to carry out faithfully the purposes of a particular donation. Money contributed to it for the purpose of an endowment fund may not be diverted from that purpose, and its application may be compelled by proper judicial proceedings. Many of the colleges of the present day depend almost wholly upon voluntary contributions for their support, and philanthropists who contribute thereto are impelled to do so by their sentiments of charity, benevolence, and good will; and the opportunity amply repays the outlay, and to them is far greater than any considerations of a pecuniary nature.

The question whether the evidence received by the trial court over defendants' objection, before adverted to, was admissible, must be determined in the light of these considerations and the authorities cited. We have no difficulty in holding that a sufficient consideration is shown to support the agreement. It is true that the promise was to contribute the sum of $2,500 toward an endowment fund for the college and that the amount if paid, could not, as suggested by appellants, be diverted by the trustees from that purpose. It could not be used in the payment of expenses. But the note expressly provided that the proceeds therefrom should be disposed of as the trustees should from time to time determine.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

STILLWATER WATER COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

H. C. FARMER, Resp't.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. Except for the benefit and improvement of his own premises, or for his own beneficial use, the owner of land has no right to drain, collect, or divert percolating waters thereon, when such acts will destroy or materially injure the spring of another person, the waters of which spring are used by the general public for domestic purposes. He must not drain, collect, or divert such waters for the sole purpose of wasting them.

2. An action may be maintained by an injured party to restrain and prohibit such waste.

(February 27, 1903.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Washington County refusing to grant a motion for new trial after verdict in favor of defendant in an action brought to restrain interference with percolating waters. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. N. Searles, for appellant:

The doctrine of reasonable use qualifies the otherwise absolute right of an owner to dispose of percolating water.

The question is not whether he acts maliciously, but, is he making a reasonable use of his property rights in view of the consequences to his neighbor or the public?

Defendant's excavation does already, and, if continued as threatened, will, increasingly lower the height of the surface of a surface stream by withdrawing water therefrom after it has reached the stream; and this cannot be done by percolation.

The facts that plaintiff is a corporation engaged in supplying the city of Stillwater with water, and that it is bound by contract so to do, and has expended large sums of money to erect a plant, do not give it any greater or additional rights to the aid of the court than any person using the water for domestic and private purposes.

That the acts of the defendant in excavating upon his land were done maliciously, and for the purpose of destroying the plaintiff's spring on this land, is immaterial.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought to restrain the defendant from interfering with subsurface waters, which, percolating through the ground served in part to supply a spring situated upon plaintiff's property, which spring the latter uses to furnish its patrons, the people of Stillwater, with water for domestic use; the plaintiff's business under its charter being to provide the city and its inhabitants with water for both fire and domestic purposes. For other than domestic purposes water is taken from McKusick lake by plaintiff company, but it must rely upon this spring, which is quite large, and others, much smaller, for a supply for domestic use. The action was dismissed when plaintiff rested at the trial below upon the ground that it had failed to establish a cause of action. The case comes here upon a bill of exceptions on appeal from an order refusing to grant plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Whatever may have been the issue tried in the court below, it is very evident, and both parties now concede, that there is but a single question here. It is a new and important one, not without difficulty of determination, and upon which there seem to be very few cases to which we may look for assistance. The plaintiff corporation owns and uses for its mains a narrow strip of land running from McKusick lake through a ravine which finally terminates in the vicinity of Lake St. Croix. At one time this ravine was the bed of a small brook, the outlet of McKusick lake, but a running stream no longer exists. Part way down this ravine is the spring around which the plaintiff has built a circular wall about 6 feet in diameter. On the south it is less than 1 foot from this wall to the line of land owned by defendant, and upon the east the line is only 3 feet distant. Some time ago, on his own land, near the boundary line and about 10 feet from the center of the spring, the defendant excavated a trench, into which percolating waters were drained and gathered in quantities sufficient to materially affect the supply at the spring itself. In this trench he placed a 3-inch pipe, which is used to supply water for his livery barn, some distance away. This supply comes from a small spring on one side of the excavation, which defendant has walled up so that its waters do not mingle with those gathered in the bottom of the trench. Of the pipe and its use plaintiff makes no complaint. In the bottom of the trench the defendant then placed a 10-inch tile pipe, and connected it with the city sewer. By means of the trench percolating waters were and are drawn away from plaintiff's spring, where they would naturally and otherwise go, are gathered in the bottom of the trench, and are then conducted to the city sewer through the 10-inch pipe. Therefore waters naturally supplying the big spring, and used by plaintiff for the public good, are drained and diverted, and, instead of serving the wants of the people, are dissipated and lost. By this draining and diversion the waters in the spring were lowered and reduced 1 or 2 inches. Upon discovering the effect of the 10-inch pipe upon the spring, plaintiff made some changes in the outlet through which the water ran and in its mains for its own protection and benefit, whereupon, defendant commenced to relay his 10-inch pipe on a lower level, beginning at its intersection with the city sewer, and working toward the trench. When a portion of this pipe had been relaid, and while defendant was engaged in the work, plaintiff secured a temporary injunction restraining him from further relaying upon this lower level. The defendant, according to the testimony, threatens to continue such work, and to bring the pipe into the trench, so that when it connects with the water it will be at least 15 inches below the outlet of the main used by plaintiff to secure its supply from this spring. The effect is evident and the court below found that, if the connection is made, as intended, there will be imminent danger that so large a portion of the waters, which now naturally flow into, and, in the absence of the trench, would continue to percolate and collect in, the plaintiff's spring, will be diverted therefrom, and drained into the trench, from thence through the pipe and into the city sewer, that plaintiff's water supply will be thereby diminished to such an extent as to wholly incapacitate and prevent it from furnishing the city and its inhabitants with sufficient water for domestic use, as it is obliged to do under its contract with the city, the result being to deprive the people of wholesome water, to destroy the plaintiff's business, and to render its plant valueless. Stated in a few words the plaintiff engaged in supplying the people of Stillwater with spring water for domestic purposes is seeking to prevent the defendant from digging a trench so close to its own means of supply as to divert and drain percolating waters, to ruin that supply and to deprive the people of pure water for domestic uses, for the sole purpose, so far as appears in this case, of wasting these waters into a city sewer.

The question in this case, reduced to its last analysis, involves the defendant's right to collect by drainage these fugitive subsurface waters, and then to waste them, to the annihilation of plaintiff's business, and to the great discomfort and injury of the people who depend upon the plaintiff for water for domestic use. The books are full of cases in which the rights of an owner of the soil to collect and control percolating waters are considered and determined. A brief and comprehensive general statement of the law pertaining to the subject is found in Pixley v. Clark, 35 N. Y. 520, 91 Am. Dec. 72, where it is said: "An owner of the soil may divert percolating water, consume or cut it off, with impunity. It is the same as land, and cannot be distinguished in law from land. So the owner of the land is the absolute owner of the soil and of percolating water, 60 L. R. A.

which is a part of, and not different from, the soil. No action lies against the owner for interfering with or destroying percolating or circulating water under the earth's surface." This doctrine and the reasons for it are well stated in Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294, in the following language: "In the absence of express contract and of positive authorized legislation, as between proprietors of adjoining land, the law recognizes no correlative rights in respect to underground waters percolating, oozing, or filtrating through the earth; and this mainly from considerations of public policy: (1) Because the existence, origin, movement, and course of such waters, and the causes which govern and direct their movements, are so secret, occult, and concealed that an attempt to administer any set of legal rules in respect to them would be involved in hopeless uncertainty, and would be therefore, practically impossible. (2) Because any such recognition of correlative rights would interfere to the material detriment of the commonwealth, with drainage and agriculture, mining, the construction of highways and railroads, with sanitary regulations, building and the general progress of improvement in works of embellishment and utility." From this statement, which is really a synopsis of the reasons which have been given again and again for the established doctrine governing percolating waters, it is manifest that considerations of public policy have been of great and controlling weight in shaping the conclusions of the courts. Legal rules, it is said, would be involved in hopeless uncertainty if an attempt was made to administer them in respect to such waters, and any recognition of correlative rights would interfere, to the material detriment of the state, with the general improvement of the soil. In so far as the rules laid down in the opinions from which we have quoted are applicable to a given set of facts, there is no reason why they should not be followed in this court, for they are in harmony with all that has been said in the cases heretofore before us involving the rights of landowners with respect to running streams and surface waters. Nor do they conflict in the least with the doctrine which will uphold an owner of land in diverting and disposing of percolating waters for his own beneficial use, either as a water supply for himself or others or for the improvement and drainage of his own land. If, for illustration, the excavation had been made for any purpose useful to defendant, such as supplying his buildings with water, or as a means to drain or improve his own land, we should have a case altogether different, on the facts, from that now before us. If the collection of these waters was essential and necessary that defendant might use them for any reasonable purpose, or, even if, from the evidence, it could be found that he was competing with the plaintiff, and proposed to use the waters for a public purpose, or if it were necessary that the natural conditions of his land should be disturbed and subsurface waters drained in order to improve it, then there would be very little doubt as to the rule to be applied, and of the correctness of the conclusion reached by the court below. But such is not the situation presented by this record. The facts are not seriously in dispute, and they have compelled defendant's counsel to take the position that their client, as owner of the soil, has an absolute and unqualified right to collect, divert, and waste these percolations, although the plaintiff, by these apparently unnecessary and capricious acts, is and will be further, to a greater extent, and almost wholly, deprived of waters heretofore appropriated and used by it to supply the people of Stillwater with a pure article for domestic purposes, and to their great injury.

The acts which the defendant has performed, which he proposes to continue, and to render more obnoxious and injurious by further and unnecessary drainage of waters which naturally make their way into plaintiff's spring, have not been and are not done for his own benefit, or for the beneficial use and enjoyment of his own property, but for some purpose not apparent from the record, and which can only be surmised. If, however, he has the legal right to perform these acts, the authorities are abundant, and seemingly unanimous, to the effect that his motive and purpose are immaterial. But we have arrived at the conclusion that, irrespective and independent of his motive, he has no absolute legal right to collect these subsurface waters solely that they may be wantonly wasted, and that he may be restrained from so doing. It is true that this action must be disposed of upon principles involving natural rights of property, and, while we are first to look to the extent of the defendant's ownership in the land in which he has dug the trench, we are not to altogether lose sight of the fact that he has collected the water for no worthy purpose, and that he is squandering it, to the injury of the public. Having this very situation in mind, a learned text-book writer has suggested that the maxim, Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cælum, is not strictly and absolutely applicable to all of the relations of adjoining land proprietors. "It is obvious," he says, "that neighbors cannot be mutually indifferent to each other's doings." As applicable to their relations and their acts, this author further says: "The common law, otherwise so jealous of such interference between the owner and his property, imposes upon him the simple rule, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. Angell, Water Courses, 7th ed. §114. In Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 517, 84 Am. Dec. 511, it was said, when commenting upon the maxim last quoted, that "confessedly the absolute dominion of a proprietor over his land to the center of the earth is restrained by it." This maxim has been repeatedly recognized in this court when considering the perplexing subject of surface waters, and it has been held that they must be used and disposed of so as not to unnecessarily injure another person. And an examination of the cases in which the maxim, "Whose is the soil, his it is even to heaven and to the middle of the earth," has been applied, discloses that in nearly every one the person interrupting, collecting, and diverting percolating waters upon his own land was doing so that he might improve and benefit it, or was himself making some beneficial use of the fugitive waters with which he was interfering. We see no reason why the maxim, "So use your own property as not to injure another," should not be applied, in a proper case, to percolating waters, or why the limitation found therein is not pertinent when reason and justice suggest the need of it, or why the doctrine of reasonable use and correlative rights should not be applicable where the owner of the soil, for no beneficial purpose to himself or to his estate, and to the positive injury of his neighbor or the public, insists upon turning pure spring water into a city sewer, that it may be absolutely wasted. And this doctrine of correlative rights and obligations between landowners respecting the appropriation and use of percolating waters has been maintained in at least one state. Bassett v. Salisbury Mfg. Co. 43 N. H. 569, 82 Am. Dec. 179; Sweett v. Cutts, 50 N. H. 439, 9 Am. Rep. 276—in which the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, was applied, and it was held that no good reason could be given why it should not be applicable in all cases where the rights of owners of adjoining lands to collect and use percolating waters are in apparent, although not real, hostility. The subject of wholesome water for domestic purposes in our cities is fast becoming one of overwhelming importance, and the courts may have to step forward and out of the beaten paths to formulate additional, and perhaps new, rules in order to protect our citizens and to preserve for their use a wholesome and sufficient supply. It may become absolutely necessary, in order to secure the public health, that noticeable departures be made from the doctrines which have heretofore prevailed, but which have become inefficient, inapplicable, or, possibly, radically wrong, under changed and developing conditions. When that time comes, and the subject is presented, no court should feel itself bound to adhere to a previously announced rule of law, for which no substantial reason can be given, or for which a good ground no longer exists. Great injury, distress, and disaster to the public must be prevented, although time-honored precedents, of no value are swept aside. The justification for such a course lies, as it often does in matters for legislative action, in the fact that the public is vitally and sufficiently interested and must be protected. In Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 19 L. R. A. 395, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 545, 54 Fed. 751, the following language, which should meet the approval of every equity court, was used: "Every just order or rule known to equity courts was born of some emergency, to meet some new conditions, and was, therefore, in its time, without a precedent. If based on sound principles, and beneficial results follow their enforcement, affording necessary relief to the one part without imposing illegal burdens on the other, new remedies and unprecedented orders are not unwelcome aids to the chancellor to meet the constantly varying demands for equitable relief."

But in holding as we do, and in laying down a rule which confessedly is something of a departure from the general doctrine found in the books, and is an advanced position we are not really discarding the maxim, Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cælum, or doing violence to any of the reasons which have been given for it. We are not involving any set of legal rules in hopeless uncertainty, and therefore rendering their application practically impossible, for the rule which we adopt is not only just, but it is exceedingly plain, certain, practical, and easy to apply to real conditions. Nor will our recognition of the doctrine of correlative rights interfere in any manner with material improvements, to the detriment of the state. On the contrary, it will tend to promote the prosperity and general welfare of all citizens whose necessities bring them within its influence. Nor are we entirely without authority for such a doctrine. We therefore formulate and announce the rule governing the facts here to be that, except for the benefit and improvement of his own premises, or for his own beneficial use, the owner of land has no right to drain, collect, or divert percolating waters thereon, when such acts will destroy or materially injure the spring of another person, the waters of which spring are used by the general public for domestic purposes. He must not drain, collect, or divert such waters for the sole purpose of wasting them. Briefly stated, a landowner must not collect and wantonly waste percolating waters which would otherwise be, or have theretofore been, appropriated by his neighbor for the general welfare of the people. If he does, an action to restrain and prohibit such waste may be maintained by the party injured.

Attention is here called, as an authority for this proposition, to Smith v. Brooklyn, 18 App. Div. 340, 46 N. Y. Supp. 141, an exceedingly well written and able opinion, affirmed in 160 N. Y. 357, 45 L. R. A. 664, 54 N. E. 787. It was there said, in substance, that it seemed clear from the reasoning in several cases, which were cited, that the right to collect and appropriate percolating waters, which right has always been upheld, relates to the beneficial use of the waters, or to the beneficial use of the land for some purposes for which it can be used connected with its enjoyment as land, for the ordinary purposes of agriculture, mining, domestic purposes, or improvement, either public or private; and it was held—going much further than necessary in this case, and establishing a radical rule—that the owner of land could not gather percolating water by pumps, or by natural means, that it might be carried to a distant place for the use of strangers, having no right to it, in a case where the inevitable result would be to destroy a spring upon the land of an adjoining owner. The right, said the court, is predicated upon the right of the owner to benefit the land itself, or to himself enjoy the beneficial use of the waters found in the soil thereof. The doctrine we now lay down has been to some extent recognized in other cases, although the exact question was not presented. See Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49; Pisley v. Clark, 35 N. Y. 520, 91 Am. Dec. 72; Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294; Burroughs v. Satterlee, 67 Iowa, 396, 56 Am. Rep. 350, 25 N. W. 808; Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528, 64 Am. Dec. 721; Collins v. Chartiers Valley Gas Co. 131 Pa. 143, 6 L. R. A. 280, 18 Atl. 1012; and the New Hampshire cases before referred to. In no case brought under our observation has the right of the owner of the soil to collect percolating waters that he may dissipate and waste them been recognized or upheld. This doctrine also finds support in the reasoning found in the opinions filed in the somewhat noted case of Ohio Oil Co. v. State, 150 Ind. 698, 50 N. E. 1124, Affirmed in 177 U. S. 190, 44 L. ed. 729, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576. The legislature of the state of Indiana had prohibited the wasting of natural gas and petroleum oil from wells by permitting the escape of either into the open air. An action was brought and successfully maintained by the state to enjoin and restrain an oil company from allowing natural gas to escape and waste in violation of the statute. The rules which govern subsurface waters, coal oil, and natural gas—all minerals—are the same under the authorities, and the arguments made in that case in behalf of the defendant and in support of the contention that the statute was unconstitutional were based upon the claim that, as the gas in or under the defendant's land is part of the land itself, which was conceded, the owner of the soil had the lawful right to assert absolute dominion over all that is found in or under it, including all minerals, to the center of the earth, and for an unlimited distance upwards from the earth's surface—the exact claim asserted here. It was there held that the statute was constitutional, and that the state, representing its citizens, had the right, as a matter of public policy, to maintain the action, and to forever restrain and enjoin the defendant from violating the prohibitory law. The learned arguments found in the opinions rendered in the state and Federal courts are pertinent to the present case.

Order reversed, and a new trial granted.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

Clemanda GLADNEY et al., Appts.,
v.
Thomas G. SYDNOR et al., Respts.

(.....Mo.....)

1. The right of a man to convey or encumber his homestead without co-operation of his wife, as allowed by law, is a vested one, notwithstanding it may be defeated by the filing by the wife of a claim as prescribed by statute; and the legislature cannot destroy the right as to existing homesteads.
2. A vested right of a man to convey his homestead without the co-operation of his wife is impaired by a statute making him incapable of conveying it unless his wife joins in the conveyance.
3. A deprivation of right, and not merely a change in remedy or procedure, is effected by a statute which forbids a man to sell his homestead without the co-operation of his wife, where, therefore, he might do so unless the wife filed a claim as prescribed by statute.

(February 24, 1903.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lincoln County in favor of defendants in a suit to enjoin the sale of property under a trust deed. Affirmed.

Statement by Fox, J.:

This was an action commenced by the appellants in the Lincoln county circuit court on the 3d day of October, 1899, to enjoin a sale under a certain deed of trust, and to cancel and hold for naught said deed. The petition contains substantially the following allegations: "First. Clemanda Gladney, the real plaintiff, stated that she was, and since 1859 had been, the wife of her coplaintiff, George W. Gladney; that Thomas G. Sydnor was the sheriff of Lincoln county, Missouri; that the land described in the petition, consisting of 173.74 acres, had been owned and occupied by George W. Gladney as a homestead for a great many years, all of it since 1884, and that during all that time plaintiff and George W. Gladney, as husband and wife, had owned and occupied the same as a homestead; that on the 25th day of May, 1897, George W. Gladney, without the knowledge and consent of plaintiff Clemanda Gladney, his wife, executed and delivered to George O. Hamilton, trustee, for the use and benefit of Ellen E. Wilson, a deed of trust, securing a note made payable to Ellen E. Wilson; that Clemanda Gladney, as the wife of George W. Gladney, did not join with George W. Gladney in the execution of said deed of trust, and that said deed of trust was on the land in plaintiff's petition described, being 173.74 acres composing and comprising the homestead of George W. Gladney and Clemanda Gladney at that time; that the note described in said deed of trust was due, that George O. Hamilton, as trustee, had refused to act, and that defendant Thomas G. Sydnor, the then sheriff of Lincoln county, Missouri, under the provisions of said deed of trust, had the land advertised, and was threatening the sale of same. Plaintiff Clemanda Gladney further stated that since the 25th day of May, 1897, to wit, the 21st day of March, 1899, that the title to said land had been conveyed to her through mesne conveyance from George W. Gladney; that she, Clemanda Gladney, was now the sole owner of said land; that the deed of trust given by George W. Gladney to George O. Hamilton, trustee, was, under the laws as they now exist in the state of Missouri, absolutely void; but that, if Thomas G. Sydnor was permitted to sell and make a deed thereto, that it would cast a cloud over her title to the land, and that the deed of trust itself made by George W. Gladney, then on record, cast a cloud over her title. She therefore prayed for a judgment and decree of the court enjoining Thomas G. Sydnor, the acting trustee, from selling said land, and enjoining Ellen E. Wilson from attempting to carry into execution the said deed of trust made by George W. Gladney, and praying the court to cancel and hold for naught the said deed of trust. This petition was filed in the circuit court of Lincoln county, Missouri, and, the court not being in session, and no judge of the circuit court being in the county, a temporary injunction was issued on the 3d day of October, 1899, by the probate court of Lincoln county, Missouri. In the circuit court Ellen E. Wilson filed a separate answer, in substance as follows: Admitting that plaintiffs were husband and wife; admitting that George W. Gladney alone executed the deed of trust complained of on the 24th day of May, 1897, and admitting the record of the deed of trust as charged in the petition; denied the use of the land as a homestead; denied that Clemanda Gladney had become the bona fide owner of any portion of the land since the execution of the deed of trust; charging that, if Clemanda Gladney had obtained the title to any portion of the land from George W. Gladney, the same was without consideration, and the same was to defraud his creditors, and especially this defendant, admitting that defendant Sydnor was the sheriff of Lincoln county, Missouri, and had the land advertised for sale under the terms of said deed of trust; and denying each and every allegation in the petition; and, further answering, alleging that the deed of trust complained of was made to secure an indebtedness created by George W. Gladney prior to the 21st day of June, 1895, and alleging that up to the time of making said deed of trust George W. Gladney owned the land described therein, consisting of 173.74 acres, in his own right, and was then of the value of $4,000; alleging that Gladney owned the land prior to June 21, 1895, and as such owner and head of a family had and possessed a vested right and power, unrestricted by any act or deed or declaration of the said Clemanda Gladney, made or executed by her prior to the making of said deed of trust, to convey, alienate, or encumber the same, whether said land, or any part thereof, was a homestead or not; and that in the exercise of said right George W. Gladney made said deed of trust. Defendant Sydnor answered, stating that he was sheriff of Lincoln county, and at the request of defendant Ellen E. Wilson advertised the land for sale under the power of said deed of trust made by George W. Gladney to George O. Hamilton, trustee, said Hamilton having refused to execute said trust; and, further answering, said he had no knowledge or information as to the other allegations in plaintiff's petition. Plaintiffs' reply to the separate answer of Ellen E. Wilson was a general denial of all new matter therein contained. Defendant then filed a motion to dissolve the temporary injunction granted by the probate court." Upon the trial of this cause the court sustained the motion to dissolve the injunction, and dismissed plaintiffs' bill. From this judgment this cause is brought here for review.

Messrs. Norton, Avery, & Young for appellants.

Messrs. Martin & Woolfolk, for respondents:

Under the homestead law of this state prior to the amendment of 1895 George W. Gladney, as the owner of the land and the head of the family, had the right to sell or encumber, without the wife joining with him, except where the wife had filed her claim, as provided by § 5435, Rev. Stat. 1889, and the effect of such conveyance by the husband was to divest the wife of all interest except of dower.

Tucker v. Wills, 111 Mo. 399, 20 S. W. 114; Greer v. Major, 114 Mo. 145, 21 S. W. 481; Kopp v. Blessing, 121 Mo. 391, 25 S. W. 757.

The right of George W. Gladney to sell or encumber was a vested right.

Gilmore v. Bright, 101 N. C. 382, 7 S. E. 751; Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 1 L. ed. 648; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 956; Leete v. State Bank, 115 Mo. 184, 21 S. W. 788; Arnold v. Willis, 128 Mo. 145, 30 S. W. 517.

His right to encumber the land, being a vested right, could not be taken away by the act of 1895.

Leete v. State Bank, 141 Mo. 574, 42 S. W. 1074; Bortlett v. Ball, 142 Mo. 28, 34 S. W. 583; Clay v. Mayr, 144 Mo. 377, 45 S. W. 157; Cranor v. School Dist. No. 2, 151 Mo. 119, 52 S. W. 232; Re Flukes, 157 Mo. 125, 51 L. R. A. 176, 57 S. W. 545.

Fox, J., delivered the opinion of the court: There is no dispute as to the testimony in this cause. It substantially appears from the evidence introduced that appellants were husband and wife, and had for many years been occupying the land in dispute, and were residing upon it at the time of the execution of the deed of trust in May, 1897. All the land involved in this suit was procured by the appellant Geo. W. Gladney prior to 1884, and he and his wife were occupying it continuously since 1884. Prior to June 21, 1895, Geo. W. Gladney borrowed two sums of money from the respondent Ellen E. Wilson, giving her two notes therefor. On the 24th of May, 1897, these two notes had not been paid, and amounted to $428.67. Geo. W. Gladney on that day—24th of May, 1897—took up the two old notes, and executed to Mrs. Wilson one note, including the aggregate amount of the old notes, and to secure the payment of the renewed note executed the deed of trust which is the subject of this suit. The appellant Clemanda Gladney, wife of Geo. W. Gladney, did not join with her husband in the execution of this deed of trust. It further appears that, subsequent to the execution of the deed of trust by Geo. W. Gladney, he and his wife, on the 21st day of March, 1899, executed a deed, conveying this same land (except 10 acres) to O. H. Avery, and on the same day O. H. Avery and wife conveyed the same land conveyed to him by Geo. W. Gladney and wife to Clema Gladney. It is also disclosed by the record in this case that the land embraced in the deed of trust far exceeded the value of the "homestead," as defined by the statute. It is practically admitted that the deed from Geo. W. Gladney and wife to O. H. Avery was a voluntary conveyance, and without consideration. This is a sufficient reference to the testimony in order to indicate the vital questions involved in the controversy.

Under the well-settled law of this state, prior to the enactment of the statute of 1895, it is beyond dispute that the husband could sell or encumber the homestead, subject to the wife's inchoate right of dower, without the wife joining with him, except where the wife had filed her claim as provided by Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5435. This was clearly announced and determined in the cases of Greer v. Major, 114 Mo. 145, 21 S. W. 481; Tucker v. Wells, 111 Mo. 399, 20 S. W. 114; Kopp v. Blessing, 121 Mo. 391, 25 S. W. 757; Markwell v. Markwell, 157 Mo. 326, 57 S. W. 1078. In 1895 the legislature materially altered and changed the rights of the husband in respect to his right to encumber or sell the homestead. This change is embraced in these words: "The husband shall be debarred from and incapable of selling, mortgaging, or alienating the homestead in any manner whatever, and every such sale, mortgage, or alienation is hereby declared null and void." If we concede that this was a homestead as contemplated by the statute, which the husband was debarred and incapable of selling or encumbering, notwithstanding it far exceeded the value of the homestead defined by the statute, then there is only one question before us for determination, and that is, Was the right of husband, prior to 1895, to sell and encumber the homestead without the wife joining with him, such a vested right as the act of 1895 could not deprive him of? This leads us to the investigation of this all-important question. It is not only a very important one, but equally as interesting, for it is the first time this question has been presented under this marked change in the statute. Vested rights may be created, either by the common law, by statute, or by contract. And it makes no difference as to the method of their creation; they are entitled to the same protection. If, in this case, the right of appellant Geo. W. Gladney to convey his homestead, prior to the act of 1895, without his wife joining with him in such conveyance, was a vested right, it becomes so by the operation of law, and is entitled to the same protection under the Constitution and laws of the land, as though it had been created by contract. A vested right was defined in the case of Marshall v. King, 24 Miss. 85, "to be an immediate fixed right of present or future enjoyment." In the case of Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 380, 1 L. ed. 648, Chase, J., says: "When I say that a right is vested in a citizen, I mean that he has the power to do certain actions, or to possess certain things, according to the law of the land." Judge Story, in the case of Society for Propagation of Gospel v. Wheeler, 2 Gall. 105, Fed. Cas. No. 13,156, held that "upon principle every statute which takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect to transactions or considerations already past, must be deemed retrospective." Article 2, § 15, of the Constitution of Missouri, provides "that no ex post facto law, nor law impairing the obligation of contracts or retrospective in its operation or making any irrevocable grant of special privileges or immunities, can be passed by the general assembly." The reference in this provision to ex post facto laws has special application to criminal cases; but the subdivision of this constitutional provision which is intended to protect every citizen against the impairment of vested rights is that inhibition against the passage of laws retrospective in their operation. The term "retrospective in their operation," as used in our Bill of Rights, is one which relates to civil rights and proceedings in civil causes. Ex parte Bethurum, 66 Mo. 545. Hence the well-settled rule deduced from all the authorities is that "acts of the legislature are not to be considered as retrospective, unless they impair rights that are vested, because most civil rights are derived from public laws." Rich v. Flanders, 39 N. H. 304, and cases cited and discussed. In view of this principle we are led to the conclusion that an additional question must be answered in this investigation. The first inquiry in this case is, Was the right of Geo. W. Gladney to convey or encumber his homestead without his wife joining in such conveyance a vested right, and as such could it be impaired by the act of 1895? The second inquiry is as to the act of 1895—Is it to be construed simply as prospective in its operation or, if it is intended to be retrospective, then is it not in conflict with the Constitution of this state, as quoted herein? It is clear that if Geo. W. Gladney had a vested right in dealing with his homestead prior to 1895, then, if the act of 1895 is intended to impair that right, it would truly be retrospective in its operation. As to the first proposition, we have reached the conclusion that the appellant Geo. W. Gladney had a vested right, in respect to conveying and encumbering his homestead, prior to the act of 1895, and that act cannot impair such right. To us it seems as one of the highest privileges and dearest rights that can be bestowed upon the citizen. The law that creates the right to deal with your property without being compelled to have someone unite with you in the conveyance truly confers an inestimable privilege. This land was his, and beyond question he had the right to convey it, subject to her inchoate right of dower, prior to the act of 1895, without having his wife join with him in the deed. The fact that his wife could file her claim as provided in § 5435, Rev. Stat. 1889, heretofore referred to, does not change the rule so far as being a vested right. The right to convey was clearly given him, and the law provided the method how he could be barred of that right, and that was a personal privilege vested in the wife,—a right she could exercise or refuse to exercise. The law that created the homestead also created a right in the wife by which she could divest the husband of his right to sell or encumber it: but this by no means contemplated that the legislature could by enactment bar or impair the right given the husband in respect to his property. It may be said by appellants that this right to convey was merely conditional upon the failure of the wife to file her claim under the statute. The right to convey was not conditional; it was vested. Its duration was optional with the wife. This does not alter or change the principle that the legislature cannot, by a law retrospective in its operation, impair vested rights. It has no more power under the Constitution to impair this right than it has to impair rights that are not subjected to any limitation as to its duration. No one, under the law, had the right to impair or interfere with his right of alienation, except his wife, and the legislature cannot step in and exercise that privilege for her. She, and she alone, could exercise it.

Does the act of 1895, if construed as being retrospective in its operation (in other words, as being operative upon persons who were married, and who had acquired the homestead before its passage), impair the vested right of the husband? It certainly does. Before the passage of the act, he could convey himself. After the passage, he is not only barred, but the act says he "shall be incapable of conveying without his wife joins in the conveyance." "Impair" means to "make worse, to lessen the power, to weaken, to enfeeble, to deteriorate." This is as Webster defines it. Is not the power of the husband in respect to this homestead lessened, weakened, and deteriorated by the act of 1895, supra? As was said by the court in the celebrated case of Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 1 L. ed. 648: "When I say that a right is vested in a citizen, I mean that he has the power to do certain actions, or to possess certain things, according to the law of the land." Did not the husband in this cause have the power to do certain acts in respect to the property in dispute that the present law prohibits him from doing? That able and illustrious jurist, Judge Story, very tersely places the test when he said in the case of Society for Propagation of Gospel v. Wheeler, 2 Gall. 105, Fed. Cas. 13,156: That "upon principle every statute which . . . creates a new obligation imposes a new duty or attaches a new disability, . . . must be deemed retrospective." Apply this test to the case at bar. The statute of 1895 imposes upon the husband the new duty, if he desires to convey, of having his wife join in the conveyance. It attaches a new disability, for the very words of the present statute are that the husband is incapable of alienating his property. It is no answer to this question to say that his right to convey is not absolutely destroyed; that it is only partially so. In the case of Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 6 How. 301, 12 L. ed. 447, the doctrine is clearly announced that "one of the tests that a contract has been impaired is that its value has, by legislation, been diminished. It is not by the Constitution to be impaired at all. This is not a question of degree, or manner, or cause, but of encroaching in any respect on its obligation, dispensing with any part of its force." The conclusions reached in this case that Geo. W. Gladney had a vested right prior to the act of 1895, and that such right cannot be impaired by a subsequent statute, and that, if the act of 1895 was intended to apply to him, it is retrospective in its operation, and is in conflict with the organic law of this state, are supported by principles announced by this court in analogous cases, and by conclusions reached in other states in cases identical in principle with the one before us. In the case of Arnold v. Willis, 128 Mo. 145, 30 S. W. 517, Burgess, J., very clearly announced this doctrine as to the vested rights of the husband: "Prior to the revision of the statutes in 1889, a husband, by virtue of his marital rights, was entitled to the possession of his wife's lands, held by her as at common law, and could sue therefor in his own name; and the enactment of Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 6869, and 6864, providing that real estate belonging to the wife should be her separate property, and under her sole control, and empowering her to sue and be sued at law or in equity as a feme sole, did not deprive the husband of such rights in his wife's property which had become vested prior to 1889." In the case of Leete v. State Bank, 115 Mo. 184, 21 S. W. 788, the authorities are collated and reviewed. That case settles the law in this state that the legislature has no power to pass laws retrospective in their operation, so as to affect vested rights. The statute under consideration in the Leete Case was 60 L. R. A.

the married woman's act of March 25, 1875. It was held that the act "creating a separate estate in the wife's personality, inclusive of her rights of action, and providing that the same shall not be deemed to have been reduced to the possession of the husband by his use, occupancy, or care, but only by her express assent in writing, is to be construed prospectively, and does not apply to marriages in existence at the time of its passage, or to rights which had then accrued." It was further held that "an application of said statute to marriages then in existence, or to rights which then had accrued, would be violative of the constitutional provision prohibiting the enactment of a law retrospective in its operation." The conclusion reached in that case was that the married woman's act of 1875 could only operate prospectively, and did not apply to marriages in existence at the time of its passage, or to rights that accrued to such existing marriages. So we say in this case that the act of 1895 could only operate prospectively, and is not to be applied to husbands who had acquired homesteads prior to the passage of the act. Geo. W. Gladney, prior to the enactment of this statute of 1895, had the right to convey his homestead without his wife joining him; and, as was very appropriately said by the learned judge in the Leete Case: "These were his rights. . . . But when he woke up on the morning the section mentioned went into operation he found himself, if plaintiff's position be correct, completely divested of his former vested rights, laboring under a 'new disability.'" It is now the settled law of this state that an act of the legislature "is to operate prospectively only, and not otherwise, unless upon the face of the act itself the exceptions to the prospective rule do plainly and unmistakably appear."

It may be argued that, even though the right of Geo. W. Gladney, prior to the present statute, was a vested one, yet, as he had not availed himself of that right, the present law would be applicable, and that he could not exercise such right after the change in the statute. Perry on Trusts—a work of recognized authority—announces the doctrine upon a question identical in principle with the one before us. He says: "On principle it would seem that the right to reduce the wife's choses in action to possession vested in the husband at the time of the marriage, and could not be divested by a statute passed after the marriage, although the husband had not, at the time of the passage of the act, reduced the choses to possession; and so it has been ruled in several cases." Perry, Tr. § 676. This is a complete answer to that argument, for in the doctrine announced by Perry, as above quoted, the principle is the same if the right existed—it makes no difference about the exercise of it—before the passage of the subsequent statute that undertakes to divest it. Upon the question, involved in this case, as to the right of Geo. W. Gladney, prior to the act of 1895, being a vested right, we are of the opinion that the unbroken line of decisions of North Carolina upon a point which in principle is identical with the one at bar are decisive of this question. That all may fully appreciate the application of the cases to which we hereafter in this opinion direct attention, it would be well in a brief way to refer to the provisions of the Constitution and law of that state. In 1868 the state of North Carolina adopted and ratified its Constitution. The Constitution itself created a homestead defining the amount of land and value, etc., which was exempted from levy of execution. It also provided for the conveyance of the homestead, but declared that no deed executed by the owner of the homestead should be valid without the voluntary signature and assent of his wife. Prior to the adoption of this Constitution, land occupied by the owner and his wife could be conveyed by the husband alone. In the case of Gilmore v. Bright, 101 N. C. 382, 7 S. E. 751, in passing on the question as to the right of the husband to convey the land subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution, the court says: "The case shows that the lands in dispute were the property of Samuel Gilmore long prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, and that he and his wife Thany were married long prior to that time. There never was any allotment of the said lands as a homestead, nor was there ever any petition by the said Gilmore to have such an allotment made, nor was there ever any act of his indicating any purpose voluntarily to have said lands, or any portion thereof, dedicated to the purposes of a homestead. He had, prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, the absolute right to sell or dispose of these lands as he pleased, without the concurrence of his wife, and, if he chose to do so, without her consent; . . . and it is too well established by the authorities, Federal and state, that this right was not divested by art. 10, § 8, of the Constitution, to be questioned now. The state could not, by its Constitution, or its laws subsequently adopted or enacted, deprive him of his vested right to sell or dispose of the land in question, without contravening that provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." The learned judge cites in support of that principle announced the cases of Eduards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 595, 24 L. ed. 793; Sutton v. Askew, 66 N. C. 172, 8 Am. Rep. 500; Bruce v. Strickland, 81 N. C. 267; Murphy v. McNeill, 82 N. C. 221; Reeves v. Haynes, 88 N. C. 310; Fortune v. Watkins, 94 N. C. 304; Castlebury v. Maynard, 95 N. C. 281; and the numerous cases cited in these authorities. In the case of Bruce v. Strickland, 81 N. C. 267, the learned judge, after reviewing all the authorities upon the question as to the application of the enactment of subsequent statutes lessening the power of the husband, under former statutes, in respect to his lands, and reaching the conclusion that such subsequent acts do not affect rights secured under former laws, says: "These decisions rest upon the sanctity of vested rights under the protection of GO L. R. A.

the Constitution, among which is embraced the jus disponendi, or right of alienation. The principle is too deeply imbedded in the fundamental law of free government to require vindication."

It may be said that these North Carolina cases are based upon the fact that, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, there was no homestead, and the land, not being a homestead, could be alienated by the husband without the wife joining in the deed. That does not alter or change the principle announced as applicable to the case at bar, for in this case the homestead, prior to 1895, could be alienated by the husband alone, subject to her dower, the same as the land mentioned in the Carolina cases; and it is apparent from an investigation of all those cases that they clearly announce the principle that the right of a husband to sell or encumber his land without his wife joining in the conveyance is a vested right, which a subsequent statute, which imposes upon him a new disability, and undertakes to prevent him from performing this act alone, cannot impair.

This brings us to the last contention of appellants. Appellants insist that the statute of 1895 did not impair any vested right of Geo. W. Gladney, but that it simply changed the remedy or procedure of the wife in respect to the homestead. The statute of 1895 does not require a single step to be taken by the wife. She is not required to proceed in any way. But it simply imposes upon the husband a new disability, rendering him incapable of doing an act which, under the prior law, he had a perfect right to do. If the statute had provided that the wife should adopt some other method of preventing the sale or encumbrance of the homestead, then it might be said that it was simply a change in the course to be adopted by her, to prevent the husband from acting. But it must be remembered that this change of the statute does not require her to proceed at all. In effect, the legislature says in the act of 1895: "Under the former law we provided a remedy for you to prevent the exercise of certain rights of your husband in respect to the homestead. We will now exercise this right for you, irrespective of the fact whether you desire it done or not. We will simply divest your husband of the power to sell or encumber the homestead." We emphatically hold that this alteration and change in the statute is not simply a change in the remedy or procedure, but is, in the clearest terms possible, a deprivation of a right which the husband had prior to the enactment of the statute. We may add that a law which, even if intended simply to change the remedy or procedure, if, in fact it impairs vested rights, is just as obnoxious to the constitutional inhibition as if it in the clearest terms violated the constitutional provision. We have examined the cases cited by the learned counsel for appellants upon this question, and we are of the impression that they are not based upon similar grounds, and, hence, are insufficient to change the conclusions reached upon this contention.

Entertaining the views as herein expressed as to the vested rights of Geo. W. Gladney in respect to the land in controversy, we are of the opinion that the action of the trial court in sustaining the motion to dissolve the injunction and dismissing plaintiffs' bill was correct, and it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

D. H. HERMAN.

1. The record of a judgment based on an account for goods sold cannot be impeached, and evidence offered that the debt was in fact created by fraud, in order to prevent the release of the debtor from liability on it by a discharge in bankruptcy under a statute providing that such discharge shall release all debts except the judgments in actions for fraud.
2. An affidavit for attachment in an action upon an account for goods sold and delivered cannot be looked to in determining whether or not the action was for fraud, so that a discharge in bankruptcy will not release liability on the judgment therein.
3. No fiduciary relation exists between persons negotiating for the sale and purchase of goods, within the meaning of the section of the bankruptcy act of 1898, which prevents a release from affecting debts created by fraud while acting in any fiduciary capacity, so as to prevent the release from being operative in case the goods were obtained by the purchaser through fraud and false representations.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Greene County in favor of defendant in an action brought to revive a judgment. Affirmed.

Statement by Fox, J.:

This cause was tried by the circuit court of Greene county, Missouri, the result of which was a judgment for defendant from which judgment plaintiffs, in due time and form, have prosecuted their appeal.

This is an ordinary proceeding to revive a judgment heretofore rendered in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant. The respondent, as a defense thereto, pleads a discharge in bankruptcy. The appellants, by way of replication, plead that defendant's discharge in bankruptcy is no bar to the revival of their judgment against the defendant; alleging that the judgment was for goods sold to the defendant, and obtained by defendant from the plaintiffs by false pretense and false representations. The court treated respondent's discharge as a complete release of all his indebtedness, of every character whatsoever, and rendered judgment against the plaintiffs for costs, and discharging the respondent from the obligations of the judgment. From this judgment, and after an unsuccessful motion for new trial, the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

In order to fully understand the disputed questions in this case, it would be well to examine the pleadings, and see precisely what is in issue. The petition to revive the judgment is as follows:

Harrington & Goodman, a Firm Composed of Samuel Goodman, Wm. E. Goodman, and Jos. Goodman, Plaintiffs,
v.

Daniel H. Herman, Defendant.

In the Circuit Court of Greene County, Missouri, May Term, 1899.

Come the above-named plaintiffs, Harrington & Goodman, a firm composed of Samuel Goodman, William E. Goodman, and Joseph Goodman, and represent to this honorable court that on the 2d day of February, 1891, plaintiffs recovered in this court a judgment against Daniel H. Herman, the above-named defendant, said judgment being founded upon the sale by plaintiffs of merchandise to the firm of Herman Bros., of which the above-named defendant, D. H. Herman, was a member, amounting at said time to seven thousand one hundred and twenty-nine dollars, and therefore the said plaintiffs recovered against said Daniel H. Herman a judgment for said amount, with interest thereon at the rate of six per cent per annum from said February 2, 1891, to this date, and for costs of said suit, which said judgment was duly entered upon the records of this court, in Judgment Record 38, at page 259; that no part of said judgment has been paid, and the whole amount thereof is due and unpaid; that no part of the costs of said suit has ever been paid by said defendant; and that the lien of said judgment on the lands and tenements of said Daniel H. Herman has expired. Wherefore plaintiffs pray that said judgment thereof be revived against the said Daniel H. Herman, and that the lien be revived against the lands and tenements of said Daniel H. Herman, and that a writ of seire facias issue to the said Daniel H. Herman, his tenants, and the occupants of his lands, commanding him and them to appear before this court at the next term thereof to show cause, if any he has, why this judgment, in form as rendered aforesaid, and the lien thereof on the real estate of the said Daniel H. Herman, be not revived, and for such other and further relief as may be proper.

Heffernan & Heffernan,
Attorneys for Plaintiffs.

Defendant files answer to this petition as follows:

Harrington & Goodman, Plaintiffs,

v.

Daniel H Herman, Defendant.

In the Circuit Court of Greene County, Missouri, May Term, 1899.

Comes now the defendant in the cause above entitled, and, for answer to plaintiffs' amended petition, denies each and every allegation in said petition contained, and so, having answered, prays to be discharged, with costs. And for another and further answer to petition of plaintiffs, defendant said that heretofore, to wit, on the 22d day of November, 1898, he filed a petition in the district court of the United States for the southern division of the western district of Missouri, to be adjudged a bankrupt; that thereafter, in the course of said bankruptcy proceedings, the plaintiffs in this case, as well as the other creditors of this defendant, proved up their judgments before the said court and the referee in bankruptcy, George S. Rathbun, against the defendant and against his estate; that afterwards, in due course in said proceedings, the petition of this defendant to be adjudged a bankrupt, and discharged as such, came on to be heard before the judge of said court, and on such hearing the plaintiffs in this case, as well as certain other creditors of the defendant, filed objections to the defendant being adjudged a bankrupt, and discharged as such; that said objections were heard in due course in said United States district court, and were on the 10th day of April, 1899, by said court, overruled, and thereupon, on the said day, this defendant was adjudged a bankrupt, and judgment was entered finally discharging him as such bankrupt. That by the force and effect of said judgment the defendant was discharged and relieved from further liability on the account of the alleged indebtedness of the plaintiffs against him, and is no longer responsible therefor. Wherefore, having so fully answered, defendant prays to be discharged, with costs.

R. L. Goode,
Attorney for Defendant.

The replication of plaintiffs was in the nature of a confession and avoidance of the new matter alleged as a defense to the action. It is admitted that the defendant was discharged, as alleged, in the bankrupt proceedings, from all debts against his estate, under said bankrupt act, but it is averred that the debt evidenced by the judgment sought to be revived is excepted by law from such discharge, for the reason it is alleged that the merchandise purchased by the defendant, for which plaintiffs recovered judgment against the defendant, was by the defendant, D. H. Herman, obtained and procured from the plaintiffs by false pretenses and false representations. The replication of plaintiffs fully sets forth the manner of obtaining the merchandise, and avers in detail in what the fraud in securing the goods consisted. As to the original suit, in which the judgment was recovered for merchandise sold defendant by plaintiffs, a writ of attachment was issued in aid of the suit. One of the grounds in the affidavit which was filed in procuring the attachment was "that the debt sued for was fraudulently contracted for on the part of the defendant." A plea in abatement was filed by defendant, which put in issue the grounds alleged in the affidavit for attachment. This plea was withdrawn, and the attachment was sustained.

Messrs. Heffernan & Heffernan for appellants.

Mr. W. D. Tatlow for respondent.

Fox, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It will be observed that in this controversy there is but one issue, and that is sharply presented by the pleadings in this cause. Plaintiffs offered in evidence the judgment obtained against the defendant, which is sought to be revived; also the affidavit in attachment, and the judgment in case of McNally v. Herman, Record No. 38, page 265; also the affidavit in attachment and judgment in case of Lippincott, Johnson & Co. v. Herman—to all of which testimony defendant objected as irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial. This evidence was admitted subject to objection. This was the prima facie showing as made by plaintiffs. "Defendant offered in evidence certified copy of discharge of D. H. Herman from bankruptcy, together with the objections and exceptions thereto, to which plaintiffs objected because said discharge is not a discharge in a case of the character that is sought to be revived, because the United States court failed and refused to consider the objections made by Harrington & Goodman; stating at the time that it wasn't a proper defense to his discharge, and that, if the facts were true as stated, it would have to be brought up in a different way. (Objections overruled, to which plaintiffs then and there duly excepted at the time.)" Which discharge in bankruptcy is as follows:

Discharge of Bankrupt.

District Court of the United States, Southern Division of the Western District of Missouri.

Whereas, Daniel H. Herman, of Springfield, in Greene county, and state of Missouri, in said district, has been duly adjudged a bankrupt under the acts of Congress relating to bankruptcy, and appears to have conformed to all the requirements of law in that behalf, it is therefore ordered by this court that said Daniel H. Herman be discharged from all debts and claims which are made provable by said acts against his estate, and which existed on the 22d day of November, A. D. 1898, on which date the petition for adjudication was filed by him; excepting such debts as are by law excepted from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy.

Witness the Honorable John H. Rogers, Presiding Judge of said District Court at said April term, A. D. 1899, and the seal thereof, this 10th day of April, A. D. 1899.

[Signed] John H. Rogers, Presiding Judge.

This was all the evidence offered by the defendant. Plaintiffs, in rebuttal, offered a volume of testimony tending to show that the defendant procured the credit for the merchandise for which they obtained judgment by false and fraudulent representations. It is unnecessary to burden this opinion with the details of the testimony for it is apparent from the record in this cause that, under the view of the law adopted by the trial court, this testimony was excluded, or, at least, was not considered. The only issue in this cause was very aptly and appropriately presented by the declaration of law prayed for by the plaintiffs, as follows: "The plaintiffs' judgment against the defendant should be revived, notwithstanding defendant's discharge in bankruptcy, because the merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiffs to the defendant, for which said judgment was rendered, was secured from plaintiffs by false and fraudulent representations, for the purpose of 'obtaining property by false pretenses and false representations,' which declaration of law the court refused to give, to the refusal of which the plaintiffs excepted to at the time. The defendant, upon his behalf, asked no declaration of law."

Plaintiffs' contention is that the trial court, upon this state of the record, should have entered judgment for plaintiffs, reviving the judgment upon which this action is predicated. It will be observed that the discharge in bankruptcy pleaded as a defense to this action was procured under the provisions of the bankrupt law of 1898. In order to reach a proper conclusion in this cause, it is necessary to carefully examine the provisions of that act. 30 U. S. Stat. at L. 550, chap. 541, § 17 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3428), provides: "Sec. 17. Debts not Affected by a Discharge. A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the state, county, district, or municipality in which he resides; (2) are judgments in actions for frauds or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for wilful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another; (3) have not been duly scheduled in time for proof and allowance, with the name of the creditor if known to the bankrupt, unless such creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy; or (4) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity." Plaintiffs' contention is that the evidence offered by them in this cause placed the judgment sought to be revived within the exceptions as mentioned in subdivisions 2 and 4 of § 17, supra. Under subdivision 2 "judgments in actions for frauds or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations," are not released by a discharge in bankruptcy; and subdivision 4, it will be observed, provides that debts "created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity," are not released. The judgment sought to be revived in this cause was based upon an account for merchandise sold the defendant by plaintiffs. The recitation in the judgment shows, beyond question, that fact. It recites, "and their cause of action being founded upon a written instrument, to wit, an account;" hence it cannot be contended that this was an action for fraud, or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations. It is, however, insisted by plaintiffs that they have the right to go beyond the record in this cause, and show that the creation of the debt upon which the judgment is based was by fraud and false representations. This we do not think plaintiffs have the right to do, under the provisions of the bankrupt law in force at the time of the entry of the discharge of the defendant in the bankruptcy proceedings. The provisions of the bankrupt act of 1898 are materially different from the act of 1867. The last-mentioned act provides "that no debt created by the fraud of the creditor shall be affected by the discharge." The term used under the former act (being the act of 1898) is that "no judgment in an action for fraud" shall be affected. In the one there is no importance placed upon the form of the action. In the other, it expressly provides that the action upon which the judgment is predicated shall be one for the fraud perpetrated in the transaction. This distinction is very aptly drawn in the case of Argall v. Jacobs, 87 N. Y. 110, 41 Am. Rep. 357, where the court, in discussing the act of 1867, says: "It is not provided that no cause of action for fraud shall be discharged, but that 'no debt created by fraud' shall be discharged." In this case we will say that the provisions of the statute do not apply to debts "created by fraud," but substantially contain the provision which the court says in the case of Argall v. Jacobs, 87 N. Y. 110, 41 Am. Rep. 357, the statute of 1867 did not contain. In that case the suit was upon two promissory notes, not upon a judgment, as in this case. The defense was a discharge in a bankrupt proceeding. Plaintiffs in that case, in their reply, alleged that the debt, as evidenced by the notes, was "created by fraud," and the court very properly held that the fraud in the creation of the debt might be shown, to the end that the discharge in bankruptcy might be inoperative, so far as this particular debt was concerned. The case of Bank of North America v. Crandall, 87 Mo. 208, is nearly identical with the New York case above mentioned. This case was upon promissory notes, and the defense was a discharge in bankruptcy, both of which were tried under the provisions of the act of 1867. These cases were entirely different from the case at bar. The discharge was under a statute materially different, and the actions were upon the original debt. Even under the strong provisions of the act of 1867, we are of the opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to go behind the judgment and the pleadings to show that the debt upon which the judgment was based was fraudulently incurred. In the case of Shuman v. Strauss, 52 N. Y. 404, while the court fails to positively assert in its opinion that this cannot be done, for the reason that the question was not legitimately before it, yet it does say that the contention of plaintiff that he could go behind the judgment and record, and show that the debt was "created by fraud," is not supported by the authorities cited, and that the cases cited by plaintiff fall far short of the claim of the plaintiff. The court proceeded in that case to examine the decisions cited, and demonstrated that the judgments and record supplied the proof that the debts upon which the judgments were based were created by fraud. Our attention is earnestly directed to the case of Forsyth v. Vehmeyer, 177 U. S. 177, 44 L. ed. 723, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 623. An examination of that case will demonstrate that the judgment and record proved beyond question that the debt upon which the judgment was based was created by fraud. It will further be observed that the discharge in bankruptcy in that case was in pursuance of the bankrupt act of 1867. It will not be contended that, if the action is based upon fraud, the fraud is merged in the judgment, but it must appear from the record and judgment that the action was based upon a fraudulent transaction. See case of Forsyth v. Vehmeyer, 176 Ill. 359, 52 N. E. 55, where this question is fully discussed. In the case of Stern v. Meyer, 9 Misc. 102, 29 N. Y. Supp. 34, the conclusions reached in case of Shuman v. Strauss, 52 N. Y. 404, are fully approved. And in Palmer v. Preston, 45 Vt. 154, 12 Am. Rep. 191, the doctrine is clearly announced that "the recovery of a judgment upon a contract induced by fraud is a waiver of the fraud, and the judgment is not a debt created by fraud, within the meaning of the bankrupt act, and the plea of a discharge in bankruptcy is a good defense to an action of debt founded upon such judgment." So far as this contention is concerned, the action of the trial court in the case at bar does not need the support of the doctrine heretofore announced. Its action is fully supported by the very terms of the statute—"no judgment in an action for fraud or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations shall be affected." The judgment sought to be revived was based upon an ordinary suit on account for goods sold and delivered. The action for fraud or obtaining property by false pretenses or representations, as mentioned in the bankrupt act of 1898, must be construed as contemplating the common-law form of action for fraud and deceit. The form of the action must be determined by the petition; hence, the affidavit for an attachment in aid of the suit forms no part of the petition, and cannot be looked to in determining the form of action. The provision of the bankrupt act of 1898 must be construed to mean what it says,—that it is judgments in actions for fraud, and not debts created by fraud, as in the act of 1867, which are not to be affected by the discharge in bankruptcy. The conclusions as herein expressed upon this contention having been reached by this court, the error urged by the appellants in this respect must be ruled against them.

This leads us to the last contention, based upon subdivision 4, § 17, of the bankrupt act of 1898, which provides that no fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity shall be discharged. Was there any fiduciary relation existing between plaintiffs and defendant at the time of the sale of the goods upon which their judgment sought to be revived is based? We think not. Our attention is called to the cases of Lemcke v. Booth, 47 Mo. 385, 4 Am. Rep. 326, and Brooks v. Yocum, 42 Mo. App. 516. We will say as to those cases, if they are cited in support of the theory first treated of in this opinion, "that the plaintiffs had the right to go behind the judgment, and show that the debt upon which the judgment was founded was created by fraud;" that they are not applicable, because that question was not involved. These cases were suits upon the original debts, and not upon judgments, as the case at bar. We have no doubt as to the correctness of the doctrine, under the act of 1867, that in a suit upon an account or note, or any other evidence of debt, where the defendant would plead a discharge in bankruptcy, plaintiffs in such suit upon the debt would be entitled to show it was created by fraud; but that is not this case. If the cases are cited in support of the contention that a fiduciary relation existed between the plaintiffs and defendant at the time the merchandise was sold to defendant, we will say that the facts as to the relationship in those cases and the facts in the one before us are not at all similar. In the Booth and Yocum Cases, the defendants were commission merchants, and consignments of goods were made to them, to sell. In this case it was a plain sale and delivery of goods and wares in the ordinary course of business. As has been very appropriately said: "In almost all of the commercial transactions of the country, confidence is reposed in the punctuality and integrity of the debtor, and a violation of these is, in a commercial sense, a disregard of the trust." But it is apparent that this is not the "fiduciary capacity" spoken of in the bankrupt act. This contention is settled adversely to the plaintiffs in the very able and exhaustive review of all the authorities in the case of Bracken v. Milner, 5 Am. Bankr. Rep. 23, 104 Fed. 522. In that case, Phillips, J., very clearly demonstrated how the conflict in the different cases originated in respect to the application of the terms "fiduciary capacity." Under the bankrupt act of 1841, the provision in respect to the subject now under discussion was that "debts created in consequence of defalcation" as a public officer, or as executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, or while acting in any other fiduciary capacity, would not be affected by the discharge in bankruptcy. And this provision was the subject of controversy in the case of Chapman v. Forsyth, 2 How. 202, 11 L. ed. 236. It was held in that case "that a factor who had defaulted in accounting for a balance due his principal was not acting in a fiduciary capacity." Subsequently this statute was amended by the act of 1867, in which the enumerations of classes were omitted; that is to say, executors, administrators, etc. Judge Pardee, in the case of Fulton v. Hammond, 11 Fed. 291, drew the distinction between the statutes of 1841 and 1867, and, by reason of this change in the statutes, held that there was an intention to enlarge the comprehension of the terms "fiduciary capacity," and that the Chapman Case was no longer to be followed in that respect. But in the cases of Neal v. Clark, 95 U. S. 704, sub nom. Neal v. Scruggs, 24 L. ed. 586, and Hennequin v. Clews, 111 U. S. 676, 28 L. ed. 565, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576, the cases making the distinction between the acts of 1841 and 1867 are discussed, and the conclusion finally reached that the Chapman Case was the law, even under the statute of 1867. Without passing on the soundness of the doctrine, it might not be amiss here to say that the rule announced in the Missouri cases heretofore mentioned was laid down by reason of the distinction drawn by the cases holding that the Chapman Case was not applicable to the bankrupt act of 1867. This doctrine was departed from in the cases of Neal v. Clark, 95 U. S. 704, sub nom. Neal v. Scruggs, 24 L. ed. 586, and Hennequin v. Clews, 111 U. S. 676, 28 L. ed. 565, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576. The reason of the rule in the cases of Lemcke v. Booth, 47 Mo. 385, 4 Am. Rep. 326, and Brooks v. Yocum, 42 Mo. App. 516, under the act of 1867, having been abandoned, the rule itself would fall. After a full discussion by the learned judge in the case of Bracken v. Milner, 5 Am. Bankr. Rep. 23, 104 Fed. 522, this very appropriate and intelligent application of the terms "fiduciary capacity" was reached: "That the phrase implies a fiduciary relation existing previously to, or independently of, the particular transaction from which the debt arises." In the case before us for determination it might be claimed that the plaintiffs, as has heretofore been said, in a commercial sense, reposed a trust in the punctuality and integrity of the defendant at the time they sold him the goods, yet we are unable to reach the conclusion that such a trust in a simple, plain sale and delivery of merchandise created a "fiduciary relation," such as is contemplated by the bankrupt act of 1898. Finding no error in the action of the trial court, the judgment will be affirmed.

All concur.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

CRAWFORD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Leroy HALL et al., Impleaded, etc.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. The doctrine of the civil law with respect to the right of acquiring an interest in the use of water by prior appropriation and the application thereof to a beneficial use has never become a part of the laws of this state, and this without regard to whether the doctrine was ever in existence as a part of the laws in force in the territory acquired by the United States known as the "Louisiana purchase."
2. The common-law rule with respect to the rights of private riparian proprietors has been a part of the laws of the state ever since the organization of a state government.
3. It cannot be said that the common-

*Headnotes by HOLCOMB, J.

law rule defining the rights of riparian proprietors is inapplicable to the conditions prevailing in the state because irrigation is found essential to successful agriculture in some portions thereof.

4. A riparian's right to the use of the flow of the stream passing through or by his land is a right inseparably annexed to the soil, not as an easement or appurtenance, but as a part and parcel of the land; such right being a property right, and entitled to protection as such, the same as private property rights generally.
5. The legislature has not abolished, nor does it possess the power to abolish, the rights of riparian proprietors which have become vested, except as such rights be taken or impaired for a public use in an exercise of the powers of eminent domain, for which compensation must be made for the injury sustained.
6. The provisions of Comp. Stat. 1901, § 41, art. 2, chap. 93a, and of § 21, art. 1, of the Constitution, authorizes the condemnation of the right of a private riparian proprietor to the use and enjoyment of a natural stream flowing past his land, or its impairment by an appropriation of such water for irrigation purposes; and such riparian proprietor may recover damages in the same way and subject to the same rules as a person whose property is affected injuriously by the construction and operation of a railroad.

As to correlative rights of upper and lower proprietors, see the following case, and foot-note thereto.

7. The irrigation act of 1895 authorizes and regulates the appropriation of the waters of the state for irrigation and other purposes which are declared to be a public use; and, in making appropriations of water as contemplated by the act, a riparian owner whose property rights are appropriated or impaired is entitled to compensation for the injuries actually sustained, to be recovered in a suitable action or proceeding instituted for that purpose.
8. As to those streams of water flowing through the state which may be classed as interstate rivers, and along the banks of which meander lines have been run by the government in its survey of the public lands, the question is left open as to whether or not the waters of such streams may not be treated as waters of navigable rivers, and to which riparian rights of an adjoining landowner would not attach as against the right of the public to use the waters thereof by its appropriation and application to beneficial purposes.
9. While, as an abstract proposition of law, a riparian proprietor has the right to the ordinary natural flow of a stream, this rule would furnish no basis for compensation where water is appropriated for irrigation purposes. In order to entitle a riparian owner to compensation, he must suffer an actual loss or injury to his riparian estate, which the law recognizes as belonging to him by reason of his right to the use and enjoyment of the water of which he is deprived.
10. Ordinarily, a riparian proprietor's right to the use of water of a stream is limited to its use for domestic purposes, and, if applied to the irrigation of riparian lands, a reasonable use for such purpose in view of an equal right to use belonging to all other riparian proprietors.
11. The right of a riparian proprietor as such to use water for irrigation purposes is limited to riparian lands.
12. The right cannot be extended to lands contiguous to the riparian land, nor can water be diverted to nonriparian lands which might be used on riparian lands, but is not.
13. Land, to be riparian, must have the stream flowing over it or along its borders.
14. The extent of riparian land cannot, in any event, exceed the area acquired by a single entry or purchase from the government; and whether, in view of the policy of the government in the disposition of its public lands, such riparian land may exceed the smallest legal subdivision of a section,—that is, 40 acres,—or, in lieu thereof, if an irregular tract, a designated numbered lot, which is bordered by a natural stream, or over which it flows,—quære.
15. The two doctrines of water rights, one the right of a riparian proprietor, and the other the right of appropriation and application to a beneficial use by a nonriparian owner, may exist in the state at the same time, and both do exist concurrently in this state.
16. The common-law rule of riparian rights is underlying and fundamental, and takes precedence of appropriations of water if prior in time.

17. The riparian owner acquires title to his usufructuary interest in the water when he secures the land to which it is an incident, and the appropriator acquires title by appropriation and the application of the water to some beneficial use; the time when either right attaches determining the superiority of title as between conflicting claimants.
18. Irrigation acts of 1889 and 1895 abrogated the law of private riparian rights as theretofore existing, and substituted in its stead a law providing for the appropriation of the public waters of the state, and their application to the beneficial uses therein contemplated.
19. The legislative enactments referred to did not have the effect of abolishing vested rights of riparian proprietors, but affected only such rights as might have been acquired in the future under the law as theretofore existing.
20. The court will take judicial notice of the fact that since the early settlements of the western portions of the state, where irrigation has been found essential to successful agriculture, a custom or practice has existed of appropriating and diverting waters from the natural channels thereof into irrigation canals, and the application of such waters to the soil for agricultural purposes. Whether vested rights have been acquired thereby must depend on the facts and circumstances as disclosed in any particular case.
21. The right to the use of water, when acquired by appropriation, is, in its nature, a property right, and becomes a superior and better title to the use and enjoyment of such water than that of a riparian proprietor whose right attaches subsequently.
22. The act of Congress of July 26, 1806, granted to those appropriating water on the public domain for agricultural purposes a right in and to the use of such waters when made according to local customs, or when such right is recognized by the laws of the state or the decisions of the courts.
23. The act of 1877 (Sess. Laws 1877, p. 168) was an implied recognition of the right to appropriate the waters on the public domain according to the custom prevailing in the arid states immediately west of us, and the irrigation acts of 1889 and 1895 expressly recognized and preserved the rights of those who had appropriated the public waters and applied them to agricultural uses.
24. The duties of the state board of irrigation, as provided for in the irrigation act of 1895 (Sess. Laws, chap. 69), are administrative, and not judicial. The sections of the statute creating such board are not unconstitutional, as conferring judicial powers on executive officers.
25. Where a large number of persons claim rights to use or divert the waters of a stream by virtue of riparian rights, appropriations, prescription, or otherwise, a suit in equity to determine such rights, and enjoin infringement, under color thereof, of rights acquired under the irrigation act, may be maintained to avoid multiplicity of suits.
26. The plaintiff in such a suit may offer to do equity by compensating riparian owners whose rights are affected by the construction and operation of a canal without leaving them to their actions at law; and in that way the amounts due the several parties by way of damages may become a proper subject of inquiry and adjudication therein.

27. The term "domestic purposes," as used in Comp. Stat. 1901, § 43, art. 2, chap. 98a, has reference to the use of water for domestic purposes, permitted to the riparian proprietor at common law, which ordinarily involves but little interference with the water of a stream or its flow, and does not contemplate diversion of large quantities of water in canals or pipe lines.

28. The common law does not give to a riparian owner an absolute and exclusive right to the flow of all the water of the stream in its natural state, but only a right to the benefit and advantage of the water flowing past his land, so far as consistent with a like right in all other riparian owners.

29. A riparian owner having a superior title to the use of the water of a stream as against an appropriator is not entitled to maintain an injunction to prevent the diversion of the storm or flood waters of the stream, and thereby prevent its application to a beneficial use, as contemplated by the statute.

30. There is no such thing as a prescriptive right of a lower riparian owner to receive water as against upper owners. Receiving the full flow of a stream for more than ten years does not give a prescriptive right that will prevent reasonable use of its waters by an upper owner.

(February 4, 1903.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Dawes County dismissing a proceeding brought to adjudicate the rights to certain water in White river. Reversed.

The facts were stated upon a former hearing of the case as follows:

This is an appeal from the district court of Dawes county on the part of the Crawford Company, a corporation, which was the plaintiff below. We think no clearer or fairer statement of this case can be made than that contained in the brief of Judge Maxwell, the venerable counsel for Leroy Hall, and we therefore copy it verbatim: "The appellant brought an action in the district court of Dawes county against Leroy Hall and others to adjudicate certain rights of the parties, and to enjoin Hall, who was charged with making threats to tear down a dam erected by the appellant in White river, in Dawes county, by which nearly all the water in the river was diverted from its channel, and caused to flow through plaintiff's ditch. Issues were made up, and the cause submitted to the court, which found that no threats had been made by Hall to tear down or injure the dam, and therefore the injunction against him was unauthorized and without just cause, and thereupon the court finds that the plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction, and that the defendant Leroy Hall is entitled to an injunction against plaintiff, as specified therein. And the court, for the purposes only of the injunction herein allowed, further finds that the defendant Leroy Hall is a riparian proprietor upon the White river, as alleged in his said answer, and that he and his grantors have been such riparian proprietors for a period of ten years and upward immediately preceding the bringing of this suit, and he is entitled to all the rights of a riparian proprietor thereon, including the flow of the waters of said stream as they were wont to do from time immemorial; that the said plaintiff on or about the — day of January, A. D. 1896, by means of a dam, ditch, headgate, reservoirs, aqueducts, flumes, and other appliances then in its possession, did divert the waters of said stream from the natural bed and channel thereof, at a point above the riparian lands of said defendant Leroy Hall, and have continued to so divert them until this moment, claiming the right to so divert them under and by virtue of the irrigation laws of the state of Nebraska, which right has not yet been adjudicated by the state board of irrigation. And the court further finds: that the said plaintiff and the said defendant, the Harris & Cooper Irrigation Company, are not entitled to the relief prayed in the amended supplemental petition and cross petition, respectively, at this time; that the defendant Leroy Hall is entitled only to an injunction against the plaintiff, prohibiting it from diverting the water of said stream by means of its dam, headgate, ditches, and appliances aforesaid, until its right to the waters of said stream for the purposes of irrigation shall be adjudicated by the state board of irrigation, or until the further order of this court, and is entitled to have the temporary injunction heretofore granted herein vacated, dissolved, and set aside, and is entitled to recover his costs herein expended, as against the said plaintiff and against the said Harris & Cooper Irrigation Company.' The court thereupon dismissed the petition, 'without prejudice to any further adjudication which may be made by the state board of irrigation, or any court having jurisdiction of the right of the plaintiff to the waters of said stream for irrigation and power purposes.' The same decree was made in regard to the cross petition of Harris & Cooper Irrigation Company, and in the Crawford Company-Hall case 'it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court herein that the said plaintiff be and it is hereby prohibited and enjoined from further diverting the waters of said stream from the bed and channel thereof, by means of its dam, headgate, ditches, and appliances aforesaid, until its right thereto shall have been adjudicated by the board of irrigation or other proper tribunal, until the further order of this court in that behalf granted: Provided, that said injunction shall not restrain the plaintiff from arresting and storing flood waters, or any excess above the usual flow. And the court further finds that it has no jurisdiction of the several causes of action set forth in the several cross petitions of the defendants herein stated. And the court further finds that the state board of irrigation has exclusive jurisdiction over the several causes of action set forth in plaintiff's petition and the several cross petitions. And the court having determined that the court has no original jurisdiction to hear, determine, and adjudicate the rights of the plaintiff and defendants claimed under the statutes of Nebraska governing the manner of acquiring water rights for the irrigation, power, domestic and other purposes, the court refuses, in this action and litigation, to finally determine and adjudicate any question of law, fact, or right."

Messrs. Hamer & Hamer, Allen G. Fisher, Justin E. Porter, and W. D. Oldham, for appellant:

The use of water for the purpose of irrigation is a public use within the meaning of the Constitution.

Paxton & H. Irrig. Canal & Land Co. v. Farmers' & M. Irrig. & Land Co. 45 Neb. 884, 29 L. R. A. 853, 64 N. W. 343.

Under the act of the legislature touching the common law of England, the courts were at liberty at any time they saw fit to disavow the doctrine of riparian rights, and, under statutes almost exactly like ours, they have done so in the states west of us.

Neb. Comp. Stat. 1897, chap. 15, § 1.

The legislature of this state has made three specific and vigorous efforts to wipe out the doctrine of riparian rights: First, the act of 1877; second, the act of March 27, 1889; third, the act of April 4, 1895.

In the commencement the court might have said, under the statute of Nebraska, pertaining to the common law, that the common law was not applicable in so far as it affected riparian rights.

Pacard*, 2 Pet. 144, 7 L. ed. 377; 1 Kent, Com. 473; Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige, 198; Seely v. Peters, 10 Ill. 142; Boyer v. Sweet, 4 Ill. 120; *People ex rel. Loomis v. The government of the United States has never attempted to sell riparian rights after the government of the state has attempted to declare the doctrine of prior appropriation.

Sturr v. Beck, 6 Dak. 71, 50 N. W. 486.

The state may "appropriate the water of any stream to any purpose which will subserve the public interest."

Clark v. Cambridge, & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 807, 64 N. W. 239.

The law of riparian proprietorship was destroyed as to all lands subsequently acquired from the United States by the act taking effect June 1, 1877, and, as Mr. Hall's land was acquired from the United States after that time, he is not, and cannot be, a riparian proprietor.

While the prior appropriator has the right to have the water flow down the stream to the head of his ditch, it is an incorporeal 60 L. R. A.

hereditament appurtenant to his ditch, and coextensive with his right to the ditch itself; but he can have no property rights in or to the water itself until it enters his ditch from the natural stream.

Ortman v. Dixon, 13 Cal. 33; McDonald v. Askev, 29 Cal. 200; Los Angeles v. Baldwin, 53 Cal. 469; Lower Kings River Water Ditch Co. v. Kings River & F. Canal Co. 60 Cal. 408; Parks Canal & Min. Co. v. Hoyt, 57 Cal. 46; Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 807, 64 N. W. 239.

The United States never undertook to pass a law determining priority of right to the use of water.

The legislature cannot pass a law which prevents a man from farming in the only way in which it can be done in the county in which he lives.

Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 325, 18 L. ed. 363; Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 338, 18 L. ed. 366.

If farming may not be done in any considerable portion of this state except by the application of the water running in the streams in that section, then the legislature has no right to take the water, or to permit it to be taken, and used for a comparatively insignificant use or purpose, thereby denying the right to use it to produce crops from the soil for the sustenance of life.

Under the act of 1877 each appropriator is entitled to a reasonable use of the water, and each man may divert water from the stream as it goes by his ditch, and no mill man near the lower end of the stream, or any place else on the stream, can say that he is entitled to a monopoly of the water as against his neighbors, who live above him, and who wish to irrigate their lands.

The proper mode of using water in at least three fourths of the state of Nebraska is by applying it to the irrigation of the soil.

Union Mill & Min. Co. v. Dangberg, 2 Sawy. 450, Fed. Cas. No. 14,370; Washb. Easements, 2d ed. p. 240; Luz v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674.

It is the common law in all the western states where water is scarce that the proper use of water is for domestic purposes and irrigation, and that every riparian proprietor is entitled: (1) To take out of the stream all the water that he needs for domestic use and for watering stock, even if it takes the full volume of the stream, and leaves none to go down. (2) He is entitled to a reasonable use of the water for the purpose of irrigating his riparian lands, and what is a reasonable use depends upon the circumstances of each case.

Mr. Hall has not obtained title to this water by prescription.

Water & Min. Co. v. New York Min. Co.* 8 Cal. 327, 68 Am. Dec. 325.

It has been the policy of the United States to encourage the diversion of water upon the public lands for the purpose of irrigation and mining, and one of the purposes of the act of Congress of July 26, 1866, was to declare the existence of such a policy, and to protect the rights of appropriators, acquired prior to the passage of the act.

The right of the Crawford company relates back to the 16th day of June, 1891, when Charles J. Grable posted his notice. Although his appropriation was not complete until the actual diversion of the water, still, if he prosecuted the work with reasonable diligence in view of the obstacles which he met, the right relates back to the time when the first step was taken to secure it.

Under the civil law, and under the French law, anyone who saw fit might divert the water and thereby appropriate it.

If the plaintiff, which diverts the water on its own land, is to be accorded the same treatment that would be given a riparian proprietor, then it is not to be allowed to consume all the water; but it may use it all, and, if it turns it back into the stream before it reaches Hall's mill reduced in quantity only by the amount absorbed and evaporated, Hall has no cause of complaint. This would be a reasonable use; and, while the volume might be somewhat lessened, it would be so small that the maxim De minimis non curat lex would be held to apply.

Mr. Hall is entitled to no compensation because no right was conferred upon him which prevented the taking of the water for domestic use and irrigation. In contemplation of law, he bought the land and built the mill knowing what the needs of the community would be, and knowing that the water in White river would be needed to a large extent for irrigation and domestic use.

Holcomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An opinion prepared in this cause by the then chief justice, with one in its nature supplementary thereto, have heretofore been handed down by the court. 60 Neb. 754. 84 N. W. 271, and 61 Neb. 317, 85 N. W. 303. The importance of the questions involved in a decision of the controversy, vitally affecting, as they do, the material interests of the state, and especially that portion of it where irrigation is necessary to successful agriculture, has induced us to grant a further hearing, and again to examine and consider the principal controverted points arising in the case. A full statement of the nature of the litigation is found in the opinion first filed, and we need not here restate it. Briefly, the appellant, who was plaintiff below, began an action equitable in character to have adjudicated the rights of different persons, made parties to the action, to the use of the water flowing in a stream called "White river," and to enjoin the defendant Hall from a threatened interference with plaintiff's headgate and works connected with an irrigating canal being constructed by it. The plaintiff claimed the right to divert the waters of the stream mentioned for irrigation purposes and to supply the town of Crawford, situated near its proposed canal, with water for municipal purposes. Defendant Hall, owning and operating a mill adjacent to the stream which had been utilized for power purposes denies plaintiff's alleged right of appropriation, and claims a right to the continued use of the water ordinarily flowing in the stream as a riparian proprietor. Numerous other defendants, claiming some right to the use of the water as riparian owners or by appropriation, were also made defendants, with a view of having adjudicated the rights of all the parties to the litigation. The trial court refused to take jurisdiction and try the cause on its merits, for the reason that the water rights of the respective parties had not first been determined by the state board of irrigation, under the provisions of the irrigation act of 1895. On defendant Hall's application on a cross petition an injunction was granted against plaintiff restraining it from diverting the water of the stream into its irrigation canal, and the temporary injunction granted in its favor and against Hall was dissolved. From these several orders the plaintiff appeals.

The argument in this court has taken an exceedingly broad range. Narrowed to its simplest terms, the matters in dispute relate to conflicting rights and interests as between riparian owners and those claiming as appropriators of the waters in the streams of the state for irrigation and other beneficial purposes. Incidental to the main question thus stated, there is involved the constitutionality of the irrigation act of 1895, creating and providing for a state board of irrigation, defining its duties, powers, and authority, and especially the portion of the act which empowers such board to determine and adjust the amount and priority of right to the use of water by appropriation for irrigation purposes. There is also presented for consideration the correctness of the ruling of the trial court in dismissing the action begun by plaintiff without a hearing and judgment on its merits. Appreciating the fact that great interests are affected, and the far-reaching consequences of a decision regarding the matter in controversy when finally determined, more than the usual time has been taken, in order that such full consideration might be given the case as the importance of the question presented seems to demand. In the former opinions we decided, in substance, that the plaintiff could not rely upon a statute for the purpose of enforce-ing his alleged right as appropriator, and at the same time urge the invalidity of a material portion thereof on the ground of its alleged unconstitutionality, it being obvious that the invalid portion, if found invalid, formed an inducement to the passage of the entire act, upon which its rights must rest if sustained; and that the act of the legislature of February 9, 1877, did not abrogate the common-law rights of riparian owners as they then existed in this state. It is also held that Comp. Stat. 1897, §§ 47, 48, art. 2, chap. 93a, constituted no acceptance of any supposed grant to the state by the Federal government of the waters on the public domain. While some other questions of a minor character were determined, those just referred to are the only ones having a material bearing on the principal propositions we shall consider in the further examination of the case.

Much of the several briefs of counsel for plaintiff, whose rights are to be decided by the law relating to the right of appropriation of water for irrigation, is devoted to an argument in support of the contention that the doctrine of the rights of riparian owners, as known and enforced at common law, is inapplicable to, and has never legally become a part of, the laws of this state, and is not in force therein. It is insisted that the waters of the state, by virtue of the laws and ordinances in force when it was admitted to the Union are publici juris, always have been, and may lawfully be diverted from any stream where naturally flowing, appropriated by nonriparian owners, and employed for any beneficial use; that the law of prior appropriation of water as defined by the civil law is in force in this state, and not the common-law rule of riparian proprietorship. The argument is constructed on the theory that the civil-law doctrine of appropriation of water in natural streams as belonging to the public became a part of the laws of the territory and state by reason of the Louisiana territory purchase from France, and that nothing since the acquisition of that territory has transpired which has had the effect of displacing the law as it then existed. It is said that, while the enabling act for the admission of the state provided that the people inhabiting the territory forever disclaimed all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States, yet the provision contained in the first state Constitution declaring that the people of the state in their right of sovereignty are to possess the ultimate property in and to all lands within the jurisdiction of the state, and all lands the title to which shall fail from a defect of heirs shall revert or escheat to the people, preserved to them and to the state sovereignty and jurisdiction over the waters of the streams flowing therein, and left in force the doctrine of appropriation as theretofore existing. The scope and effect of the provisions referred to as we view the subject, accorded to the government the primary right of disposal of the public lands, the state maintaining its sovereignty in the exercise of the powers of eminent domain and right to property resulting from escheats and forfeitures.

Without conceding or controverting the proposition of the civil law of appropriation ever being in force in the territory now comprising the state, we feel altogether clear that in the organization of its government, the common-law rule of riparian proprietorship was established as a part of its laws. By the argument along the lines indicated we are asked to overrule the many prior decisions of this court on the subject of water and water rights as relates to riparian proprietors, and declare the law to be as it is applied in the arid states immediately west of us, where the waters of all the streams flowing in and through the states are held to belong to the state, in trust for the people, and subject to appropriation by any person or corporation for a beneficial purpose; the act of appropriating the water being the test of the right thereto and the use thereof, rather than the ownership of the banks between which the stream flows. The argument is not convincing, nor will it justify us in departing from sound and well-recognized principles of law in the decision of the cause. To adopt the doctrine contended for would be a most violent and radical departure from the trend of judicial decisions heretofore prevailing, and would overturn many well-settled and generally accepted principles respecting property rights, and result in an invasion of vested private property interests which is beyond the lawful power of the court or the legislature. To say there is no such thing as a property right of a riparian owner to the use of the stream flowing along or by his land is to work a revolution in the jurisprudence of the state, and violate fundamental principles which lie at the very foundation of the system. In Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 798, 64 N. W. 239, it is held that, except as abrogated or modified by statute, the common-law doctrine with respect to the rights of private riparian proprietors prevails in this country, and that such right is property, which when vested, can be impaired or destroyed only in the interests of the general public upon full compensation, and in accordance with established law. In speaking of the subject, the court says: "Although the contrary has been asserted in some of the arid Pacific states (see Reno Smelting Mill. & Reduction Works v. Sterenson, 20 Nev. 269, 4 L. R. A. 60, 21 Pac. 317; Stowell v. Johnson, 7 Utah, 215, 26 Pac. 290), the common-law doctrine with respect to the rights of private riparian proprietors, except as modified by statute, prevails in this country. Eidemiller Ice Co. v. Guthrie, 42 Neb. 238, 28 L. R. A. 581, 60 N. W. 717, Black's Pom. Waters, §§ 127, 130, and authorities cited. At the common law every riparian proprietor, as an incident to his estate, is entitled to the natural flow of the water of running streams, . . . undiminished in quantity and unimpaired in quality, although all have the right to the reasonable use thereof for the ordinary purpose of life (3 Kent, Com. 439; Angell, Water-courses, § 95; Gould, Waters, § 204; Black's Pom. Waters, § 8), and any unlawful diversion thereof is an actionable wrong." And further on: "The right of a riparian proprietor, as such, is property, and, when vested, can be destroyed or impaired only in the interest of the general public, upon full compensation, and in accordance with established law. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674; Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984; Potomac S. B. Co. v. Upper Potomac S. B. Co. 109 U. S. 672, 27 L. ed. 1070, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 15; Delaplaine v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 42 Wis. 214, 24 Am. Rep. 386; Bell v. Gough, 23 N. J. L. 624; Trenton Water Power Co. v. Raff, 36 N. J. L. 335. That the state may, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, appropriate the water of any stream to any purpose which will subserve the public interests, is not doubted, and that the reclamation of the inarable lands of the state is a work of public utility within the meaning of the Constitution is a proposition not controverted in this proceeding. But even the state in its sovereign capacity is, as we have seen, within the restrictions of the Constitution, and can take or damage private property only upon the conditions thereby imposed." In Plattsmouth Water Co. v. Smith, 57 Neb. 579, 78 N. W. 275, in a contest between riparian proprietors, where the water company was obtaining water from a water course flowing over its land to supply the city for domestic purposes, fire protection, etc., the doctrine is thus broadly stated: "Riparian owners upon streams of water are entitled in the absence of grant, license, or prescription, to the usual natural flow of water in the streams without material alteration." In Slattery v. Harley, 58 Neb. 575, 79 N. W. 151, it is again held: "The common-law rules relative to the rights of private riparian proprietors are of force in this state with the exception of statutory abrogation and changes." With these explicit declarations respecting the rights of private riparian proprietors, made after mature deliberation, clear, indeed, should appear the soundness of a proposition which is advanced with a view of securing judicial sanction when the effect would be to overturn all the cases referred to, and many others we might cite. We do not feel justified in departing from a position so generally recognized and accepted as being correct, so well supported by reason and authority, and which it is believed is in soundness impregnable.

One branch of the argument pertaining to the subject proceeds upon the theory that, notwithstanding the different expressions of the court regarding riparian rights, only so much of the common law as is applicable, and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this state, or with any law passed or to be passed by the legislature thereof, has been adopted and is in force in this state (Comp. Stat. § 1, chap. 15a) and that the common-law rule with respect to the rights of riparian proprietors is inapplicable to the conditions prevailing here, and for that reason riparian rights cannot be said to have ever existed. To support this view of the law it is said that, because of the arid or semiarid conditions prevailing in the western portions of the state, and the consequent necessity for the appropriation and application of water artificially to the soil in order that agriculture may be carried on successfully, the doctrine of the rights of riparian proprietors has no application, and should be so declared by the court. The law of necessity is appealed to, and it is urged the appropriation of water and its application to the soil for irrigation purposes is absolutely indispensable, in order that the wants of the people in the regions referred to may be supplied, agriculture carried on with success, and the country made productive, and capable of sustaining the inhabitants now residing there, and the thousands yet to come. The court is mindful of the great importance of the subject as affecting the most vital interests of the people of the localities where irrigation has, by experience, been found essential to successful agriculture, and its direct bearing on the material welfare of the state at large. Nor can it be doubted that it has been the policy of the legislature for many years past to encourage the development of the irrigation interests of the state by all legitimate methods which it found within its power to call into existence. In solving the problems arising in the development of this most important industry, and extending to it all legitimate encouragement and recognition which may properly come from the judiciary, we cannot lose sight of the fundamental principles which should control our action, and govern in the disposition of all matters coming before the court for adjudication. Property rights, when vested, must be jealously guarded and upheld, or we do violence to the most rudimentary principles of justice. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the law of public ownership of waters and the right of appropriation thereof for beneficial use by individual citizens and corporations is preferable to the private ownership of riparian proprietors in the western portion of the state, where irrigation is necessary, it is at once obvious that these conditions can be held to apply only to a portion of the state, and in fact to a lesser area than where irrigation is proved to be not essential to successful agriculture. As is pertinently said in the first opinion, 60 Neb. 762, 84 N. W. 273: "But can anyone tell at what particular point in the state the common-law rule applicable to riparian owners would cease, and the rule said to be better applicable to the less favored portions of the state would begin? Such a rule would merely tend to breed 'confusion worse confounded,' and would be an assumption of legislative powers by this court inhibited by the Constitution." But it cannot be said that common-law rule of riparian ownership is inconsistent with the use of water for irrigation purposes for, as we shall see later on, the right to the use of water for irrigation purposes is one of the elements of property belonging to the riparian owner along with that of its use for domestic and water-power purposes. If the common-law rule as to real property, when the rights of riparian proprietors are involved, is to be abrogated, then why not say that the common-law doctrine as to other elements of real property or appurtenances belonging thereto, such as emblements, fixtures, and easements, shall also be abrogated? The same reason for the rule exists in the one as well as the other, and can be denied in either only by the assumption of arbitrary power based on neither tenable grounds nor sound principles, and which should find no lodgment in the juridical branch of government. On the same subject the supreme court of Washington,—where climatic conditions are somewhat analogous to those prevailing here,—in the case of Benton v. Johnson, 17 Wash. 277, 39 L. R. A. 107, 49 Pac. 495, says: "But how it can be held that that which is an inseparable incident to the ownership of land in the Atlantic states and the Mississippi valley is not such an incident in this or any other of the Pacific states, we are unable clearly to comprehend. It certainly cannot be true that a difference in climatic conditions of geographical position can operate to deprive one of a right of property vested in him by a well-settled rule of common law. The mere fact that the appellants will not be able to occupy or cultivate their lands as they heretofore have done unless they can irrigate them with water taken from the Ahtanum river is no sufficient reason for depriving the respondents, who settled upon that stream in pursuance of the laws of the United States, of the natural rights incident to their more advantageous location. The necessities of one man, or of any number of men, cannot justify the taking of another's property without his consent, and without compensation." And says McKinstry, J., in Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674: "Aridity of the soil and air being made the test, the greater the aridity the greater the injury done to the riparian proprietors below by the entire diversion of the stream, and the greater the need of the riparian proprietor the stronger the reason for depriving him of the water. It would hardly be a satisfactory reason for depriving riparian lands of all benefit from the flow that they would thereby become utterly unfit for cultivation or pasturage, while much of the water diverted must necessarily be dissipated." We cannot, for the reasons given, lead ourselves to believe that there is any justifiable ground upon which we can deny the common-law rule of riparian proprietors to be in force in all portions of the state, except as it may be modified or supplemented by legislation of the state or of the Congress of the United States, of which we will speak hereafter.

It is quite apparent to those who have investigated that the lawmaking branch of the government of the state, for the purpose of advancing the material interests and welfare of the people, has sought to provide for the building up of a great system of irrigation in those portions of the state where the rainfall is regarded as insufficient to successfully engage in agricultural pursuits, and has authorized, so far as it is empowered so to do, the appropriation of the waters of the state, and their diversion from natural channels, to be used by applying them artificially to the soil for beneficial uses. To uphold and assist in carrying forward this avowed legislative policy is our duty in so far as the same may be done by having due regard for the property rights and interests of all, which is to be determined by those well-settled and recognized rules of general application found essential to the maintenance and protection of property rights and the adjustment of conflicting interests between all who are affected by the operation and enforcement of the law. The riparian proprietor, say all the books and the authorities, has a right to the flow of the water of the natural stream passing through or by his land; such right being inseparably annexed to the soil, and passing with it, not as an easement or appurtenance, but as a part and parcel of the land. This property right can be regarded only as a corporeal hereditament belonging to and incident to the soil, the same as though it were stones thereon, or grass, or trees springing from the earth. Gould, Waters, § 204, and authorities there cited. The riparian right to the use of the water flowing in a natural water course is a property right, which should be regarded as such, and to protect which the owner may resort to any or all instrumentalities which may be employed for the protection of private property rights generally. Gould v. Boston Duck Co. 13 Gray, 442; Ashley v. Pease, 18 Pick. 268; Blanchard v. Baker, 8 Me. 253, 23 Am. Dec. 504; Keency & W. Mfg. Co. v. Union Mfg. Co. 39 Conn. 582; Beissell v. Sholl, 4 Dall. 211, 1 L. ed. 804. The court could as properly say that, in the prosecution of some important enterprise classed as works of internal improvement, such as the construction of irrigation canals, railroads, establishing public highways or other similar undertakings, the property rights of the individual which are invaded or impaired must be ignored because of the necessity and advantage of the public enterprise as to say that the property right of a riparian proprietor may be sacrificed in order that the public welfare generally shall be advanced by promoting a system of irrigation where that method of moistening the soil is found necessary for successful agriculture. The question we are now dealing with has arisen in many of the states where resort to irrigation has been found beneficial and essential in some portions thereof to those engaging in agricultural pursuits, and in all such states, except those in the extreme arid portions of the country, it is held, as we have here held, that the common-law rule of the rights of riparian proprietors is not inapplicable because of the local conditions there prevailing, but is and has been in full force throughout all parts of such states. Sham-leffer v. Peerless Mill Co. 18 Kan. 24; Lone Tree Ditch Co. v. Cyclone Ditch Co. 15 S. D. 519, 91 N. W. 352; Low v. Schaffer, 24 Or. 239, 33 Pac. 678; Benton v. Johnson, 17 Wash. 277, 39 L. R. A. 107, 49 Pac. 495; Luz v. Ilaggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674. We can, therefore, for the reasons given, perceive of no tenable ground for adopting the view contended for, and hold the law of riparian rights, as determined by the principles of the common law, to be inapplicable to the conditions prevailing in the whole or in any part of this state.

It is also urged that, by virtue of the legislation enacted, the common-law rights belonging to riparian proprietors have been abolished. This position cannot be, we think, successfully maintained. The legislature has not, as we construe the several acts of that body relating to the subject, attempted to abolish the common-law rule defining existing rights of riparian proprietors, or to deprive them of such rights when once vested. On the contrary, such rights have been distinctly recognized. Nor is it believed that an attempt to abrogate such rights could be construed as other than an unconstitutional exercise of legislative power, and therefore invalid. In the irrigation act of 1889 the legislature sought to classify the streams in this state, and restrict riparian rights to those owning lands bordering on streams not exceeding a certain width; but this attempted restriction proved abortive as an unwarranted act calculated to deprive riparian proprietors of vested property rights without due compensation, contrary to constitutional provisions in that regard. Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 798, 64 N. W. 239. Otherwise, rights of riparian proprietors have, in the different irrigation acts passed by the legislature, been respected and recognized. What the legislature has done with a view of promoting irrigation, as we understand and construe the different laws enacted on the subject, is to provide for the appropriation of the unappropriated waters in the streams of the state, and to authorize the condemnation of the property in and to the use of the waters belonging to riparian proprietors wherever required, in order that the whole of the waters of a natural stream, when found necessary, may be used for irrigation purposes. The law, when so construed, violates no fundamental principle of property rights, nor interferes unlawfully with the property of another. Legislation of this character provides for an orderly and legal method for the appropriation of the waters of the state, and their diversion from the streams where flowing for the purpose of irrigation and for other purposes contemplated by law, and makes provisions for the compensation to be made where private property rights are taken or damaged for a public use. This the legislature may lawfully do, and on account of which none may rightfully complain. That the common-law rule pertaining to the rights of riparian proprietors has been modified in many material respects under legislation by the United States Congress and by this state will appear further on in this opinion. We are now speaking of the general rule pertaining to rights of riparian proprietors, and not of its exceptions and modifications, which we shall hereafter speak of. We conclude, therefore, that in this state, under any view we may take of the subject, the rights of riparian proprietors to the use of the waters flowing in the streams to which their lands are adjacent, when once attached, is, in its nature, a vested right of property, a corporeal hereditament, being a part and parcel of the riparian land which is annexed to the soil, and the use of it is an incident thereto, which the owners cannot rightfully be deprived of or divested except by grant, prescription, or condemnation, with compensation by some of the means and methods recognized by law for the taking or damaging of private property for public use.

The development of a system of irrigation, and the appropriation and application of the waters of the streams of the state for that purpose, is obviously a work of internal improvement. It is so regarded and expressly declared by the legislature since its first enactment on the subject, and affirmed by this court in more than one of its decisions. By the act of the legislature approved February 19, 1877, the organization of corporations for the purpose of constructing and operating canals for irrigation was authorized, and such corporations were given power to acquire right of way, and to condemn property necessary to the construction of such canals, in the same manner as railroad corporations might acquire property and right of way for railroad purposes; and the law applicable to an exercise of the right of eminent domain by railroad companies was made to apply to such irrigation companies. It was also expressly declared that canals constructed for irrigation purposes were works of internal improvements, and all laws applicable to such enterprises should apply to such irrigating canals. Laws 1877, p. 168. The irrigating act of 1877, with powers more amplified, was merged in and became a part of the irrigation law passed by the legislature of 1899. Laws 1899, chap. 68, p. 503. The law of 1899 was superseded by the more comprehensive act of 1895. The substance of the provisions of the two sections of the act of 1877 being embraced in §§ 39 to 48, as found in Comp. Stat. 1901, art. 2, chap. 93a. Indeed, § 2 of the act of 1877 has been re-enacted in each succeeding law on the subject almost verbatim, while the substance of the other section of that act has been incorporated in several different sections of the act of 1895. It is manifest by a casual inspection of the different laws passed by the legislature, that since the original act of 1877, above referred to, the construction of irrigation canals has been recognized and treated by the legislature as works of internal improvement, to construct and operate which the right to take private property for a public use has been found necessary, and provisions, although at first somewhat obscure in their application, have been made by the legislature to accomplish that end. While §§ 39 and 41 of the act of 1895 (Comp. Stat. 1901, art. 2, chap. 93a), are framed chiefly with a view to authorize the condemnation of rights of way for such enterprises, there appears to exist no substantial reason why they should not be construed as embracing within their scope and effect the same powers and privileges that are given to corporations organized under the district irrigation law which are expressly authorized to condemn the riparian proprietors' right to the use of the water, and divert it for irrigation purposes. Comp. Stat. 1901, § 10, art. 3, chap. 93a. We are of the opinion the broad provisions of § 41 of article 2, when fairly construed, suffice for the purpose of authorizing condemnation for irrigation purposes, as contemplated by article 2, to the same extent as is authorized by § 10 when the irrigation business is conducted under the provisions of article 3. The concluding words of § 41, art. 2, which is a substantial re-enactment of the provisions contained in the latter part of the 1st section of the act of 1877, are as follows: "Upon the filing of said petition [for condemnation] the same proceedings for condemnation of such right of way . . . for railroad corporations, the payment of damages and the rights of appeal, shall be applicable to irrigating ditches, canals, and other works provided for in this act." If the construction and operation of a ditch or irrigating canal results in injury to the rights of riparian proprietors, or takes from them private property for a public use, the provisions of the law with respect to the recovery of damages where property is taken or injured by railroad companies in the exercise of the right of eminent domain become applicable, and may be resorted to by the riparian owner for the recovery of the compensation secured to them by the Constitution. If the authority of § 41 seems insufficient, further authority is found in § 48 of the same chapter, wherein it is provided that irrigation and water-power canals are works of internal improvement, and all laws applicable to works of internal improvement are applicable to such canals and irrigation works. Under these comprehensive provisions the legislature could have intended nothing less than that, in the construction and operation of irrigation enterprises, private property reasonably necessary for the conduct of the business could be taken and appropriated on due compensation by the exercise of the power and right of eminent domain. Water for the irrigation canals contemplated by the act is absolutely indispensable for the successful prosecution of the enterprise. In fact, water to flow in the ditches to be constructed for the purpose of irrigating the soil for the production of crops was the overshadowing and all-controlling factor, without which the law, so far as promoting the public welfare, would be but a hollow mockery, suggestive of a highly absurd situation,—an anomalous condition of affairs. Water, and the necessity of diverting it from its natural channels, and appropriating it for irrigation purposes, as a public use, being of the very essence of the act authorizing the construction and operation of irrigation enterprises, can there exist any rational doubt that, under the provisions we have referred to, the right and authority to condemn property belonging to a riparian proprietor was given to those constructing such works of internal improvement for the purpose of putting the water to the public and beneficial uses contemplated and intended by the passage of the act? By § 81 of chapter 16, entitled Railroads, these corporations are authorized to take, hold, and appropriate so much real property as may be necessary for the construction and convenient use of their roads. The power of eminent domain, which may be exercised under the provisions of this section of the statute, has by the legislature been referred to and become a part of the irrigation statute,—as much so as though actually incorporated therein. There are other sections of the law with reference to internal improvements of other kinds than that of railroads which might also be resorted to, and which are fairly susceptible of the construction, when considered in connection with the irrigation acts, which in terms refer to such laws as giving to irrigation canal companies power to condemn property necessary and essential to their use in the conduct of the business engaged in as contemplated by statute. The property in water belonging to a riparian proprietor, and his right to the reasonable use thereof, as we have seen, is a part and parcel of the land, inseparably annexed to the soil, and is property within the meaning of that word, of which the owner cannot be divested save and except by some lawful method, which would apply alike to all species of real property and appurtenances belonging thereto. This property right, like any other part of his realty, is subject to condemnation and appropriation for public uses in the manner provided by law. It may also be lost by grant or prescription. In McGhee Irrig. Ditch Co. v. Hudson, 85 Tex. 591, 22 S. W. 967, it is held that while, in that state, the irrigation act provides for the condemnation of a right of way only for an irrigation canal, still, under Sayles's Civ. Stat. art. 628, § 6, authorizing canal companies to condemn any land necessary for their use, an irrigation company formed under the act of 1889 of the laws of Texas may divert water which a riparian proprietor had the right to have flow in a certain channel, and to the use thereof as such owner, since such diversion is, in effect, taking land, which may be done under the right to take private property for public uses. Says the court in the opinion by Stayton, Ch. J.: "The general law providing for the incorporation of canal companies contains the following, among the 60 L. R. A.

powers conferred on such corporations: 'To enter upon, and condemn and appropriate any land of any person or corporation that may be necessary for the uses and purposes of said company; the damages for any property thus appropriated to be assessed and paid for in the same manner as is provided by law in case of railroads.' Rev. Stat. art. 628, § 6. The law first quoted evidently only provides for condemnation of ground over which an irrigation ditch might run, and, in the absence of a law providing for the condemnation of every property necessarily taken in such an enterprise, no right to condemn would exist. The act of March 19, 1889, in so far as it provides for condemnation, however, is not in conflict with article 628, Revised Statutes. The provisions of the latter are broader than the former, and, under the power therein given to enter upon, condemn, and appropriate lands, we are of opinion that any property belonging to plaintiffs, and necessary for the uses and purposes of defendant in the business for which it was created, may be condemned, if it will pass, or may be included, under the term 'lands.' The word 'land' includes, not only the soil, but everything attached to it, whether attached by the course of nature, as trees, herbage, and water, or by the hand of man, as buildings and fences." In this state the court has repeatedly held that § 21, art. 1, of the state Constitution, is of itself a sufficient basis to justify an action for the recovery of all damages arising from an exercise of the right of eminent domain which causes a diminution in the value of the private property of another. Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. v. Hazels, 26 Neb. 364, 42 N. W. 93; Burlington & M. River R. Co. v. Reinhackle, 15 Neb. 279, 48 Am. Rep. 342, 18 N. W. 69. In the cases cited the question of damages arose, not for the taking of property, but for damage to abutting property by railroad companies, resulting from obstructions of streets and highways, and other incidents of their construction and operation of railways, causing a depreciation in the value of abutting property. The right of the property owner to the benefit and advantage of a street and highway adjacent to his land, and the right of the riparian owner to the reasonable use and enjoyment of the water in the flowing stream over or adjoining his land, are not without features rendering them in a measure analogous. Speaking of the right to the use and enjoyment of the privilege and advantage attaching to abutting property on the public streets, it is said by the Michigan supreme court such owner has "a peculiar interest in the adjacent street, which neither the local nor the general public can pretend to claim; a private right in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament legally attached to his contiguous grounds; an incidental title to certain facilities and franchises which is in the nature of property, and which can no more be appropriated against his will than any tangible property of which he may be the owner." Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Heisel, 38 Mich. 62, 31 Am. Rep. 306. It is thus apparent that as to the property right of a riparian proprietor to the reasonable use of the water naturally flowing in the stream, provisions effective in character by virtue of the Constitution and the statutes exist for the appropriation of such property and the diversion and use of the water for irrigation purposes, and that upon payment of adequate compensation for the property taken or damaged no substantial reason can be urged why the same may not be done without violating any principle governing property rights known to our system of jurisprudence. The right of a riparian proprietor to the reasonable use of water flowing in a natural channel is property, which is protected by the ægis of the Constitution, and of which he cannot be deprived against his will, except for public use, and upon due compensation for the injury sustained. If the legislature had undertaken to sweep away and abolish this right, we would not be warranted in giving the act judicial sanction. Where, by any possible construction of a reasonable nature, legislation can be upheld, it is our duty to give it such a construction as will uphold, rather than destroy, it. The irrigation act of 1895 is valid when construed as not interfering with vested property rights which have been acquired by riparian proprietors. Such a construction, we are satisfied, is justified by a fair interpretation of the act in its entirety, and considering its tenor, purport, and the object intended to be accomplished by its enactment.

The statute authorizes and regulates the appropriation of the waters of the state for irrigation and other purposes, and in making such appropriations as contemplated by the act the riparian owner whose property rights are appropriated or impaired is entitled to compensation for the injuries actually sustained, to be recovered in a suitable action or proceeding instituted for that purpose. The construction given renders the act effective as providing a method for the development of the semiarid portions of the state by means of a system of irrigation including the appropriation and application of the waters flowing in the streams to the more useful and beneficial purposes of fructifying the soil for the comfort and blessing of mankind.

Our discussion on the rights of riparian owners has extended only to those streams of water where the bed over which it flows is included within the survey of the public lands as made by the United States government, from whom the riparian owners obtain title. Such is the character of the stream the water of which is the subject of the present controversy. In the case at bar the stream is a narrow one, ordinarily flowing but a small volume of water, the bed thereof belonging to the contiguous landowner. Whether the common-law rule fixing the rights of riparian proprietors applies to the larger streams of the state, such as may be classed as interstate rivers, and along the banks of which meander lines have been run by the government in its survey of the public lands, presents an entirely different question, and it would seem that riparian rights would not attach to the waters of such rivers. A final determination of the question, however, is not here made, as this should be left to be decided in a proper case where the subject is fairly presented and considered after opportunity for thorough investigation, aided by the researches and arguments of counsel. As to those streams whose banks form the boundary lines of the estates adjoining, there are forcible reasons, well grounded on authority, for holding to the view that the rules of the common law applicable to navigable streams as therein designated and classified should be held applicable to all such rivers, even though in fact non-navigable. Wood v. Fowler, 26 Kan. 40 Am. Rep. 330; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ramsey, 53 Ark. 314, 8 L. R. A. 559, 13 S. W. 931; Gould, Waters, § 78. While this subject received slight attention in the case of Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 798, 64 N. W. 239, it was not determined, as a decision of the case turned on another point. As to navigable streams, the doctrine seems to be that the water and the soil thereunder belong to the state, and are under its sovereignty and domain, in trust for the people, and cannot, therefore, be the subject of a claim of property therein, or the right to the use thereof by an adjoining landowner. When the government, in its survey, runs meander lines along the banks of a stream, and parts with its title to the adjoining land, the boundary of which would be high-water mark, then it would seem permissible to classify the stream as navigable, in which case the waters thereof and the bed thereunder would belong to the state, and be held by it in trust for the people. The waters in such streams would be held to be publici juris, and not subject to riparian claims by the adjoining landowner. Shively v. Bouclby, 152 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 331, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110; Packer v. Bird, 137 U. S. 661, 34 L. ed. 819, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210; Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 367, 10 L. ed. 997; Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 565; Richardson v. United States, 100 Fed. 714.

The extent of the riparian proprietor's rights in and to the use of the waters of a natural channel is material to a satisfactory disposition of the subject we now have in hand. This right, stated in its broadest terms, is that "every proprietor of land on the bank of a river has naturally an equal right to the use of the water which flows in the stream adjacent to his lands as it was wont to run (currere solebat), without diminution or alteration. No proprietor has a right to use the water to the prejudice of other proprietors above or below him, unless he has the prior right to divert it, or a title to some exclusive enjoyment. He has no property in the water itself, but a simple usufruct while it passes along. Aqua currit et debet currere, ut currere solebat, is the language of the law. Though he may use the water while it runs over his land, he cannot unreasonably detain it, or give it another direction; and he must return it to its ordinary channel when it leaves his estate." 3 Kent, Com. 439; Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463, 44 Am. Rep. 393. While, as an abstract rule of law, a riparian proprietor is entitled to the full flow of the stream as it is wont to flow by nature, yet the rule has so many exceptions, and has been so modified as the law has progressed, that the nature and extent of a riparian proprietor's pecuniary interests or property in a stream cannot be measured by such a rule, nor can the rule now be said to be a full and accurate statement of the law. The law does not recognize a riparian property right in the corpus of the water. Vernon Irrig. Co. v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 762. The riparian proprietor does not own the water. He has the right only to enjoy the advantage of a reasonable use of the stream as it flows by his land, subject to a like right belonging to all other riparian proprietors. Kinney, Irrigation, § 59; Gould, Waters, § 204; Embrey v. Owen, 6 Exch. 353. The property interest in the water is usufructuary, and his right thereto is subject to many limitations and restrictions, and always depends upon its reasonableness when considered in connection with a like right as belonging to all other riparian proprietors. His use must be reasonable, whatever may be its purpose; and he may not, under any circumstances, by his use, materially damage other proprietors, either above or below him. Union Mill & Min. Co. v. Dangberg, 81 Fed. 73; Williamson v. Lock's Creek Canal Co. 78 N. C. 156. The mere fact that the riparian proprietor is deprived of the full flow of the stream adjacent to his land would furnish no basis for compensatory damages. Merely diminishing the volume of water in the stream would not deprive the owner of property for which he could lay claim to a pecuniary compensation. At most, the naked right to the full flow of the stream, and its loss by diminishing the volume of water when appropriated for irrigation purposes, could result only in damnum absque injuria. In order to entitle the riparian owner to compensation, he must suffer an actual loss or injury to the use of the water which the law recognizes as belonging to him, and to deprive him of which is to take from him a substantial property right. It is for an interference with or injury to his usufructuary estate in the water for which compensation may rightfully be claimed where the water of the stream is diverted and appropriated for the use of irrigation. It is such a taking of or damage to property as materially and substantially depreciates the value of the real estate of which it forms a part. Ordinarily, the riparian property right would be limited to the use of the water of the stream for domestic purposes, and, if applied to the irrigation of riparian lands, a reasonable use for such purposes in view of an equal right of use belonging to all other riparian proprietors, which would 60 L. R. A.

fix the basis for compensation where there has been a deprivation of such right by the appropriation of the water for a public use. Low v. Schaffer, 24 Or. 239, 33 Pac. 678. A riparian proprietor's right to the use of water for irrigation purposes must be understood as applying to riparian lands only. He would have no rights as a riparian owner which could extend to nonriparian lands. This raises the question as to extent or area of lands bordering on a stream, or over which it flows, which may properly be classed as riparian land. A riparian owner's right to the reasonable use of water exists solely by virtue of his ownership of the lands over or by which the stream flows. It is obvious that this right cannot be enlarged or extended by acquisition of title to lands contiguous to the riparian land; nor can a riparian owner, as such, rightfully divert to nonriparian lands water which he has a right to use on riparian land, but which he does not so use. Chauvet v. Hill, 93 Cal. 407, 28 Pac. 1066; Gould v. Eaton, 117 Cal. 539, 38 L. R. A. 181, 49 Pac. 577; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442. Land, to be riparian, must have the stream flowing over it or along its borders, and the vital question is how far away from the stream it may be considered to extend. The subject is considered in the case of Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 424, 425, 10 Pac. 773, 774. It is there held that a riparian tract of land (in that case the title to which had been obtained from the state) would include all the sections or fractional sections mentioned in any one certificate of purchase bordering on a natural water channel, and through which it had its course; but says the court: "If, however, lands have been granted by patent, and the patent was issued on the cancellation of more than one certificate, the patent can operate by relation (for the purpose of this case) to the date of those certificates, only, the lands described in which border on the stream." In Boehmer v. Big Rock Irrig. Dist. 117 Cal. 19, 48 Pac. 908, it was held that, where quarter sections of land are granted by separate patents based on separate entries, and therefore constituting distinct tracts of land, mere contiguity cannot extend a riparian right incident to only one quarter section, although both are owned by the same person. The rule in California seems to be that, where riparian lands are acquired by an entryman or purchaser by any entry or purchase, the boundary of the riparian land would be restricted to the land the title of which was acquired by the one transaction; that each tract thus acquired would be treated as an independent tract, beyond which riparian rights could not extend. It is the policy of the government in the disposition of the public lands in this state, as it has been the policy of the state regarding her school lands, to have the land surveyed into townships, sections, and subdivisions of sections, in order that the land may be disposed of in limited quantities in legal subdivisions not less than one sixteenth of a section, comprising a 40-acre tract, and usually not exceeding a quarter section of 160 acres.

The 40-acre tract, or one fourth of a quarter section,—or, if an irregular tract, it is designated as a certain numbered lot,—may be, and usually is, taken as the unit of measurements in the acquisition of title to the public lands within the state. As an illustration, the government authorizes the disposition of the public lands under the pre-emption, homestead, or timber-culture laws in tracts of not less than 40 acres nor more than 160 acres. Where more than 40 acres is taken, it is not required that it be in any particular form, or located within one particular section or quarter section; but, if the 40-acre tracts adjoin each other, and do not exceed the maximum acreage allowed in one entry, a party may thus acquire a good title to the land. Within the limits of railroad grants homestead entries were limited to tracts not exceeding 80 acres, while the railroad grants of land by the government are usually by sections of 640 acres each. Where a homestead of 80 acres has a water course through it, which also runs through a section of railroad land adjoining, there appears no sound reason for saying that the riparian land in one instance would include but 80 acres and in the other 640. If the riparian proprietor's right is incident to the soil, is a part and parcel of the real estate, like the trees and the grass, then it would seem that in this state, at least, in view of the policy of the government in the disposition of its public lands, riparian rights would attach only to those legal subdivisions of a section ordinarily described as 40-acre tracts, or, in lieu thereof, where the tracts are irregular, as a certain designated lot, which border on a stream, or through which it flows. There is neither reason nor logic for saying that, when one acquires a 40-acre tract with the riparian rights belonging thereto, such is the limit of the riparian lands in that case, but where, on the same stream, an entire section is acquired by grant from the government, the whole of the 640 acres, for that reason, becomes riparian lands. It being the policy of the government to dispose of its public domain in tracts of not less than 40 acres each, why, then, may it not be said that riparian rights are limited to such tracts, even though several of them may be joined together in one certificate of purchase or instrument of conveyance? It is not decided that such should be the rule in this state, as it is deemed preferable to leave the question open for maturer investigation and consideration.

From what has been said it must not be inferred that the rights of an appropriator for beneficial purposes contemplated by statute are not as sacred and as much entitled to the equal protection of the law as is the property right of riparian proprietors. Indeed, the property right of an appropriator in water diverted from natural channels and applied to irrigation uses is distinctly recognized in the case of Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 798, 64 N.W. 239, where the doctrine of estoppel was applied to the acts of the riparian owner, and 60 L. R. A.

it was held that, because of his laches, he could not maintain an injunction suit to restrain the diversion of the water by an appropriator and its application to the soil by means of irrigation, and that he would be left to his ordinary remedy at law for compensation for the injury sustained. The two doctrines of water rights—one the rule of priority of appropriation, and the other the common-law doctrine of riparian ownership, whose basis is equality between all those who own lands upon the stream—may, in our judgment, both exist at the same time, as both have existed in this state, as we shall endeavor hereafter to demonstrate. We have spoken of the common-law rule, made so by the legislative adoption of the principles of the common law when applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the state. Valid vested rights have also been acquired by reason of the prior appropriation of the public waters of the state which have received sanction and recognition by the legislature and by the Congress of the United States, which places the title of the appropriator on an equality with riparian owners. The fundamental hypothesis of prior appropriation of water for the development of the arid or semiarid portions of the country is the recognition of the right of the people, or those desiring, to appropriation, and apply to beneficial uses any unemployed waters of the natural streams, and that such rights, when so acquired, are to be determined according to the date of appropriation; priority of acquisition giving the better right. The two doctrines are not necessarily so in conflict with each other as that one must give way when the other comes into existence. The common-law rule of riparian rights is underlying and fundamental, and takes precedence of appropriations of water if prior in time. The two doctrines stand side by side. They do not necessarily overthrow each other, but one supplements the other. The riparian owner acquires title to his usufructuary interest in the water when he appropriates the land to which it is an incident, and when the right is once vested it cannot be divested except by some established rule of law. The appropriator acquires title by appropriation and application to some beneficial use, and of which he cannot be deprived except in some of the modes prescribed by law. The time when either right accrues must determine the superiority of title as between conflicting claimants.

The irrigation act of 1889 abrogated in this state the common-law rule of riparian ownership in water, and substituted in lieu thereof the doctrine of prior appropriation. This legislation could not and did not have the effect of abolishing riparian rights which had already accrued, but only of preventing the acquisition of such rights in the future. The law of 1895 but continued in force the act of 1889 in so far as that act abrogated the common-law rule as to the rights of riparian proprietors, and since the taking effect of the act of 1889 those acquiring rights to the waters flowing in the natural channels of the state are to be tested and determined by the doctrine of prior appropriation. That it was competent for the legislature to abrogate the rule of the common law as to riparian ownership in waters as to all rights which might have been acquired in the future, and substitute a system of laws providing for the appropriation and application of all the unappropriated waters of the state to the beneficial uses as therein contemplated, there exists, it would seem, no reasonable doubt. In United States v. Rio Grande Dam & Irrig. Co. 174 U. S. 690, 43 L. ed. 1136, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 770, it is held that it is within the power of a state legislature to change the common-law rule of riparian proprietors, and authorize the appropriation of the flowing waters within its dominion for such purposes as it deems wise and proper. The substitution of the law of prior appropriation, instead of the common-law rule of riparian ownership, is applicable only to those waters in the state which are unappropriated; or, in other words, which have not become the property of riparian proprietors. In our view of the subject, the rights of the appropriators of water who have applied the same to the soil for agricultural purposes by means of irrigating canals antedates the passage of either of the irrigation acts of the legislature of which we have just made mention. This right has grown out of the necessities of the case, and has been sanctioned by the acts of Congress, and recognized by the laws of the state. It is a matter of common knowledge, historical in character, that in the development of the state in the higher altitudes in the western portions, because of the arid or semiarid climatic conditions which prevail, it has been found impossible to successfully engage in agricultural pursuits, save by applying to the soil, by the process known as irrigation, waters diverted and drawn from natural streams, thereby rendering highly productive a land otherwise valuable only for grazing. It is a fact, so common and notorious that we may properly take judicial notice of it, that since the early settlement of the western portions of the state it has been the custom of the settlers to appropriate the waters of the streams flowing therein by means of irrigating canals, and apply them to the soil in prosecuting the business of agriculture in all its varied branches. We do not mean to say that there has grown up in the section of the state referred to a custom adopted by the people which has been perfected into a system or code of laws respecting the appropriation of water for agricultural purposes, nor do we find this necessary in the present case. What is said is that from the earliest settlement of the semiarid portions of the state, and before the enactment of any irrigation statute providing for the appropriation of water, there has existed a practice or usage of diverting water from the natural channels of the streams into irrigation canals constructed for that purpose, and the appropriation and application of such water for agricultural purposes. Whether or not, under this practice or custom, appropriators have acquired rights which are in their nature property, and which, when once acquired, become a superior title, and give the better right to the use of such water than that of a riparian owner whose title is acquired subsequently, must depend on facts and circumstances as disclosed in any particular case. Where such custom has been so generally recognized as to have the force of law, it can only be regarded as a substantial adoption of the doctrine of prior appropriation of water which obtains in the arid states immediately west of us. Says Mr. Justice Miller, in speaking of the United States statute (act July 26, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 253, chap. 262, § 9, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1437), recognizing the right of those who have appropriated water for agricultural purposes: "This section . . . was rather a voluntary recognition of a pre-existing right to possession, constituting a valid claim to its continued use, than the establishment of a new one." Broder v. Natoma Water & Min. Co. 101 U. S. 274-276, 25 L. ed. 790, 791. The section just alluded to is contained in an act of Congress of July 26, 1866, and provides "that whenever by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested right shall be maintained and protected in the same; and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals, for the purposes aforesaid, is hereby acknowledged and confirmed: provided, however, that whenever, after the passage of this act, any person or persons shall, in the construction of any ditch or canal, injure or damage the possession of any settler on the public domain, the party committing such injury or damage shall be liable to the party injured for such injury or damage." In the decision by the United States Supreme Court, in Bailey v. Gallagher, 20 Wall. 670, 22 L. ed. 452, in which the opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice Field, the section we have just quoted was under consideration. It is there said by the author, after speaking of another case decided prior thereto (Atchison v. Peterson, 20 Wall. 507, 22 L. ed. 414): "Ever since that decision it has been held generally throughout the Pacific states and territories that the right to water by prior appropriation for any beneficial purpose is entitled to protection. Water is diverted to propel machinery in flour mills and sawmills, and to irrigate land for cultivation, as well as to enable miners to work their mining claims; and in all such cases the right of the first appropriator, exercised within reasonable limits, is respected and enforced. We say 'within reasonable limits,' for this right to water, like the right by prior occupancy to mining ground or agricultural land, is not unrestricted. It must be exercised with reference to the general condition of the country and the necessities of the people, and not so as to deprive a whole neighborhood or community of its use, and vest an absolute monopoly in a single individual. The act of Congress of 1866 recognizes the right to water by prior appropriation for agricultural and manufacturing purposes, as well as for mining. . . . It is very evident that Congress intended, although the language used is not happy, to recognize as valid the customary law with respect to the use of water which had grown up among the occupants of the public land under the peculiar necessities of their condition; and that law may be shown by evidence of the local customs or by the legislation of the state or territory, or the decisions of the courts. The union of the three conditions in any particular case is not essential to the perfection of the right by priority; and in case of conflict between a local custom and a statutory regulation, the latter, as of superior authority, must necessarily control." In Lua v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 446, 10 Pac. 674, it is observed by the California supreme court: "From the foundation of the state, waters pertaining to the public lands of both the Federal and state governments have been appropriated and used for mining, agriculture, and other useful purposes. Such appropriation and use were first sanctioned by custom, next by the decisions of the courts, and finally by legislative action on the part of the United States as well as the state. It thus became a part of the law of the land, of which every citizen was entitled to avail himself, and of which every purchaser from the United States as well as the state was bound to take notice. In protecting, therefore, the rights of the appropriators of water upon the public lands of the state and of the United States, no wrong is done to the purchasers from either government. That from the very beginning it has been the custom of the people of the state to divert from their natural channels the waters of the streams upon the public lands, and appropriate the same to the purposes of mining, agriculture, and other useful and beneficial uses, is a part of the history of the state." See also Isaacs v. Barber, 10 Wash. 124, 30 L. R. A. 665, 38 Pac. 871, where it is held that judicial notice will be taken of the fact that at least that portion of the state east of the Cascade mountains was included in the territory where the customary law of miners was in force, and the right of appropriating water for agricultural and manufacturing purposes existed, although the common-law rule of riparian ownership was a part of the law of the state.

Recognizing the necessity for the appropriation of water and its application to the soil for agricultural purposes, the legislature of this state in 1877 passed an act having for its object the formation of corporations for the construction and operation of canals for irrigation, and for that purpose gave them the right to acquire right of way for such canals, and declared the canals to be works of internal improvement. Sess. Laws 1877, p. 168. It is manifest from a reading of the act, brief though it is, that the legislature, recognizing the conditions existing in the semiarid portions of the state where the tide of emigration was then beginning to flow, and the necessity of appropriating the public waters for agricultural purposes by means of irrigating canals, passed the act with the view of providing effective means for the appropriation of such waters and their application to the soil in order that agriculture might be successfully engaged in, and the resources of the state developed. Without irrigation the country was principally of use for grazing; with it, and a soil for fertility unsurpassed which it possessed, and a favorable climate, the country could be made to blossom as the rose, and to sustain a population of thousands, where but hundreds had previously found a means of livelihood. Who can doubt that by the passage of this act the legislature, composed as it was of intelligent men, intended to and did recognize the right of the inhabitants of the public domain—those settling there for the purpose of building permanent homes—to construct irrigation canals, and appropriate the waters of the natural streams for the purpose of promoting agriculture and developing the country? It would be the height of absurdity to say that the construction of irrigation canals was authorized for any other purpose and with any other view than the appropriation of the public waters flowing in the streams. Congress had authorized and sanctioned the appropriation of water for the purposes contemplated by the legislative act. It had declared by the act of 1866 that in the disposition of the public domain riparian proprietors took title to their lands subject to the rights of appropriators who had acquired title to the use of water by appropriation for agricultural purposes, where such rights were recognized by local customs, by the legislature, or by the courts. Practically all the lands in the semiarid portions of the state at the time belonged to the government. It was the riparian proprietor, and it authorized the appropriation and diversion of the water for agriculture, mining, and manufacturing purposes. The state recognized and encouraged the appropriation of water for agricultural purposes by the passage of the act of 1877. There were no riparian proprietors except the general government, or at most but a few, who were or could be affected by the act. It contemplated the appropriation of the waters of the streams and their use for irrigation to meet the necessities of the case in conformity with the custom and usages prevailing in arid portions of the western country, where irrigation was essential to agriculture. The congressional act of 1866 authorized this to be done, and lands thereafter disposed of by the United States were subject to prior rights acquired by appropriation. The act of 1889 (Sess. Laws 1889, chap. 68, p. 503), in which was merged the act of 1877, especially recognizes the rights acquired by prior appropriators, and treated them as it would any other vested property right. Section 13 thereof declares that "all ditches, canals, and other works heretofore made, constructed, or provided, by means of which the waters of any stream have been diverted and applied to any beneficial use, must be taken to have secured the right to the waters claimed to the extent of the quantity which said works are capable of conducting and not exceeding the quantity claimed without regard to, or compliance with, the requirements of this chapter." And the act of 1895 preserved all rights acquired by appropriation prior to its passage. Sess. Laws 1895, chap. 69, p. 244. By § 49 it is provided: "Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to interfere with or impair the rights to water appropriated and acquired prior to the passage of this act."

In the light of the provisions of the act of Congress as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, the different acts of the legislature of this state relating to the appropriation of the waters flowing in the streams thereof, and taking notice of those historical facts connected with its development of which we have made mention, the conclusion appears to us irresistible that every appropriator of water who has applied it to the beneficial uses contemplated by these several acts has acquired a vested interest therein, which gives him a superior title to the use of the water over the riparian proprietor whose right has been acquired subsequent thereto, or who has lost his right, once acquired by either grant or prescription. Assuming, then, as we think should be done, that the right of acquiring an interest in the use of water by appropriation, when applied to the beneficial purposes of agriculture has existed in this state since its early settlement in those portions where irrigation is found to be necessary, the decisive question in all cases as between riparian proprietors and those claiming as appropriators is, Who first secured the right to the use of the water in controversy? Has the riparian proprietor, who appropriates his riparian water right as an incident to and a part of the land obtained from the government, and whose right then attaches, a superior claim, or has the appropriator a better right because prior in time? The answer in each case must depend upon the facts and circumstances as developed therein. As to the law applicable to controversies between those claiming as riparian proprietors and those claiming by right of prior appropriation, see Low v. Schaffer, 24 Or. 239, 33 Pac. 678; Speake v. Hamilton, 21 Or. 3, 26 Pac. 855; Kuler v. Campbell, 13 Or. 596, 11 Pac. 301; Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 214, 31 Pac. 41; Judkins v. Elliott (Cal.) 12 Pac. 116.

In support of its right to maintain an action of the character of the one at bar it is argued by the plaintiff that those sections of the irrigation statute constituting the state board of irrigation with authority to ascertain and determine the priority and amount of past appropriations and allow further appropriations when it is determined there is unappropriated water in any natural stream from which it is sought to divert it, and with other powers as therein defined, 60 L. R. A.

are unconstitutional, because conferring judicial powers upon a tribunal not authorized by the Constitution, and in contravention of its provisions. As we have heretofore made mention, the lower court in the trial of the case refused to entertain jurisdiction and try the merits of the controversy, holding that the state board of irrigation had exclusive original jurisdiction of the matters set out in the petition, and that, as to all issues raised by the pleadings, save those pertaining to an injunction, to hold matters in statu quo pending a determination of such rights of the respective parties as they might be found entitled to. It is no doubt true, as pointed out by counsel, that the sections in question are borrowed from the statutes of Wyoming, in which state constitutional provisions authorize the creation of such a board, while our Constitution is silent on the subject. But it is to be noted that the Wyoming Constitution has not provided for a board of irrigation with judicial functions in the sense that it is a judicial tribunal. The duties of the board there, as here, are supervisory and administrative in character, and not judicial. While it may be true that they are given powers of a quasi judicial character, this of itself does not constitute them a judicial body, nor does it have the effect of conferring upon administrative bodies the exercise of judicial functions in contravention of constitutional provisions. The Wyoming statute, from which ours is borrowed, has been subjected to judicial construction, and is upheld by the supreme court of that state on the express ground that the powers authorized therein are not judicial, but administrative. Farm Invest. Co. v. Carpenter, 9 Wyo. 110, 50 L. R. A. 747, 61 Pac. 258. With this authoritative construction of the statute, and a decision of the very question raised in the case at bar upon reasoning quite convincing and satisfactory, it would seem that the question should be regarded as at rest. The primary object of the board is for the purpose of supervising the appropriation, distribution, and diversion of water. This is obviously an administrative, rather than a judicial, function. Says the Wyoming supreme court in the case just cited: "It is a matter of public concern that the various diversions shall occur with as little friction as possible, and that there shall be such a reasonable and just use and conservation of the waters as shall redound more greatly to the general welfare, and advance material wealth and prosperity." And, quoting from White v. Farmers' High Line Canal & Reservoir Co. 22 Colo. 191, 31 L. R. A. 828, 43 Pac. 1028: "From the very nature of the business, controversies with reference to the use of water naturally led to unseemly breaches of the peace; and to avoid these it was found expedient and necessary to provide complete rules of procedure governing the taking of water from the public streams of the state, and regulating its distribution to those entitled thereto,"—as it were, a sort of policing of the waters capable of use for irrigation, as necessary and required, as well to preserve and procure proper use of the water as to prevent breaches of the peace. In order to accomplish this object, it is necessary and expedient to provide for certain preliminary investigations. Again quoting from Farm Interest. Co. v. Carpenter, 9 Wyo. 110, 50 L. R. A. 747, 61 Pac. 258: "Any effort to supervise and control the waters of the state, their appropriation and distribution, in the absence of an effective ascertainment of the several priorities of rights, must result in practical failure in times when official intervention is most required. . . . In the development of the irrigation problem under the rule of prior appropriation perplexing questions are continually arising of a technical, but practical, character. . . . The board is not required to await the occurrence of controversies, but it to proceed, on its own motion, to ascertain the various rights, conflicting or not, and thereupon see that the water is properly divided." Such functions, it would seem, are clearly administrative in character, and not judicial. It is a judicial function to administer justice between litigants in cases where disputes arise, and to settle these disputes according to law as administered in courts of justice. The board of irrigation, however, in many cases acts in advance of any dispute, and whether there is or will be a controversy in no way affected its powers. The courts can act only as controversies arise between litigants, and then only by determining the questions presented by the litigation. While there are some questions affecting property rights which grow out of the administration of the law by the state board of irrigation, and in which are involved matters in dispute calling for action of a quasi judicial character, yet as to all these ample provisions are made for recourse to the courts. Powers of the same general nature and character are conferred upon almost every administrative body known to the statute, and regarding which it has frequently been decided they are of a quasi judicial nature; and yet such bodies are invariably held to be administrative, and to in no way conflict with the constitutional provisions regarding officers and bodies upon whom judicial power may be conferred. The state board of transportation, as heretofore organized in this state, the constitutionality of which has been invariably upheld, when attacked, in all respects, save as to the manner of passing the law providing for its creation, is a fair illustration of the validity of legislation of this character. Numerous other boards and offices created by statutes of an administrative character, and yet possessing powers of a quasi judicial nature, might also be referred to if thought to serve any useful purpose. For the reasons given, we are of the opinion that the sections of the act in question are not obnoxious to the Constitution on the objections raised by counsel, and that the authority of the board of irrigation to make the determinations contemplated by the act, and the requirement of its approval as a condition to the right of appropriation 60 L. R. A.

under its provisions, is a valid exercise of legislative power.

It does not, however, necessarily follow from the conclusion just reached as to the powers and duties of the board that the courts are in any way ousted of their jurisdiction over actual controversies. The board is possessed of powers of an administrative character. The courts have judicial powers, and, while the board may make all needful preliminary determinations to enable it to regulate the distribution of water, and may determine whether or not proposed appropriations shall be allowed, and in what order, in pursuance of the provision of the statute, subject to the right of appeal, whenever a controversy arises over the substance of the rights of various parties making use of a stream, such controversies are proper for the courts to take judicial cognizance of. The courts cannot administer the statute nor regulate the use of the streams, but they can and should adjudicate disputes based on the rights of parties acquired under the statute. The statute does not create a mere license to the use of the water appropriated. It creates a right in and to the use of the water, and expressly provides for its sale and disposal in the same manner as real property. Comp. Stat. § 63, art. 2, chap. 93a. See also Strickler v. Colorado Springs, 16 Colo. 61, 26 Pac. 313; Frank v. Hicks, 4 Wyo. 502, 35 Pac. 475, 1025. Whenever it becomes necessary to vindicate or support such a right by judicial proceedings, the courts should be open and available therefor as in the case of a controversy regarding any other property right; hence it is that all controversies over water rights arising under the statute are not necessarily for the board of irrigation alone. If a controversy has been submitted to that board and by it adjudicated, and no appeal taken, an entirely different question is presented. But where the board has made no determination, and a large number of persons are claiming the right to divert and use the water of a stream, some by appropriation under the statute, some under prior acts, some by prescription, and others as riparian owners whose rights have accrued prior to the statute, and have not been divested, we know of no sound reason why a suit in equity to determine and adjust such rights and enjoin interference of those rights by others under a claim of right may not be maintained. Such suits are permitted everywhere where the system of appropriation adopted by our statute obtains. In some states they have been provided by statute, but, in the absence of statutes, they have been upheld under general principles of equity jurisdiction. Frey v. Lowden, 70 Cal. 550, 11 Pac. 838. In our opinion, it is altogether proper to permit such suits in this state where riparian rights exist, and have long existed, but are subject to be divested or impaired by appropriations of water under the statute upon due compensation therefor. The litigation involved in the appropriation of water from a stream, the banks of which are thickly settled, would be endless if the jurisdiction of a court of equity to prevent multiplicity of suits could not be invoked. This principle has been appealed to frequently over litigation of water rights, and has been held to permit of a single suit by plaintiff against all of a large number of persons having or claiming rights in the water of a stream which infringed on the rights of such plaintiff. Gould, Waters, § 564. The chief difficulty in such cases arises from the fact that the several defendants have several rights and interests, and are not so connected in interest that a determination as to one would include them all. There is to be found in the reported cases and in the text-books authority for a limitation of the jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits in such cases, but the weight of authority, following the leading case of York v. Pilkington, 1 Atk. 282, holds to a contrary doctrine. Miller v. Highland Ditch Co. 87 Cal. 430, 25 Pac. 550; Hillman v. Newington, 57 Cal. 56; Woodruff v. North Bloomfield Gravel Min. Co. 8 Sawy. 628, 16 Fed. 25; Meyer v. Phillips, 97 N. Y. 485, 49 Am. Rep. 538. See also New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 17 N. Y. 592; Thorpe v. Brumfitt, L. R. 8 Ch. 656; Western Land & Emigration Co. v. Guinault, 37 Fed. 523; United States v. Flounoy Live Stock & Real Estate Co. 69 Fed. 886; Ham-montree v. Lott, 40 Mich. 190; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 252-260. For such reasons we are of the opinion that plaintiff might properly bring such an action as the one before us, so far as it comes within the scope of a bill of peace, to avoid multiplicity of actions.

There is much in the petition to indicate that the action was intended as a general condemnation proceeding as well, and that some sort of administrative proceeding in parceling out and distributing the waters of the stream in controversy was contemplated, as well as the determination of the rights of the several parties. All this administrative work is for the board of irrigation, and, so far as relief of that nature is sought, the lower court acted correctly in remanding the parties to their remedies by a proper application to the board. It is also true that proceedings for condemnation in furtherance of an irrigation project cannot be joined with a suit in equity of the kind just considered. A petition, however, must be judged, and the nature and character of the action thereby begun determined, chiefly by the facts alleged, and the legal results thereof, and remedies appropriate thereto. Alter v. Bank of Stockham, 53 Neb. 223-230, 73 N. W. 667. Disregarding much surplusage and irrelevance, the prayers for an injunction against the several defendants, and the allegations upon which they are based, are sufficient to bring the petition within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. Nor do we see any reason for holding that the plaintiff in a suit in equity in the nature of a bill of peace to protect his water rights and determine and define conflicting rights to or claims upon the waters of the same stream may not offer to do equity by compensating riparian owners whose rights are affected by 60 L. R. A.

the construction and operation of a canal under his appropriation, and that in this way the amounts due the several parties claiming rights by way of damages may become a proper subject of inquiry and adjudication therein.

One other feature of the plaintiff's case it seems proper to here give consideration. The plaintiff, it appears, was under contract to furnish water to the village of Crawford for general municipal purposes, including water for sprinkling streets and for power for a lighting plant; and was also under some obligation to the general government to furnish water for flushing the sewers at Ft. Robinson, an occupied military post located near the village of Crawford. Furnishing waters for the uses alluded to it is claimed is a domestic use of the water, within the purview of § 43, art. 2, chap. 93a, and because thereof the plaintiff claims priority over several defendants as an appropriator of water to domestic and agricultural purposes under the statute. As far as the canal is intended for irrigation, the appropriation of water to flow therein is obviously an appropriation for an agricultural purpose. We do not, however agree with counsel that the other purposes named are domestic, within the meaning of the statute. In our opinion, the term "domestic purposes," as used in the statute, has reference to the use of water for domestic purposes as known and recognized at common law by riparian proprietors. Gould, Water Rights, § 205. The common law distinguishes between those modes of use which ordinarily involve a taking of small quantities of water, and but little interference with the stream, and those which necessarily involve a taking or diversion of large quantities, and a considerable interference with its ordinary flow. The use of a stream in the ordinary way by a riparian owner for drinking and cooking purposes and for watering his stock is a domestic use. It involves no considerable diversion of water, and no appreciable interference with the stream. This right of the riparian owner the statute intended to preserve to him, and to protect against appropriations of water for other uses by canals, ditches, and pipe lines, whereby large quantities will be abstracted. This is the only construction which will give any force to the statute. If all of the water of a stream may be diverted by a canal for so-called domestic purposes involving identical use for power, the priority given agricultural uses is rendered nugatory. This is the construction given similar provisions elsewhere. Montrose Canal Co. v. Loutsenhizer Ditch Co. 23 Colo. 233, 48 Pac. 532; Broadmoor Dairy & Live Stock Co. v. Brookside Water & Improv. Co. 24 Colo. 541, 52 Pac. 792. In the first case cited the court says: "While it is true that § 6 of article 16 of the Constitution recognizes a preference in those using water for domestic purposes over those using it for any other purpose, it is not intended thereby to authorize a diversion of water for domestic use from the public streams of the state by means of large canals. . . . The use protected by the Constitution is such use as the riparian owner has at common law to take water for himself, his family, or his stock, and the like." The principle upon which the decree on the cross petition of the defendant Hall proceeds is in the main correct. Having been brought into court by the plaintiff, he sets up his previously acquired riparian rights, the infringement thereof by plaintiff, and consequent damage, and prays an injunction. It is probably true he would not necessarily have been entitled to an injunction in an independent suit brought by him for that purpose, since there would be no question of repeated trespasses in case plaintiff had acquired a superior right by appropriation for irrigation purposes, and an action at law for damages would be an adequate remedy. But when the plaintiff sued him, and prayed for an injunction against him, he could demand that plaintiff do equity, and pay his damages, before any relief be awarded. The court, we think, was justified in enjoining any interference with the riparian rights of the defendant Hall until this was done. It also appears that, as to those uses to which the plaintiff was putting or seeking to put the water sought to be appropriated by it, not agricultural, defendant had a right to insist that he had priority by reason of his long-continued use for power and manufacturing purposes, and an injunction against any diversion beyond what was used by plaintiff for irrigation, so far as such diversion injured defendant Hall, was proper, in so far, at least, as he was able to make a beneficial use of the water for power purposes for which it was used. Section 20, art. 2, chap. 93a. But the injunction granted goes much beyond either of these grounds. As has been seen, the common law does not give to a riparian owner an absolute and exclusive right to all the flow of the water from a stream in its natural state, but only the right to the benefit, advantage, and use of the water flowing past his land in so far as it is consistent with a like right in all other riparian owners. Hall was entitled to an injunction restraining any unreasonable diversion of the water which produced a substantial injury to him. But he could not insist that the slightest sensible diminution in the volume of the water be stopped merely as such. He was entitled only to protection to the right which he had acquired as a riparian owner against any unlawful invasion thereof.

Connected with this same question is involved the right of the plaintiff, even as against a riparian owner, to divert the storm or flood waters passing down the stream in times of freshets. Hall at most, as a riparian owner, was entitled to only the ordinary and natural flow of the stream, or so much as was found necessary to propel his mill machinery, and could not lawfully claim, as against an appropriator, the flow of the flood waters of the stream. In Modoc Land & Live Stock Co. v. Booth, 102 Cal. 151, 36 Pac. 431, it is said on this subject: "It seems clear, however, that in no case should a riparian owner be permitted to demand as of right the intervention of a court of equity to restrain all persons who are not riparian owners from diverting any water from the stream at points above him simply because he wishes to see the stream flow by or through his land undiminished and unobstructed. In other words, a riparian owner ought not to be permitted to invoke the power of a court of equity to restrain the diversion of water above him by a nonriparian owner when the amount diverted would not be used by him, and would cause no loss or injury to him or his land, present or prospective, but would greatly benefit the party diverting it." And in Fisfeld v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 130 Cal. 552, 62 Pac. 1054, it is held that a riparian proprietor is not entitled to an injunction to restrain a water company engaged in supplying water for public use from diverting the storm or flood waters of the creek which will not prevent the flowing over his land of the ordinary waters of the stream, nor in any way damage his land, or interfere with the rights appurtenant thereto. See also Edgar v. Stevenson, 70 Cal. 286, 11 Pac. 704; Heilbron v. 76 Land & Water Co. 80 Cal. 189, 22 Pac. 62; Black's Pom. Water Rights, § 75.

On the arguments of the case at bar it is suggested that defendant Hall had acquired a prescriptive right to the full flow of the stream by ten years' user. There cannot be, in the very nature of things, any such thing as a prescriptive right of a lower riparian owner to receive water of a stream as against upper owners. The riparian owner is entitled to the reasonable use and enjoyment of the water of the stream, and to insist that the water come to his land to be so used and enjoyed. He may, by prescription, acquire a right to use and divert the water beyond that which the common law would give him, but he gets this right only by adverse user. If he diverts water which otherwise would flow down to a lower owner, that use is adverse. On the other hand, the water which comes to him would come in any case, and there is nothing adverse to anyone, in merely receiving it, that could be said to give a prescriptive right enabling him to prevent reasonable use of it by the upper owner. Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 72, 30 L. R. A. 390, 41 Pac. 18; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442; Mud Creek Irrig. Agri. & Mfg. Co. v. Vivian, 74 Tex. 170, 11 S. W. 1078.

We have herein discussed some matters having an indirect bearing on the main issues involved in the case. The court, however, must not be understood as being committed to any proposition not expressly decided.

It follows from what has been said that the order of the trial court dismissing the plaintiff's action must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to proceed in the further trial of the cause in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Reversed and remanded.

Sedgwick, J., concurring:

I concur in the conclusions reached upon the following questions, which are necessarily involved in the determination of this case:

1. The common-law doctrine of riparian rights is the basis of our law upon that subject, and governs, so far as applicable to our conditions, matters not regulated by our irrigation statutes.

2. Those parts of the irrigation act of 1895 which provide for a board of irrigation, and the adoption of the rule of ownership of water by appropriation, are constitutional.

3. A suit in equity may be maintained against persons claiming rights to use or divert water of a stream to prevent infringement, under the color of such right, of the rights of plaintiff acquired under our irrigation act.

4. Damages accruing to such parties by reason of appropriations under the irrigation act become a subject of inquiry and adjudication in such an equity suit.

5. Lower riparian owners do not acquire a prescriptive right to receive water as against upper owners.

6. I think the scope and character of the riparian rights of the defendant Hall, under the facts disclosed in the cross petition, are rightly determined.

I express no opinion on the discussion of the doctrine of appropriation as existing independently of and prior to our statutes. If irrigation enterprises are to be met with demands for damages claimed to accrue from interfering with the ownership of the body of the water in our streams, which ownership it is claimed is derived from some other source than the irrigation statutes, it seems to me that it will be a serious obstacle in the way of the growth and development of such enterprises, and such rules ought not to be announced until the occasion has arisen in actual litigation, and after full discussion. The doctrine of the private ownership of the body of the water of running streams is not to be found in the common law nor in the civil law, but was originated in our mining states, and developed there under the influence of the necessities of our miners, and later of farmers in the arid and semiarid districts. It is in the light of these facts that we must determine how far the common law has been modified by our Constitution and the legislation thereunder, and how far it is applicable to existing conditions. The question whether the law of riparian ownership applies to "the larger streams of the state" appears to depend upon whether the owner of the land is held to own to the thread of the stream or only to the banks, and the former was determined to be the law of this state in McBride v. Whitaker (Neb.) 90 N. W. 966. I am not satisfied with the discussion of the extent of lands that may be called riparian, and do not see how it is involved in this case.

Petition for further hearing denied.

Jens C. MENG, Appt.,

v.

Charles F. COFFEY et al.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. The power of the courts to declare established doctrines of the common law inapplicable to this state should be used somewhat sparingly, and its exercise is not to be justified unless the inapplicability of a rule is general, extending to the whole or the greater part of the state, or, at least, to an area capable of definite judicial ascertainment.
2. The common-law rules as to the rights and duties of riparian owners are in force in every part of the state, except as altered or modified by statute.
3. The common law does not give to a riparian owner an absolute and exclusive right to the flow of all the water of the stream in its natural state, but only a right to the benefit and advantage of the water flowing past his land so far as consistent with a like right in all other riparian owners.
4. In regulating the use of water by riparian owners, the law distinguishes between those modes of use which ordinarily involve the taking of small quantities, and but little interference with the stream, and those which necessarily involve the taking or diversion of large quantities and a considerable interference with its ordinary course and flow.
5. The purpose of the law as to use of water by riparian owners is to secure equality therein, as near as may be, to each, by requiring each to exercise his rights reasonably, and with due regard to the right of other riparian owners to apply the water to the same or other purposes.
6. A riparian owner may take water from a stream for purposes of irrigation. But his use of the water for such purposes must be reasonable with reference to the size, situation, and character of the stream, the use to which its waters may be put by other riparian owners, the season of the year, and the nature of the region; and he must not, in so doing, unreasonably diminish or wholly consume such water, to the injury of other owners, nor so as to prevent reasonable use of it by them.
7. What is a reasonable use of water for irrigation is largely a question of fact, depending upon the circumstances of each case, and one which may be viewed with some liberality in semiarid regions, where use for such purposes necessarily involves much loss; but waste, needless diminution, or total consumption of a stream, to the injury of others, is clearly unreasonable.

NOTE.—As to correlative rights of upper and lower proprietors as to use and flow of water in stream, including right to use stream for irrigation, see note to Barnard v. Shirley (Ind.) 41 L. R. A. 737; also Jones v. Conn (Or.) 54 L. R. A. 630, and Canton v. Shock (Ohio) 58 L. R. A. 637.

As to right of prior appropriation of water, and various other questions as to water rights, see the preceding case and footnote thereto.

8. An appropriation of water by "squatter's right," not recognized by the laws of this state, the decisions of its courts, nor any general, well-recognized or widely respected custom therein, does not, by virtue of § 2339, Rev. Stat. U. S. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1437), give to the settler who has appropriated water in that way for a less period than ten years an exclusive right as against other settlers upon the same stream.
9. But a settler who so appropriates water, and afterwards duly enters and receives a patent to the land from the government, may, as against other patentees from the government upon the same stream, count the time during which he appropriated the water as a mere squatter in making out the statutory period of prescription.
10. Appropriation of considerable quantities of water in seasons when that may be done without sensible injury to lower owners does not give a prescriptive right to divert the whole stream in dry seasons.

(February 4, 1908.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Sioux County in favor of defendants in an action to enjoin the diversion of the waters of a certain stream. Affirmed in part; reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Chambers Keller and N. K. Griggs for appellant.

Mr. Allen C. Fisher for appellees.

Pound, C., filed the following opinion:

This suit was brought in 1893 to enjoin the defendants, upper riparian owners upon Hat creek and its several tributaries, from diverting the waters of said streams for irrigation purposes to such extent as to deprive the plaintiff, a lower owner, of the use of the stream. Upon trial a decision was announced orally adverse to the plaintiff. On appeal to this court it appeared that no final decree had been entered in accordance with such announcement, and the appeal failed. Thereafter a decree dismissing the cause and following the finding originally announced was duly entered, from which the present appeal is prosecuted.

The defendants justify their diversions of the waters of said streams upon these grounds: (1) Prior appropriation; (2) that irrigation of meadow land to produce forage for their stock is a "domestic" use of the water, for which, if necessary, they may consume the whole; (3) that they have a right to divert the water, as against the plaintiff, by reason of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2339, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1437; (4) that the character of the soil in the region in question and the nature of the beds of the streams are such that the waters diverted would be lost by evaporation and absorption in any event before reaching the plaintiff; and (5) that they have acquired rights to divert the water by prescription. The alleged appropriations were long prior to any legislation authorizing the same, and 60 L. R. A.

The first two positions are clearly untenable if this court is to adhere to its repeated pronouncements that the rules of the common law as to the rights and duties of riparian owners are in force in this state. Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 798, 64 N. W. 239; Gill v. Lydick, 40 Neb. 508, 59 N. W. 104; Eidsmiller Ice Co. v. Guthrie, 42 Neb. 238, 28 L. R. A. 581, 60 N. W. 717; Slattery v. Harley, 58 Neb. 575, 79 N. W. 151; Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, 60 Neb. 754, 84 N. W. 271, 61 Neb. 317, 85 N. W. 303. But in view of the general misconception of the scope and purpose of those rules and their effect upon irrigation, and the earnest and able arguments which have been presented in the endeavor to bring the court to a contrary conclusion, it has seemed proper to treat the question as res integra, and for that purpose the arguments in the several other cases now pending which involve the soundness of the prior decisions referred to have been considered in connection with those in the case at bar. A great deal of what has been urged upon us as demonstrating the inapplicability of the rules of the common law upon this head to conditions in Nebraska proceeds upon an erroneous impression of the nature and purpose of such rules. Thus, in a brief in which the subject is most elaborately and exhaustively discussed, counsel says: "No riparian proprietor in Nebraska to-day is entitled to the full flow of the stream through his premises just for the pleasure it may give him to see the stream filling its banks. . . . The use of the water belongs to the people." And throughout that brief, and in all the arguments we have examined, it is assumed that at common law any taking of water from a stream is an injury to the riparian proprietor and that the latter may insist that no water whatever shall go out. The common law does not hold to so unreasonable a rule. On the contrary, it considers running water publici juris, and, while it will not permit any one man to monopolize all the water of a running stream when there are other riparian owners who need and may use it also, neither does it grant to any riparian owner an absolute right to insist that every drop of the water flow past his land exactly as it would in a state of nature. "No one," said Nelson, J., in Howard v. Ingersoll, 13 How. 381, 14 L. ed. 189, "can set up a claim to an exclusive right to the flow of all the water in its natural state; and that what he may not wish to use himself shall flow on till lost in the ocean. Streams of water are intended for the use and comfort of man and it would be unreasonable and contrary to the universal sense of mankind to debar a riparian proprietor from the application of the water to domestic, agricultural and manufacturing purposes, provided the use works no substantial injury to others." In Embrey v. Owen, 6 Exch. 353, —a case involving the right to use water for irrigation,—Parke, B., said: "This right to the benefit and advantage of the river flowing past his land is not an absolute and exclusive right to the flow of all the water in its natural state, . . . but it is a right only to the flow of the water, and the enjoyment of it, subject to the similar rights of all the proprietors of the banks on either side to the reasonable enjoyment of the same gift of Providence." In the leading case of Elliot v. Fitchburg R. Co. 10 Cush. 191, 57 Am. Dec. 85, Shaw, Ch. J., said: "The right to the use of flowing water is publici juris and common to all the riparian proprietors. . . . It is a right to the flow and enjoyment of the water subject to a similar right in all the proprietors." The common law seeks to secure equality in use of the water among all those who are so situated that they may use it. It does not give to any riparian owner property in the corpus of the water, either so as to be able to take all of it, or so as to insist that every drop of it flow in its natural channel. Vernon Irrig. Co. v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 762. When, therefore, counsel tell us that their clients have a natural right to irrigate, and that reasonable use of the water is necessary in exercise of that right, they urge nothing against the rules of the common law, since the latter merely insist that others along the streams in question have the same natural right, and permit every reasonable use by each consistent with like use by all. The apparent modifications of the common-law rules in the semiarid or arid states in that courts of such states are more liberal in their construction of what is a reasonable use, are no departure from the principles on which the rules are founded. On the contrary, they carry them to their logical conclusion in view of the special conditions of such regions.

Understanding what is meant by the general common-law rule as to riparian rights, and bearing in mind that it does not give to a riparian owner an absolute and exclusive right to the flow of all the water of the stream in its natural state, but only a right to the benefit and advantage of the water flowing past his land so far as consistent with a like right in all other riparian owners, we come next to the question, Is such rule in force in this state? Much of what has been urged to show that the rule is inapplicable to our conditions, and hence not in force under chapter 15a, Comp. Stat., is deprived of its effect by proper statement and limitation of the rule itself and apprehension of the principle on which it proceeds. It is further to be noted that the rule has long been in operation without complaint or objection in the eastern portion of the state, and that the difficulties now asserted arise quite as much from the necessity of application of the principles of the common law to the different circumstances of the semiarid portions of the state so as to reach detailed rules applicable to those sections as from any inherent deficiency in the principles themselves. It is obvious that whatever rule is adopted must be of general effect throughout the state, or, at the least, if there are to be two rules, the 60 L. R. A.

areas within which they are to prevail respectively must be capable of judicial recognition. The territory of each rule must be known to the courts as something of which they take judicial notice. But this is not an arid state. Only a portion of it may be so described with propriety, and there is no arbitrary line by which the arid portions are bounded so as to be judicially recognizable. In the Pacific states, where one rule is applied with reference to the public domain and another in cases of private ownership, the limits are not subject to dispute. But in this state, whether a particular locality is or is not arid is a question of fact in each case (Slattery v. Harley, 58 Neb. 577, 79 N. W. 151), and it would be an anomaly to have the rules of law by which a cause is to be governed depend upon such an issue, and be triable to a jury. Moreover, if a rule of the common law is to be rejected as inapplicable to our state, it must be because its inapplicability is general throughout the state. If it were conceded that the extreme western portion of the state presents conditions to which the common law is not applicable, how are we in a state like Nebraska, in which the diversity of extreme conditions is great, and yet the transitions are gradual and imperceptible, to draw any line at which we may say one condition ceases and another begins? Where purely arbitrary, the drawing of such a line would be legislation; and nothing short of anarchy could result from leaving it undrawn with two conflicting rules in force. What is needed in such cases is a sound and practical mode of applying the principles of the common law to the peculiar conditions of arid or semiarid localities, not a sweeping act of judicial legislation requiring not a little supplementary legislation of the same oblique character. In a case like the one at bar, where but a few of the questions inevitably to arise could be involved, complete formulation of a system of rules would be improper and impossible. But to abrogate the existing law as to riparian rights, and put anything less than an equally complete system in its place, would result in a condition of chaos far worse than the partial or local difficulties sought to be obviated. "Where the precedents are unanimous in support of a proposition, there is no safety but in a strict adherence to such precedents. If the court will not follow established rules, rights are sacrificed, and lawyers and litigants are left in doubt and uncertainty, while there is no certainty in regard to what, upon a given state of facts, the decisions of the court will be. If the common rule is inadequate, the proper course is by legislation." Maxwell, Ch. J., in Wilson v. Bumstead, 12 Neb. 1, 4, 10 N. W. 411, 412. Not only should the inapplicability of a common-law rule be general, extending to the whole, or the greater part, of the state, or, at the least to an area capable of definite judicial ascertainment, to justify the courts in disregarding such rule, but we think, in view of the ease with which legislative alteration and amendment may be had, the power to dec-clear established doctrines of the common law inapplicable should be used somewhat sparingly. In the whole course of decisions in Nebraska, from the territorial courts to the present, this power has been exercised but three times: (1) With reference to trespass upon wild lands by cattle (Delaney v. Erickson, 10 Neb. 492, 35 Am. Rep. 487, 6 N. W. 600), restricted, however, to wild lands by latter adjudications (Lorance v. Hillyer, 57 Neb. 266, 77 N. W. 755); (2) with reference to the effect of covenants to pay rent in a lease after destruction of leased buildings, dissented from, however, by three of the six judges (Wattles v. South Omaha Ice & Coal Co. 50 Neb. 251, 36 L. R. A. 424, 69 N. W. 785); and (3) with reference to estates by entirety (Kerner v. McDonald, 60 Neb. 663, 84 N. W. 92). Of these three cases it may be remarked that the first was in line with legislation which clearly ran counter to the common-law rule, and that the other two dealt with strict feudal rules of property, based on conceptions long since become obsolete. The recent holdings as to the statute of uses (Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Jensen, 58 Neb. 522, 44 L. R. A. 861, 78 N. W. 1054), and the statute of Elizabeth concerning charitable uses (St. James Orphan Asylum v. Shelby, 60 Neb. 796, 84 N. W. 273), are of different nature. In the statute of uses the court did not have to do with a rule of the common law, but with an English statute, which was not adjustable to our legislation as to conveyances. In the statute of Elizabeth relating to charitable uses the court was again dealing with an English statute, and, as that statute gave extra-judicial powers to the courts, which they could not exercise under our Constitution, the question was one of legislative superseding of the rule, not of inapplicability. Thus, the distinction between the case at bar and those in which common-law rules or English statutes have been set aside is readily apparent. Here we are confronted with no legislation to the contrary, nor are we dealing with an antiquated rule of feudal origin, but with an enlightened system of rules, founded on obvious principles of justice, and concededly applicable to the general conditions of the country and to the greater part of this state. Moreover, in each of the three cases in which common-law rules have been held inapplicable there was a complete rule at hand to take the place of the one rejected, and no complicated and extensive judicial legislation was required. In the case of trespasses by cattle the herd law was on the statute books. The rule as to the effect of covenants in a lease to pay rent was an isolated rule, without collateral consequences, and the obvious and well-settled principle of apportionment, governing all agreements, was available in its stead; and the doctrine of tenancy by the entirety stood alone, unconnected with any general body of rules, and all cases that might have been governed by it were readily referable to the rules governing tenancy in common: In like manner, with the statute of uses removed, we had a complete statutory system of conveyancing, and, in the absence of the statute of charitable uses, there were still the general equitable powers of the court of chancery existing anterior to that statute. But while in those cases a single rule, part of no general system of modern application, was rejected, here the rules assailed are results of a general doctrine and part of a complete system, and to overthrow them would leave the whole body of the law of waters unsettled and confused. The subject calls for legislative, not for judicial, action. Black's Pom. Water Rights, §§ 162, 163.

Nor do we believe that the common-law rule of equality among riparian owners, administered liberally with respect to the circumstances of particular localities, is necessarily prohibitive of irrigation anywhere. If we bear in mind wherein the essential doctrine of the common law on this subject consists, we doubt whether a more equitable starting point for a system of irrigation law may be found; and we are not alone in this view. Black's Pom. Water Rights, § 163. But if the existence of a rule better applicable to parts of the state were of itself sufficient ground for judicial overturning of the law, the question would arise, What principle are we to adopt? The one for which counsel contend—and the only one that could be contended for seriously—is the doctrine of appropriation, and, believing that to adopt this doctrine by judicial legislation in place of the rules of the common law would lead to difficulties in other parts of this state no less great than those charged to the rules at present sanctioned, we propose to review briefly its history and some of its incidents. The history of this doctrine is well known, and has often been set forth. Black's Pom. Water Rights, §§ 11-24; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 494; Atchison v. Peterson, 20 Wall. 507, 22 L. ed. 414. It arose in California at a time when government and law were not yet established, when there was no agricultural population and were no riparian owners, and when streams could be put to no use except for mining. From the necessities of the case, there being no law applicable, the miners held meetings in each district or locality, and adopted regulations by which they agreed to be governed. As at that time streams could be put to no use except for mining, and as the use of large quantities of water was essential to mining operations, it became settled as one of the mining customs or regulations that the right to a definite quantity of water, and to divert it from streams or lakes, could be acquired by prior appropriation. This custom required strength; rights were gained under it, and investments made and it was soon approved by the courts and by local legislation; and, though not originally available against the general government or its patentees, was made so available by the act of Congress in 1866. Act July 26, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 253, chap. 262, § 9, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1437. But it was only the same rule as that by which possession of mining claims was recognized. It was a custom intended to prevent disorder and forcible dispossession of those who had located mines. As stated by Field, J., in Atchison v. Peterson, 20 Wall. 507, 22 L. ed. 414: "By the custom which has obtained among miners in the Pacific states and territories, where mining for the precious metals is had on the public lands of the United States, the first appropriator of mines, whether in placers, veins, or lodes, or of waters in the streams on such lands for mining purposes, is held to have a better right than others to work the mines or to use the waters." In other words, the doctrine in question was not formulated as an enlightened attempt to adjust the conflicting relations of a large community of individuals. It was a crude attempt to preserve order and the general peace, and to settle customary rights among a body of men subject to no law, under which so many and so valuable rights arose that when the law stepped in it was obliged to recognize them. In this way the rule of appropriation became established in the Pacific states, in opposition to the common law, with reference to streams or bodies of water which wholly ran through or were situated upon the public lands of the United States. Black's Pom. Water Rights, § 15. These rules, however, were confined to the public lands, and are so confined at the present time in California, Oregon, and Washington. In other states and territories the new doctrine was given general application; sometimes by judicial decision, as in Nevada, but chiefly by constitutional or legislative enactment. Thus, in those states of which the whole or a portion is arid, we now find some in which the common-law rules are in force,—California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, North Dakota, and substantially Texas,—though in many of these, for reasons stated, the other rule obtained upon the public lands of the United States; others in which the doctrine of prior appropriation is in general force,—Nevada, Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Utah, Wyoming. Of these, however, Colorado, Idaho, and Wyoming have constitutional provisions declaring such to be the paramount law, and in the other jurisdictions named it is generally established by statute. Not only does the history of the rule obviously remove our state from its operation, but a mere comparison of the jurisdictions where the contending principles are in force is very suggestive. In all states which, like our own, are but partially arid, the common law is in force. The states holding to the contrary rule are wholly within the arid regions. Moreover, whereas in those states, and some of the partially arid, the arid regions were first settled, and rights, customs, and legislation grew up and were shaped with reference to such conditions, with us the amply watered regions of the eastern portion of the state were first settled, and our laws, legislation, and lines of judicial decisions were fixed before agriculture in the arid or semiarid portions of the state was at all established. Not only does this suggest that the appropriation doctrine unregulated by minute legislation is unsuited and inapplicable to the state as a whole, but a consideration of some of its incidents will make such conclusion manifest. Under such doctrine the first appropriator may appropriate the entire flow of a stream, if used in proper irrigation. Hammond v. Rose, 11 Colo. 524, 19 Pac. 466; Drake v. Earhart, 2 Idaho, 716, 23 Pac. 541. Also, a nonriparian may appropriate and get an exclusive right to the whole water of a stream for nonriparian lands. Hammond v. Rose, 11 Colo. 524, 19 Pac. 466. It must be clear that such rules are not applicable to this state at large. Land along streams has been bought and sold, and titles have been acquired, for many years throughout the older portions of the state in reliance upon the rights and advantages incident to ownership of riparian property. The application of the rules of the common law in this state having been undoubted so long, the results of suddenly overturning them and permitting the first comers to get all the water from the several streams in the older parts of the state by mere appropriation, and turn whole streams upon nonriparian tracts, would be intolerable. Not only have these rules been relied upon in the acquisition and disposition of property, but they have received legislative recognition. Comp. Stat. § 8, chap. 57, providing for ascertainment of damage to lower owners by retention of water in mill ponds; Comp. Stat. § 32, art. 3, chap. 93a; Comp. Stat. § 6, art. 1, chap. 93a, and perhaps § 43, art. 2, of the last-named chapter,—indicate an understanding that riparian owners have rights which must be respected, and may only be divested by due process of law. Counsel contend that the irrigation act of 1877 "looked on the law of riparian rights with disapproval." But this statement, already sufficiently refuted in the opinion in Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, 60 Neb. 754, 84 N. W. 271, is based upon the fallacious assumption that any taking of water from a flowing stream is an infraction of riparian rights.

For the reasons indicated, we are of opinion that the former holdings of the court must be adhered to, and that, except as altered by statutes, the common-law rules are in force in every part of the state. The details of such rules with respect to irrigation, however, and their application to irrigation in the semiarid portions of the state, have not, as yet, received careful consideration by this court. It is generally recognized that at common law a riparian owner may take water from a stream for purposes of irrigation. Embrey v. Owen, 6 Exch. 353; Elliot v. Fitchburg R. Co. 10 Cush. 191, 57 Am. Dec. 85; Gillett v. Johnson, 30 Conn. 180; Ulbricht v. Eufaula Water Co. 86 Ala. 587, 4 L. R. A. 572, 6 So. 78; Gould, Waters, § 617. At an early day there was a tendency to class irrigation among those uses of a stream which might be carried even to entire consumption of its waters. But another view has long prevailed, and is now well established, not only in the eastern portion of the country, but even in the arid and semiarid states (so far as such states recognize the common-law doctrine as to riparian rights), to the effect that irrigation is one of those uses which must be exercised reasonably with due regard to the rights of others. Low v. Schaffer, 24 Or. 239, 33 Pac. 678; Gillett v. Johnson, 30 Conn. 180; Black's Pom. Water Rights, § 151; Gould, Waters, §§ 205, 217. This subject has been confused needlessly by the unfortunate use of the words "natural" and "ordinary" in this connection to distinguish those uses which the common law does not attempt to limit, and "artificial" or "extraordinary" to designate those which are required to be exercised within reasonable bounds. It is no doubt true that irrigation is a very natural and a very ordinary want, and that use of a stream for such purpose is natural and ordinary in semiarid regions. But such is not the question. The law does not regard the needs and desires of the person taking the water solely to the exclusion of all other riparian proprietors, but looks rather to the natural effect of his use of the water upon the stream and the equal rights of others therein. The true distinction appears to lie between those modes of use which ordinarily involve the taking of small quantities, and but little interference with the stream, such as drinking and other household purposes, and those which necessarily involve the taking or diversion of large quantities and a considerable interference with its ordinary course and flow, such as manufacturing purposes. The purpose of the law is to secure equality in the use of the water by riparian owners, as near as may be, by requiring each to exercise his rights reasonably, and with due regard to the right of other riparian owners to apply the water to the same or to other purposes. This purpose is not subverted by any arbitrary classification, and in regions where water must be carefully husbanded, and is in great demand for agricultural purposes, it is obviously better to incline toward such a rule as will further equality and a wide participation in the benefits of a stream. Lua v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674. Accordingly, wherever the common-law rules as to riparian rights apply, even in the arid portions of the country, the weight of authority places irrigation among those uses of a stream which must be exercised reasonably under the circumstances of each case. Union Mill & Min. Co. v. Ferris, 2 Sawy. 176, Fed. Cas. No. 14,371; Union Mill & Min. Co. v. Dangberg, 2 Sawy. 450, Fed. Cas. No. 14,370; Smith v. Corbit, 116 Cal. 587, 48 Pac. 725; Baker v. Brown, 55 Tex. 377; Trambley v. Luteran, 6 N. M. 15, 27 Pac. 312; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 487; Black's Pom. Water Rights, § 151. This conclusion is not altered, so far as concerns the case at bar, by § 65, art. 2, chap. 93a, Comp. Stat. which declares water for irrigation to be a "natural want." If that section was meant to enact a new rule we have here a cause which arose two years prior to its adoption. If it was meant to be declaratory, we must consider it in connection with § 43, which says that domestic uses must come before agricultural uses, and is inconsistent with any construction that would allow complete diversion of the whole stream for irrigation as against those who desire to use its water for domestic purposes. It would doubtless be impolitic to give an arbitrary or hard and fast meaning to the word "reasonable" in this connection. The use of water for irrigation always involves some loss, and we do not think it would be wise to declare every perceptible diminution of the waters of a stream to be unreasonable. The necessity of a liberal view of what constitutes a reasonable use of water for irrigation has been judicially recognized (Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 676, 29 Pac. 325; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442), and we think caution in that respect entirely proper. If the rights of the upper owner in the water are no more than those of the lower owner, they are at the same time no less. His right to reasonable use of the water for irrigation ought not to be rendered nugatory by requiring it to be exercised in an impossible manner. We do not think this conflicts with what was said in Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 798, 64 N. W. 239, and reaffirmed in Slattery v. Harley, 58 Neb. 575, 79 N. W. 151, since the court was there considering only whether the common-law rules were in force, not the definition of the reasonable use allowed by those rules as applied to sections of the state shown by pleadings and proofs to be arid. Nor does it conflict with the holding in Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, 60 Neb. 754, 84 N. W. 271, hereinbefore reiterated to the effect that the common-law rules apply in every part of the state. For, if we regard the question of what is reasonable use as in great part one of fact, the conditions of soil, climate, and rainfall in any given locality, when proved, may be considered properly as important elements of fact, without in the least affecting the general rule. But if we concede so much, the law insists that the lower owner shall not be deprived of the use of the water to an unreasonable extent. Sampson v. Hoddinott, 1 C. B. N. S. 590. The uses which an upper riparian owner may make of a stream for purposes of irrigation must be judged, in determining whether they are reasonable, with reference to the size, situation, and character of the stream, the uses to which its waters may be put by other riparian owners, the seasons of the year, and the nature of the region. These circumstances differ in different cases, and what use is reasonable must be largely a question of fact in each case. Lua v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674; Baker v. Brown, 55 Tex. 377; Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 676, 29 Pac. 325; Minnesota Loan & T. Co. v. S. A. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. 82 Minn. 505, 85 N. W. 520; Embrey v. Owen, 6 Exch. 353; Pitts v. Lancaster Mills, 13 Met. 156. Some things, however, are clearly unreasonable, and it may be laid down absolutely that the upper owner, in using the water for irrigation, must not waste, needlessly diminish, or wholly consume it, to the injury of other owners, nor so as to prevent reasonable use of it by them also.

Union Mill & Min. Co. v. Dangberg, 2 Sawy. 450, Fed. Cas. No. 14,370; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674; Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 676, 29 Pac. 325; Gould v. Eaton, 117 Cal. 539, 38 L. R. A. 181, 49 Pac. 577; Coffman v. Robbins, 8 Or. 279; Gillett v. Johnson, 30 Conn. 180.

Judged in this way, we think the use made of the streams in question by three of the defendants may not be said to be reasonable. Hat creek is a small stream, about 10 feet wide where it passes the plaintiff's lands, formed by the junction of a number of similar streams a few miles above. Of these, Warbonnet creek, after gathering several small tributaries, flows into Munroe creek, which is received by Sowbelly creek, and the latter soon joins Hat creek, into which, some distance above, a number of smaller streams have been united. All of these creeks are fed by springs in the hills, and flow the year round, although at times somewhat reduced in volume in dry weather. There is some conflict in the testimony as to the disposition of the water diverted by the several defendants, and how far it, or some of it, may return to the creeks. The most satisfactory testimony is that of the county surveyor, and we have looked chiefly to his statements for an understanding of the facts. The defendant Brewster maintains a dam on Warbonnet creek, and a ditch, by means of which he irrigates some 300 acres. The capacity of this ditch is sufficient to contain the entire stream. It takes the water away from the creek to a point about a mile off, where the dip is but very slightly toward the creek, and there discharges it, so that practically all that is not used in irrigation will, in hot weather, evaporate, and not return to the creek. On one occasion, when the season was very dry in that vicinity, and a number of Mr. Brewster's neighbors below him were complaining because they could get no water, it appears that he was turning the water upon a meadow of 80 to 100 acres, so that it stood there from 1 to 1½ inches deep; and, as we have seen, what was not used was substantially wasted. This is obviously unreasonable. The defendant Wilcox maintains a ditch on Munroe creek, with which he irrigates 150 acres. This ditch also is sufficient to carry the whole stream, and the water is so discharged that none gets back into the creek, since the ground slopes in another direction at the point of discharge. With respect to the defendant Coffey, who maintains a ditch on Hat creek, with which he irrigates 160 acres, the case is not so clear. But at the time the writs were served in this case, while there was an abundance of water in his ditch, the sheriff found the creek dry a mile and a half below, and the bed of the creek opposite the plaintiff was so dry that dust blew in it. It is claimed that the character of the creek bed and nature of the soil in that vicinity, shown by the testimony to be close to the "bad lands," at an altitude of 4,600 feet, in an arid region, is such that in a dry season the waters of the creek would evaporate, or be absorbed in the ordinary course of things, before they reached the plaintiff. This, if true, would be a strong circumstance to consider in determining what would be a reasonable use of the water. Union Mill & Min. Co. v. Dangberg, 2 Sawy. 450, 459, Fed. Cas. No. 14,370. But a large number of witnesses, well acquainted with the neighborhood, deny this, and the fact that in a former very dry season plaintiff had had water except for two or three days, and that as soon as the injunction was served, water flowed several inches deeper than usual past his land, would indicate that the condition of the creek when suit was brought was due to complete diversion of its waters by the dam above. With respect to the defendant Steele, however, who is on Middle Hat creek, above Coffey, the evidence is that all of the water taken out by him, except what is consumed by evaporation, goes back to the creek, and there is no evidence of unreasonable use or of injury to the plaintiff.

The further claim of the defendants, based upon § 2330 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1437), so far as such section is relied upon in connection with the legislation of this state to set up rules at variance with the doctrines of the common law, is disposed of adversely in Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, 61 Neb. 317, 85 N. W. 303. But they also contend that, by virtue of said section, as prior appropriators who have duly entered and received patents to their lands, they are entitled to take the waters of said streams as against the plaintiff, who is a subsequent patentee from the government. The section in question has been construed repeatedly by the Federal courts, and its meaning is not open to question. Bassey v. Gallagher, 20 Wall. 670, 22 L. ed. 452; Broder v. Natoma Water & Min. Co. 101 U. S. 274, 25 L. ed. 790; Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U. S. 453, 25 L. ed. 240. In Jennison v. Kirk the court says: "In other words, the United States, by the section, said that whenever rights to the use of water by priority of possession had become vested, and were recognized by the local customs, laws, and decisions of the courts, the owners and possessors should be protected in them," although the title to the lands might be in the government. In Bassey v. Gallagher it is said: "It is very evident that Congress intended, although the language used is not happy, to recognize as valid the customary law with respect to the use of water which had grown up among the occupants of the public land under the peculiar necessities of their condition; and that law may be shown by evidence of the local customs, or by the legislation of the state or territory, or the decisions of the court. The union of the three conditions in any particular case is not essential to the perfection of the right by priority; and in case of conflict between a local custom and a statutory regulation, the latter, as of superior authority, must necessarily control." In the Pacific and mining states appropriation of water by squatters on the public land became the subject of legislation and judicial decision very early in the history of those communities, whereby customs that had grown up and come to be well-defined, widely recognized, and generally respected in the regions in question were given legal force. Irrigation is very young in this state, as the semiarid portions did not begin to be settled till about 1880. Neither by legislation nor by judicial decision had appropriation of water been recognized in this state as conferring any right until the statutory period of prescription had elapsed. Nor had any such general, well-recognized, or widely respected custom grown up in this state as to justify the application of the Federal statutes thereto. The customs in the states to which Congress had reference were widespread and notorious. The custom attempted to be proved in this case was at best very confined in its limits, known to few, admitted by few, and, as the testimony shows, often disputed. The defendants testify that they began taking the water by "squatter's right." One witness says that in 1880 and 1881 it was usual for every man in northwestern Nebraska to "take what water he could." Others testify that at that time no one respected any other's rights in this regard, but each put in a ditch wherever he could. Another says: "About all the rules there was, if a man went and took out a ditch, he went and took it out." There is some testimony of a custom of respecting prior appropriations. But the weight of the evidence is to the effect that there were very few settlers, and all took what was at hand, without regulation or custom of any sort. Hence we do not think use of the water under such circumstances for a less period than ten years operated to give any right to the defendants as against the plaintiff under the section in question. On the other hand, however, we are of the opinion that under that section the period during which the defendants maintained their ditches as squatters, and afterwards under homestead entries, prior to obtaining patents for their land, may be counted by them in making out the statutory period of prescription as against the plaintiff, a subsequent patentee from the government. The statute has been construed to be a recognition by the government of all claims which might accrue to such squatters as against other settlers, and to intend that all patents which might issue should be subject to such rights. As a right began to accrue as soon as the ditches were dug, we think the period during which the defendants appropriated water "by squatter's right," while giving rise to no rights against the government, is available in proving rights by prescription against the plaintiff. Tolman v. Casey, 15 Or. 83, 13 Pac. 669.

This brings us to the last claim made by the defendants, namely, that they are entitled to divert the water of the several streams in question by virtue of ten years' adverse user. We may leave the defendant Steele out of account, because, as has been seen, the evidence does not show that his use of the water is unreasonable. Likewise, the defendant Wilcox may be dismissed with a few words, since his dam was not built till 1884, and his ditch as it now stands was not dug till 1886. As this suit was begun in 1893, he can claim nothing by prescription. The defendant Brewster put in his dam in 1879 or 1880, and, though he made some enlargements, his system of irrigation seems to have been in existence in its present condition for ten years before the bringing of this action. As to Coffey's ditch, the testimony is conflicting. It was begun in 1881, but seems to have been added to several times, and there is testimony that it was enlarged as late as 1886. But we need not review the testimony on this point, because, conceding that his ditch was in its present form ten years prior to the bringing of this action, neither he nor the defendant Brewster has proved a right to consume all the water of the streams by prescription. The plaintiff settled upon his land in 1886, five years after Coffey began his ditch, and from that time until 1893 there is abundant evidence that he had water in the creek at all times except for a day or two in 1890. No right to divert and dissipate the whole stream was acquired by making such use thereof as would still leave water for the plaintiff. So long as the water was sufficient for all, there was no adverse user. Anaheim Water Co. v. Semi-Tropico Water Co. 64 Cal. 185, 30 Pac. 623; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442; North Powder Mill Co. v. Coughanour, 34 Or. 9, 54 Pac. 223; Church v. Stillwell, 12 Colo. App. 43, 54 Pac. 395; Egan v. Estrada (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 721. One of the elements to be considered in determining what is a reasonable use of the water of a stream is the season of the year, and its effect upon the stream. Riparian owners are not to be debarred from use of water because the season is dry and the stream low. But at such time they must take care "to do no material injury to the common right of plaintiff, having regard to the then stage of the river." Union Mill & Min. Co. v. Dangberg, 2 Sawy. 450, 458, Fed. Cas. No. 14,370. The testimony is that the season of 1893 was unusually dry. Hence what might have been a reasonable use of the water, or at least such use as gave the plaintiff no ground of complaint, in other years, became highly unreasonable when it had the effect of giving Coffey and Brewster all the water, and leaving none for other owners. Only a continuous and adverse user of the whole stream could give a right to take out a greater proportion of such water as was in the stream at the time than they had habitually taken in former years.

It is therefore recommended that the decree be affirmed as to the defendant Steele, but reversed as to the defendants Coffey, Brewster, and Wilcox, with directions to make new and further findings of fact in conformity with this opinion, and to enter a decree enjoining the defendant Wilcox from wasting or unreasonably diminishing the waters of Munroe creek, and enjoining the defendants Brewster and Coffey from consuming all the waters of Warbonnet and Hat creeks, respectively, in the irrigation of their lands, or permanently diverting in any year a greater proportion of the water in such streams for the time being than they were accustomed to take out prior to the summer of 1893, having regard to the nature of the season and the condition of the stream at the time. In consequence, however, of the long time that has elapsed since trial, we think it would be entirely proper to take further evidence upon the question of the amount of water which such defendants may divert, should the lower court so desire.

Sedgwick, C., concurs. Oldham, C., having been of counsel in Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, did not sit.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons set forth in the foregoing opinion, the decree of the District Court is affirmed as to the defendant Steele, but reversed as to the defendants Coffey, Brewster, and Wilcox, with directions to make new and further findings of fact in conformity with said opinion, and to enter a decree enjoining the defendant Wilcox from wasting or unreasonably diminishing the waters of Munroe creek, and enjoining the defendants Brewster and Coffey from consuming all the waters of Warbonnet and Hat creeks, respectively, in the irrigation of their lands, or permanently diverting in any year a greater proportion of the water in such streams for the time being than they were accustomed to take out prior to 1893, having regard to the nature of the season and the condition of the stream at the time; that proportion and other questions of fact necessary to the rendition of such decree to be ascertained from the evidence already taken, or by taking further evidence at the discretion of the District Court.

v.

Arthur L. SHADER.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. In pleading performance of conditions precedent under § 128, Code Civ. Proc., a plaintiff may properly assume that conditions which have been waived will not be relied upon and allegations of waiver to meet a defense based on such conditions are not inconsistent with the statutory allegation that all conditions on his part have been duly performed.

2. A plaintiff does not change his cause of action by substituting allegations of waiver for a general denial with respect to a defense of breach of conditions precedent.
3. Former decisions of this court as to waiver of conditions in policies of insurance and the construction of such conditions adhered to.
4. Provisions in a policy of insurance that the risk shall not attach unless the premium has been actually paid are waived in case the policy is delivered upon an agreement to extend credit, and the insurer does not take advantage of said provisions, but treats the policy as in force.
5. Receiving the premium after destruction of all the insured property, so that nothing remains to which insurance might attach, waives a provision that the insurer shall not be liable for a loss occurring before payment of the premium.
6. Where an agent who has general power to receive and collect premiums accepts a premium after loss, and the insurer desires to repudiate such act, it should return or tender the money to the insured. Mere return to the agent, with instructions which are not executed, will not suffice.
7. The decision of the trial court upon conflicting evidence as to misconduct of counsel will not be disturbed.
8. While not to be commended, an instruction directing the jury to "do substantial justice" between the parties is not prejudicial error where they are told to do so by finding a verdict "solely from the evidence in the case, applying the law as given in these instructions."

Found, C., filed the following opinion:

On a former occasion a judgment for the plaintiff in this cause was reversed for the reason that the trial court permitted him to show waiver of conditions in a policy of insurance upon a reply which only denied that there had been any breach. Upon a new trial a verdict for the plaintiff was again rendered, and the insurance company has come to this court on error a second time.

The principal errors assigned are the admission of parol evidence as to waiver of conditions in the policy notwithstanding a provision that no agent should have power to waive such conditions otherwise than by a written indorsement, and certain instructions whereby the question as to waiver was left to the jury. It is also claimed that the amendments whereby plaintiff was allowed to set up waiver of the conditions in the policy state a new and distinct cause of action, upon which the statute of limitations had run, within the purview of the decision in Buerstetta v. Tecumseh Nat. Bank, 57 Neb. 504, 77 N. W. 1094; that the verdict is contrary to the evidence; that plaintiff's counsel were guilty of prejudicial misconduct; and that the trial court erred in instructing the jury to "do substantial justice" by their verdict.

We are satisfied that the case of Buerstetta v. Tecumseh Nat. Bank, 57 Neb. 504, 77 N. W. 1094, has no application. In pleading performance of conditions precedent under § 128, Code Civ. Proc., a plaintiff may safely assume that conditions which have been waived will not be relied upon, and allegations of waiver to meet a defense based on such conditions are not inconsistent with the statutory allegation that all conditions on his part have been duly performed. Levy v. Peabody Ins. Co. 10 W. Va. 560, 27 Am. Rep. 598. Hence it was entirely proper to set up the waiver in reply, and there would have been no departure from the cause of action set up in the petition had this course been taken. Jacobs v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 86 Iowa, 145, 53 N. W. 101; Standard Acci. Ins. Co. v. Friedenthal, 1 Colo. App. 5, 27 Pac. 88; American Cent. Ins. Co. v. McLanathan, 11 Kan. 533; Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Saunders, 86 Va. 969, 11 S. E. 794. It could make no substantial difference if the plaintiff preferred to anticipate the defense and set up waiver in the petition. He did not change his cause of action by substituting allegations of waiver for the general denial.

The question as to admissibility of the evidence objected to has been before the court in various phases in a number of cases, and if we may rely on past adjudications, has been completely determined. Slobodisky v. Phenix Ins. Co. 53 Neb. 816, 74 N. W. 270; Pythian Life Asso. v. Preston, 47 Neb. 374, 66 N. W. 445; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Landfare, 63 Neb. 559, 88 N. W. 779; Hunt v. State Ins. Co. (Neb.) 92 N. W. 921, and cases cited. But in a number of cases which have come before us recently, as well as in the case at bar, the prior decisions of this court on the subject of insurance have been assailed vigorously, and it has been asserted that the court has taken positions at variance both with principle and authority. The recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Northern Assur. Co. v. Grand View Bldg. Asso. 183 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 213, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 133, is chiefly relied upon in this connection, and that case has been urged upon our attention so persistently of late that it seems proper to state the reasons moving us to adhere to the course of decision long established in this jurisdiction, notwithstanding the great authority of the tribunal which has adopted a different doctrine.

The general rule that an insurance company cannot take advantage of conditions in a policy whereby such policy is to be void by reason of circumstances existing at the time the policy issued, in case the facts were known to its agent at the time, has been recognized universally. More recently insurance companies have sought to avoid the consequence of this well-established rule by provisions to the effect that the conditions of the policy could be waived only by written indorsement, and by clauses in which agents are forbidden to waive any of the conditions of the policy in any other manner. Notwithstanding provisions of this type, an overwhelming majority of the state courts have continued to apply the rule that an insurance company cannot set up that a policy issued by its agent with knowledge of the facts was void, when it was issued, by reason of facts which he well knew. Including our own court, the courts of some twenty-seven states, at least, have, upon one ground or another, adhered to this doctrine in the face of these provisions as to waiver. *Wood v. In some jurisdictions it is held that the conditions restricting the power of the agent to waive provisions of the policy have no reference to conditions in the policy avoiding the contract in its inception. Wood v. American F. Ins. Co. 149 N. Y. 382, 44 N. E. 80; Continental Ins. Co. v. Ruckman, 127 Ill. 364, 20 N. E. 77; Rickey v. German Guarantee Town M. F. Ins. Co. 79 Mo. App. 485; Crouse v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 79 Mich. 249, 44 N. W. 496. Courts taking this view hold that the provision as to waiver only limits the power of the agent to waive conditions of the policy after it attaches, and not the power of the agent to make a contract in the first instance. Other courts hold that a provision against waiver otherwise than in writing may itself be waived, and that this waiver may be oral. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Hart, 149 Ill. 513, 36 N. E. 990; German Ins. Co. v. Gray, 43 Kan. 497, 8 L. R. A. 70, 23 Pac. 637; Orient Ins. Co. v. McKnight, 197 Ill. 190, 64 N. E. 339; German-American Ins. Co. v. Humphrey, 62 Ark. 348, 35 S. W. 428; Western Assur. Co. v. Williams, 94 Ga. 128, 21 S. E. 370; Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. v. Faires, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 111, 35 S. W. 55; Kahn v. Traders' Ins. Co. 4 Wyo. 419, 34 Pac. 1059. This court took the same position in Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Landfare, 63 Neb. 559, 88 N. W. 799. Other courts hold that such a provision is invalid on the ground that it is, in effect, a limitation of the power of the corporation itself to waive provisions in its own contracts, since the corporation can act only through agents. Lamberton v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 39 Minn. 129, 1 L. R. A. 222, 39 N. W. 76. In other jurisdictions the position is taken that issuance and delivery of the policy without objection, and with knowledge on the part of the agent of facts which would render the policy invalid, is of itself a waiver by the company of the condition against parol waiver, since the company cannot take the benefit of a contract made by its agent, and at the same time escape the burden thereof. Home Ins. Co. v. Stone River Nat. Bank, 88 Tenn. 369, 12 S. W. 915; McGonigle v. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. 168 Pa. 1, 31 Atl. 868; American F. Ins. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 73 Miss. 469, 18 So. 931; Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Ende, 65 Tex. 118; Davis v. Phenix Ins. Co. 111 Cal. 409, 43 Pac. 1115.

Finally, it has been suggested that failure to strike out the clause violated by facts of which the agent had knowledge, or to indorse the written consent, should be treated as a waiver. Devine v. Home Ins. Co. 32 Wis. 471. From the very nature of the contract of insurance, it is doubtless essential that there be the utmost good faith on the part of the insured; and insurers are compelled to take great precautions to avoid imposition, and to obtain the proper data with reference to which they may determine the character of the risk which they assume. 60 L. R. A.

For these reasons it is proper that the court should not merely enforce provisions in policies designed to protect the insurer in such respects, but the courts would be justified in dealing with provisions of that character somewhat liberally if so drawn as to operate no further. But insurers have to deal, not only with fraud and imposition on the part of those who insure, but with carelessness, and even dishonesty, on the part of those whom they procure to act as their agents. Excessive zeal to procure business leads agents who are paid by commissions to do things in the stress of competition which their employers are not entirely willing to sanction; and the provisions inserted in policies with which courts have had to deal in the past have been designed, manifestly, quite as much to avoid responsibility on the part of the company for acts of its agents as to prevent imposition on the part of those whom the company insured. In Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. 222, 20 L. ed. 617, Mr. Justice Miller made some characteristically sensible remarks upon this subject, which have been quoted frequently. As he says, the reports of judicial decisions are filled with the efforts of companies to establish the doctrine that they can stimulate agents to great activity in procuring contracts of insurance, and pay them commissions on the premiums obtained, and yet limit their responsibility for the acts of these agents substantially to the simple receipt of the premium and delivery of the policy. In consequence, there has been a contest between the courts on the one hand and counsel for insurance companies on the other, the latter devising skillfully framed clauses and provisions, and the former largely thwarting the purpose of these clauses by construing them strictly against the insurer. It cannot be denied that not a little subtlety has been displayed on both sides of this contest. But it must not be overlooked that the companies are engaged in an endeavor to circumvent well-established principles of the law of agency, arising upon sound policy; and there is much justification for the determination of courts that these settled doctrines of the law shall not be contracted out of existence lightly.

One principle of the law of agency which insurers have steadily sought to avoid is that the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal. The general doctrine is that notice communicated to or knowledge acquired by the officers or agents of a corporation, when acting in their official capacity or within the scope of their agency, is notice to or knowledge of the corporation. It is said that there are but three exceptions—matters which the agent has forgotten entirely or may have forgotten under the circumstances of the case, matters which for special reasons he could not impart to his principal, and matters which the previous conduct of the agent or the fact that he is engaged in some fraud upon the principal make it certain that he will conceal. 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5192. The application of this rule to insurance companies is well settled. Fishbeck v. Phenix Ins. Co. 54 Cal. 422; Miller v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 70 Iowa, 704, 29 N. W. 411; St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wells, 89 Ill. 82; Dick v. Equitable F. & M. Ins. Co. 92 Wis. 46, 65 N. W. 742; Pelkington v. Nat. Ins. Co. 55 Mo. 172; Phœnia Ins. Co. v. Copeland, 90 Ala. 386, 8 So. 48; German Ins. Co. v. York, 48 Kan. 488, 29 Pac. 586; Beebe v. Ohio Farmers' Ins. Co. 93 Mich. 514, 18 L. R. A. 481, 53 N. W. 818; Tarbell v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 63 Vt. 53, 22 Atl. 533; Home Ins. Co. v. Gibson, 72 Miss. 58, 17 So. 13. This court has repeatedly announced the same rule. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Landfare, 63 Neb. 559, 88 N. W. 779; Hunt v. State Ins. Co. (Neb.) 92 N. W. 921, and cases cited. As the corporation can act only through its agents, it might well be a question how far it may contract that it shall not be bound by notice to and knowledge of such agents. It has been suggested that such a provision in a policy would, in effect, be a limitation of the power of the corporation itself. Lamberton v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 39 Minn. 129, 1 L. R. A. 222, 39 N. W. 76. However this may be, it will be observed that no such stipulation is to be found in the policy in the case at bar. The provision of the policy does not say that notice to the company's agents who are given power to accept risks shall not be notice to the company, but says only that conditions of the policy may not be waived otherwise than in a prescribed manner. It goes without saying that provisions for forfeiture are not favored. Woodmen Acci. Asso. v. Pratt, 62 Neb. 673, 55 L. R. A. 291, 87 N. W. 546; Connecticut F. Ins. Co. v. Jeary, 60 Neb. 338, 51 L. R. A. 698, 83 N. W. 78; McMaster v. New York L. Ins. Co. 183 U. S. 25, 46 L. ed. 64, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10. It has been the settled policy of the courts to construe these provisions against the insurer. Hence, so long as the language of the contract does not preclude the operation of the rule that notice to the agent is notice to the company, the court will not give it such effect. It follows that the condition prohibiting the agent from waiving provisions of the policy otherwise than in the prescribed manner does not take away the duty of the company to take advantage of grounds entailing a forfeiture at the option of the company, when it is chargeable with notice thereof.

Although the policy is conditioned to be void in certain cases, it is well settled that this means voidable at the option of the company. The contract is not wholly void, but the insurer may, if it chooses, insist upon forfeiture under certain conditions. Hunt v. State Ins. Co. (Neb.) 92 N. W. 921, and cases cited. This construction of the policy has been assailed as in conflict with the language employed and at variance with the authorities. But it is well sustained by judicial decisions elsewhere. Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Dole, 20 Ind. App. 333, 50 N. E. 772; Kalmutz v. Northern Mut. Ins. Co. 186 Pa. 571, 40 Atl. 816; Schmurr v. State Ins. Co. 30 Or. 29, 46 Pac. 363; Horton v. Home Ins. Co. 122 N. C. 498, 29 S. E. 944; Stevenson v. 60 L. R. A.

Phœnia Ins. Co. 83 Ky. 7; Kingman v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 54 S. C. 599, 32 S. E. 762; Bouton v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 25 Conn. 542. The use of "void" in the sense of "voidable" is so common that we see nothing in the language of the policy to militate against such a construction, and it is in entire accord with the disinclination of courts towards forfeitures, and their desire to reach a just and equitable interpretation. It follows that, if the company does not exercise its option to avoid the policy with knowledge of the circumstances giving it that power, and treats the policy as in force, the forfeiture is waived. This is a waiver by the company, not by the agent, and hence is not within the purview of the condition in question. It is said that such a construction of the provisions of the policy as to waiver deprives them of all force. We do not think this is true. An insured would have no standing in court if his case were that the local agent knew of the circumstances entailing a forfeiture, and waived them, where the company, acting on the knowledge of the agent, insisted on a forfeiture. It is true that, when a forfeiture is waived once, it is waived for all time. But the company has limited the power of the agent to waive the forfeiture, and the attempt at waiver by him would not prevent timely action by the company. German Ins. Co. v. Heiduk, 30 Neb. 288, 46 N. W. 481, applies to such cases. On the other hand, if the company, notwithstanding it is chargeable with notice of the circumstances entailing a forfeiture, treats the policy as in force, and takes no advantage of such circumstances, an entirely different question is presented. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Landfare, 63 Neb. 559, 88 N. W. 779. Hence we think the rule as to the admissibility of parol evidence to vary the terms of a written contract has no application to this subject. There is no attempt to show by parol something which is foreclosed by the written agreement of the parties. The attempt is to show by parol that the company knew of the facts and circumstances which entitled it to enforce the provisions of the policy as to forfeiture or not, at its option, and that the company itself, not any particular agent, continued to treat the policy as in force, and declined to exercise such option. For these reasons we think the former adjudications of this court should be adhered to, and, in consequence, that the testimony objected to in the case at bar was admissible.

We come next to the instructions with reference to the claim of waiver. In some respects the wording of these instructions is a trifle extravagant. But the error, if any, in these respects, cannot be said to be prejudicial, so long as the propositions of law announced are sound, and they are stated so as to leave no room for misunderstanding. We are unable to show how the company may take advantage of the provision as to nonpayment of premium in such cases as this. If the agent reports the policy issued and the premium paid, and the amount of the premium is charged to the agent in his accounts with the company, the latter has no ground of complaint because the agent was willing to advance the premium and give personal credit to the insured. The condition in the policy does not apply to such cases. Griffith v. New York L. Ins. Co. 101 Cal. 627, 36 Pac. 113. But, if the agent reported the policy issued, and the premium unpaid, and the company acquiesced, neglecting to insist upon the condition in the policy, it clearly waived such condition. Slobodisky v. Phenix Ins. Co. 53 Neb. 816, 74 N. W. 270, and cases cited. Delivery of the policy as a subsisting contract of insurance from a certain date, and charging the insured on the basis of insurance from that date, was a waiver of the printed condition in the policy; and if the company, chargeable with what was known to its agent, acquiesced, and treated the policy as in force, it could not afterwards deny liability. Western Assur. Co. v. McAlpin, 23 Ind. App. 220, 55 N. E. 119. By so holding we do not, as has been asserted, deprive the provision in the policy of all meaning. If due, the premium must be paid, or no risk attaches. If, at the time fixed, it is not paid, the agent cannot waive the condition so as to prevent the company from insisting upon a forfeiture. But in such case it must take advantage thereof. It cannot treat the policy as subsisting, and, when a loss occurs, claim the forfeiture notwithstanding. Whether neglect to take any steps with reference to the policy, allowing the insured to rest in the belief that he is protected, would, of itself, amount to a waiver, we need not decide. In this case, at the appointed time, the money was paid to the agent, and in due course he accounted for it to the company. Receiving the premium after destruction of all the insured property, so that nothing remains to which insurance might attach, waives a provision that the insurer shall not be liable for a loss occurring before payment of the premium. Johnston v. Phelps County Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. 63 Neb. 21, 56 L. R. A. 127, 88 N. W. 142. It is true the money was sent back to the agent afterwards. But no one at any time paid or tendered it back to Mr. Shader. Something more than a mere return to the agent with instructions which have never been executed was necessary. The company had the duty of seeing that the money was restored, or at least tendered. It was not Mr. Shader's duty to search for the representative of the company who might happen to have it. Cases where a person has assumed to act as agent without authority, such as Turner v. Brooks, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 451, 21 S. W. 404, are not in point. In this case the agent had a general authority to receive and collect premiums.

The other assignments of error require but brief notice. The evidence as to the amount of property destroyed is in sharp conflict. The chief of the fire department and several firemen gave testimony tending to show that little or nothing could have been lost. On the other hand, there is no little evidence from credible witnesses to the contrary. It is contended on behalf of the 60 L. R. A.

plaintiff that the goods were so light, and so inflammable in character, that almost nothing remained when the firemen arrived, and that such a hypothesis accords with the evidence showing what was in the building shortly before the fire, with the testimony of a bystander as to what he saw when the fire broke out, and with evidence as to fragments found in the debris the next morning. While it must be confessed that the evidence is not entirely satisfactory, we cannot say that the hypothesis suggested is entirely unreasonable, nor that the jury had no right to adopt it. The question was for them, and we have no authority to disturb it in such a case. With respect to the alleged misconduct, the trial court found against the defendant upon conflicting affidavits. We see no reason to disturb its ruling. Sang v. Beers, 20 Neb. 365, 30 N. W. 258; Everton v. Esgate, 24 Neb. 235, 38 N. W. 794. The instruction directing the jury to "do substantial justice" between the parties is not to be commended. But, taken as a whole, we do not consider it prejudicial error. After directing the jury to retire, and choose a foreman, the court told them to determine upon a verdict "solely from the evidence in the case, applying the law as given in these instructions," and thereby "do substantial justice between the parties." Of course, it is for the law to determine what is just, and the jurors are merely to say what are the facts to which the legal standards of justice are to be applied. Juries, as a rule, need no encouragement to take such a line as they think will lead to a just result. But here they were told to do so solely by means of the evidence and the rules of law laid down by the court. They can hardly have supposed they were at liberty to go out of the evidence, or go counter to the law as declared in the instructions, in the supposed interests of substantial justice.

We recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

NOTE.—For a case holding that notice to the purchaser of premises of a nuisance thereon is not necessary to render him liable for injuries caused thereby, see Leaban v. Cochrane (Mass.) 53 L. R. A. 891.

As to liability of abutting owner generally for injuries caused by stepping into coal hole in sidewalk, see Hawver v. Whalen (Ohio) 14 L. R. A. 828; Lorenzo v. Wirth (Mass.) 40 L. R. A. 347; and West Chicago Masonic Assn. v. Cohn (Ill.) 55 L. R. A. 235.

not begin to run against an action on a lot owner's liability over to a city for a judgment for injuries growing out of a defective sidewalk until the city's liability is fixed by law, or by admission and payment on its part.

2. Judgment against the city in an action, of which the lot owner has notice, is conclusive upon the latter as to the fact, cause, and extent of the injury.
3. Such judgment is not conclusive as to the responsibility of the lot owner for such cause.
4. A purchaser of a lot at sheriff's sale, who does not appear to have obtained any possession or control of the premises, except such as arises constructively from the delivery and recording of a sheriff's deed, is not responsible to the city, which has paid a judgment for injuries received by one falling into a negligently constructed coal hole in front of such lot three weeks after the issuance of the sheriff's deed, and while the former owner is still in possession.

(February 4, 1903.)

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount which plaintiff had been compelled to pay for injuries caused by the unsafe condition of a sidewalk in front of defendant's property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Measrs. Edmund C. Strode and D. J. Flaherty, for plaintiff in error:

Recovery in this action could be had at common law.

The judgment in the case against the city is conclusive on certain facts in issue.

No notice of the defect was required, and no such request to remedy it was necessary.

The grantee has no right to assume any of the facts which lie at the foundation of its right to notice. It is notified by law that its grantor could acquire no right to maintain the nuisance from any person, or from any authority, or by any means, and that it, as grantee, could not, under any circumstances, lawfully continue such interference or obstruction of the public right.

The liability of the defendant in this case does not depend simply on the power of the state or the municipality to require the abutting property owner to keep the sidewalk in repair. There would have been no defect in the sidewalk, and no injury suffered, except for (1) the excavation made under the sidewalk, (2) the coal hole cut through the sidewalk, (3) and the defective covering, put there by the defendant's predecessor in title, and continued there and maintained in connection with the property by the defendant.

Hastings, C., filed the following opinion:

In this case the plaintiff filed in the district court of Lancaster county, January 24, 1901, a petition setting out its incorporation, and that of the defendant bank; that the latter, November 1, 1894, and long prior thereto and thereafter, owned lot 13 in block 34 in plaintiff city, and maintained for its own use and benefit a vault under the sidewalk, which was a public sidewalk of the city on one of its principal thoroughfares, with a large opening or coal hole through the sidewalk, constructed by defendant's grantors, and maintained by it for its own benefit; that the lid covering this hole was defective, unfastened, and insecure, and subject to displacement by any person stepping upon the edge of it, and was not of sufficient size and weight to securely cover the hole; that these facts were well known to the defendant; that about November 1, 1894, Mrs. Pirner stepped upon the coal-hole cover, and, by reason of its defective construction, fell through, and sustained serious damages thereby, and because of such injuries instituted an action against the plaintiff, in which she recovered the sum of $4,000 damages and $227.26 costs; that the city prosecuted error to this court, where the judgment was affirmed on February 9, 1900 (81 N. W. 846), and additional costs in the sum of $40.80 court costs, and $20 for printing were incurred; that on September 10, 1900, the city paid the judgment, interest, and costs in full, amounting to $5,256.12, and incurred expenses, including costs of the supreme court, and procuring bill of exceptions prepared in the defense of said action, in the sum of $349.86; that the injuries to Mrs. Pirner were caused by the defendant's unlawfully maintaining its excavation under, and its coal hole through, the sidewalk in an unsafe, dangerous, and defective condition, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $5,605.98. The defendant answered, admitting the corporate character of the parties, and the recovery of judgment by Mrs. Pirner against the plaintiff, and the error proceedings to this court, and denied the other allegations. A general denial was filed to this answer, and on the issues so made trial was had to the court, a jury being waived; and the district court found for the defendant, and dismissed the action. Motion for new trial was overruled. From this judgment the plaintiff brings error.

The plaintiff claims that, under the facts in this case, the defendant is liable over to the city (1) at common law; (2) under the city charter, which at the time of the accident provided as follows: "It is hereby made the duty of all real estate owners and occupants to keep the sidewalk alongside or in front of the same in good repair, and free from snow and ice and other obstructions, and they shall be liable for all damages for injury occasioned by reason of the defective condition of such sidewalk;" and (3) under the ordinance of the city providing for excavations beneath sidewalks, as follows: "No person shall be allowed to keep or use for vaults, areas, or other purposes, the space beneath the sidewalk included within the sidewalk lines of any street within the city unless a permit therefor shall have been obtained from the city council; such permit to continue and be issued only upon such condition that the party receiving the same shall, as compensation for the privilege granted by such permit, maintain and keep in repair a sidewalk over such space intended to be used for vaults, areas, or other purposes and pay all damages that may be sustained by any person by reason of said sidewalk being in a defective or dangerous condition." The bank asserts that there is no common-law liability on its part, for lack of any knowledge or notice on its part of the defective condition of this coal hole; that no liability attaches to it as a mere owner, for a mere passive neglect; that defendant's possession of the property was only constructive, by reason of a sheriff's deed bearing date about three weeks before Mrs. Pirner's accident, and no actual knowledge on the part of the bank, or demand upon it for repairs, appears in the evidence; that there was no statutory liability, because in the year 1899, a year and more before the institution of this action, the statute above quoted was repealed; that any attempt to create such a liability by ordinance was unconstitutional and void; and that the right of action is barred by the statute of limitations, because the injury was sustained by Mrs. Pirner in 1894,—more than six years before the commencement of the action.

The bank appears clearly to have had notice of the pendency of Mrs. Pirner's action against the city, and to have refused to take any part in it. Under the admissions of the answer, therefore, the bank is concluded as to the existence of the trouble of which she complained, a defective lid on this coal hole, as to her injury from that cause, and as to the amount of damages sustained by her. The bank, of course, is not concluded by that adjudication as to the question of its own responsibility for the condition of the coal hole. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1035.

The sole questions in this case, then, are as to the responsibility of defendant merely because it was the owner of this coal hole, and as to the statute of limitations. If either is found in favor of the defendant, the judgment must be affirmed. So far as the latter question is concerned, no authority whatever is cited by the defendant, and only some cases on sureties' rights to contribution and officers' claims for indemnity by plaintiff. It seems clear, however, that, if there exists any right on the part of the city to recover over against the bank because of the injury to Mrs. Pirner, it could only be when the city's liability toward Mrs. Pirner became fixed. The wrong, so far as the city is concerned, only became actionable when damage to the city accrued, and that was only when a final judgment in Mrs. Pirner's favor was rendered. Any attempt to recover of the bank on plaintiff's part before that time would have been futile, and the statute would not commence to run, as against a right of action, until such right of action was in existence. Evidently the city could not assert its liability to Mrs. Pirner if a case against the bank so long as it was denying such liability in Mrs. Pirner's own action in the same court, or in this one on review. It will not be necessary to discuss further the question of the statute of limitations. The city's claim here is for indemnity against liability on Mrs. Pirner's judgment, not for the injury to Mrs. Pirner.

It remains to see whether there is any right to charge defendant with responsibility for the condition of the coal-hole lid, either at common law, by statute, or by ordinance of the city. The common-law liability of the defendant is the claim most strongly urged by plaintiff. It rests, as above stated, solely on the ownership of the property on the defendant's part by virtue of a sheriff's deed bearing date about three weeks before Mrs. Pirner's fall. One Carr, as owner, had built the walk and coal hole some years before, and was still in possession. In what capacity he was still holding, does not appear. There is nothing to show possession by defendant, except the sheriff's deed, and its recording on October 11, 1894. In that deed, Carr is named as one of the defendants whose rights were conveyed by it. The injury occurred November 1, 1894. The sole cause alleged is the loose lid of the coal hole, so that it slipped aside and let the woman's foot through and caused a fall, with bruising of the foot and leg, and some injury of the back. The excavation and hole in the walk had been there since 1883, in substantially the same condition. The walk and coal hole had been made under the inspection of the city's street commissioner. Not so much as knowledge of the coal hole's existence on the part of this defendant, whose sheriff's deed is dated twenty-three days, and recorded twenty days, before this accident, appears. It is clear that if the defendant is liable at common law, it must be for maintaining a nuisance in a public street. It may be taken as settled that an unauthorized coal hole in a sidewalk would be a nuisance per se. Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 10 Am. Rep. 603; Robinson v. Mills, 25 Mont. 391, 65 Pac. 114. Both of the above cases hold, with seeming good reason, that an unsafe and improperly secured authorized excavation is as much a nuisance as is an unauthorized one. No authority for maintaining a coal hole is pleaded here, and the finding in Mrs. Pirner's case would be conclusive as to its bad condition if there was. But can defendant, under the evidence here, be claimed to have been conclusively shown to be guilty of maintaining it, so that the trial court's finding otherwise must be reversed? The bank had only a sheriff's deed, and the defendant in the foreclosure action was still in possession. "A party who comes into possession of lands as grantee or lessee, with a nuisance already existing upon them, is not, in general, liable for the continuance of the nuisance until his attention has been called to it, and he has been requested to abate it." Cooley, Torts, 1st ed. p. 611. This rule is put upon the ground, in the first place, that the purchaser has a right to assume as to other persons that a right to maintain it has been acquired. It is also put on the ground that the purchaser ought not to be held liable for consequences of which he was ignorant, and which he did not intend. Johnson v. Lewis, 13 Conn. 307, 33 Am. Dec. 405.

It is conceded by plaintiff that such is the general rule, but it is urged that it has no application to a public nuisance that results in an obstruction to the streets. The rule requiring at least notice to the purchaser of the existence of a nuisance, before his liability commences, is stated in Pollock on Torts, without the indication of any exception, and based on Penruddock's Case, 5 Coke, 100b. In Cooley on Torts, at the place cited, it is said to have no application to cases where a personal duty or obligation is cast upon the owner by law, or where the nuisance is immediately dangerous to life or health. It would seem reasonable to hold that it would not apply where the owner's suffering the nuisance to continue would amount to a failure to perform some duty owed to the public, or apply to the actual infliction of a wrong. The three cases cited and relied upon by plaintiff are of this kind. Leahan v. Cochran, 178 Mass. 566, 53 L. R. A. 891, 60 N. E. 382, is distinctly of this kind. Defendant purchased and thereafter occupied a house whose gutter discharged water on the sidewalk. The water froze, and plaintiff was injured by the ice. The defendant was held liable because of a duty to keep obstructions off the walk, and no prescriptive right to maintain a dangerous situation there was acquirable by use or purchase. Matthews v. Missouri P. R. Co. 26 Mo. App. 75, is another case of an obstruction in a highway, and liability is said to result for the same reason to one who was openly maintaining the obstruction which caused the injury. Defendant is held, not as owner of the premises, but as "the continuer of the nuisance." The case of Morgan v. Illinois & St. L. Bridge Co. 5 Dill. 96, Fed. Cas. No. 9,802, is cited by the Missouri appellate court and by the plaintiff here. The liability in the latter case is held to result because the receiver and the road which he represented had maintained for three years, as lessees of another corporation, a 14-foot cut in a crowded thoroughfare, without railing or protection. It was held that the fact of the premises being in such condition when leased was no protection. A duty to protect passers against their excavation arose when they commenced to use it. These cases are very far from showing a duty on defendant's part to protect passers or the city from injury because of this coal hole. It seems clear that to bring the defendant within the exception to the rule requiring that purchasers have notice of the existence of a nuisance, to render them liable, such possession and control of these premises as to cast upon it the duty of actively providing for the public safety must be shown. Such a duty is found and indicated in Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 10 Am. Rep. 603, where it is held to devolve upon both landlord and tenants to see that an excavation under the street was made safe for passers. The numerous decisions as to the respective liability of lessor and lessee in such cases show that the owner's liability in such cases, where it exists, is not as owner, but as creator or continuer of a nuisance. They may be found collected 60 L. R. A.

and discussed in Plumer v. Harper, 3 N. H. 88, 14 Am. Dec. 333, or more recently and fully in Martin v. Pettit, 117 N. Y. 118, sub nom. Wasson v. Pettit, 5 L. R. A. 794, 22 N. E. 566, and in the extended notes to those cases. Such presumption of use and control as the three-weeks possession of a sheriff's deed might raise is rebutted by the fact that the foreclosure defendant was still in possession. The liability as owner which is sought to be established by means of the statute before quoted cannot attach. As before stated, a right of action accrued in favor of the city only when its liability to Mrs. Pirner became fixed. This was after the repeal of the statute in question, which took place in 1899. The affirmance of Mrs. Pirner's judgment was in 1900. The general saving clause in chapter 88, § 2, Comp. Stat. relates only to causes of action accrued before such repeal. The liability under the city ordinance is against the person who is "allowed to keep or use" a vault or excavation beneath the street. As the evidence in this case entirely fails to show that defendant kept or used this excavation or coal hole, there can be no liability under this ordinance. Indeed, the fact that the excavation and coal hole were outside of the defendant's lot, and entirely on the city's land, and could not be maintained except with the consent of the city, is of itself a sufficient answer to any claim against defendant merely as owner of lot 13. Doubtless possession, control, and use of these premises would make defendant responsible for the safety of any excavation under the city's streets, at least to the extent of taking all reasonable precaution to make it so. Martin v. Pettit, 117 N. Y. 118, sub nom. Wasson v. Pettit, 5 L. R. A. 794, 22 N. E. 566. No such control appears here.

It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

v.

- * 1. Subsequent stockholders have no standing, as a general rule, to attack prior mismanagement of the corporation.
- 2. Such a stockholder ought not to be allowed to sue, unless the mismanagement or its effects continue and are injurious to him, or it affects him specially and peculiarly in some other manner.

3. Stockholders who have acquired their shares and their interest in the corporation from the alleged wrongdoers, and through the prior mismanagement, have no standing to complain thereof.
4. Stockholders, as such, have no title to the corporate property which they may convey or encumber in their own name; but this is only another way of saying that the corporation must act through its proper agents and in the prescribed way.
5. Where a corporation is proceeding at law, or where it is asserting a title to property, or the title to property is involved, the corporation is regarded as a person separate and distinct from its stockholders, or any or all of them.
6. But where it is proceeding in equity to assert rights of an equitable nature, or is seeking relief upon rules or principles of equity, the court of equity will not forget that the stockholders are the real and substantial beneficiaries of a recovery; and if the stockholders have no standing in equity, and are not equitably entitled to the remedy sought to be enforced by the corporation in their behalf and for their advantage, the corporation will not be permitted to recover.
7. The proposition announced in the fourth paragraph of the syllabus in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald & Mallory Construction Co. 59 N. W. 838, 41 Neb. 374, was in effect, if not expressly, retracted on rehearing in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald & Mallory Construction Co. 62 N. W. 899, 44 Neb. 473, and is disapproved.
8. A plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own case, not on the weakness of the defendant's case. It is his right, not the defendant's wrongdoing, that is the basis of recovery.
9. Where service under a contract of employment for a fixed period continues after such period has expired, it is presumed to be under the same contract; but this presumption must yield to evidence showing a change of terms.
10. The general manager of a corporation, after expiration of a contract fixing his salary at $5,000 per annum, continued in the same employment, without any new agreement, and afterwards voluntarily reduced his salary to $3,000 per annum, drawing it from month to month thereafter on that basis for many years, until he gave up the office. After the original contract, no action was taken by the directors with reference to his salary; but the evidence that he took the less sum from time to time in full payment was clear and convincing. Held, that a judgment for back salary at the rate of $2,000 per annum could not be sustained.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for mismanagement by defendant of the plaintiff corporation, and to recover salary which he had taken in excess of the amount to which he was entitled under contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Byron G. Burbank and Hallock F. Rose, for appellant:

The proof sufficiently shows the existence of an unlawful scheme of defendants for the use of the company's funds in carrying on a private enterprise and speculation, that the preconceived plan was executed in all its details, and that a large profit was realized by the unlawful investment of the company's funds.

The presumption of equity is against the validity of transactions between principal and agent, and the burden of proof to establish their validity is upon the agent. The burden is on Barber to show affirmatively payment of collateral loans.

The fiduciary character of the defendants as managing officers of the corporation precluded their use of the corporate funds for private speculation.

Defendants, by construction of equity, will be adjudged trustees of the profits realized from these unlawful transactions, without regard to the fact of whether, at the precise time of acquiring the shares, they obtained the purchase money from other sources.

Pound, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff is an insurance company, organized in 1884, with a capital stock of $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of $100 each. Its business is conducted by a board of directors, a finance committee, an executive committee, and certain other officers, including a secretary and general manager. It appears that the secretary and general manager, at least down to December, 1899, was at all times interested with the active management and control of the company's affairs, and the president and the remaining officers appear to have given very little, if any, attention thereto. The appellant and principal defendant, Charles J. Barber, was one of the original incorporators of the company, and was a stockholder therein from its organization until December 2, 1899. During that period he was secretary and general manager, one of the directors, and a member of the executive committee. His codefendants, Lovett, Woodman, and Reynolds, were also original incorporators and stockholders, and from time to time from its organization until December 2, 1899, were directors and members of the executive and finance committees. On December, 1899, the defendant Barber entered into a contract with one Funkhouser, whereby he agreed to sell to said Funkhouser all of the shares of the capital stock of said company, except 2 shares, which he was to obtain, if possible, and to procure the resignation of all the officers and a majority of the directors. He also agreed not to engage in the insurance business, directly or indirectly, for a period of three years. By the terms of the contract he was to furnish to Funkhouser a true and complete statement of all the assets and liabilities of the company, and if, upon investigation, the statement of assets and liabilities proved to be correct and satisfactory to Funkhouser, the latter was to pay the sum of $75,000 for said shares, less $200 for the 2 shares above mentioned, in case they could not be obtained, and a further sum of $40,000 as a bonus for obtaining all of the shares of stock and for procuring the resignation of the officers, relinquishing his control of the company, and agreeing not to engage further in the business of insurance. On December 2, 1899, pursuant to said contract, the defendant Barber delivered to said Funkhouser all of the shares of the capital stock of said company, except 8. He also delivered an option contract for 6 of the remaining shares, and subsequently procured and delivered the other 2. In payment therefor he received the sum of $94,380.60 in cash and $20,619.40 in assets of the company,—namely, $12,350 of collateral loans, which he had agreed to accept at the time when the contract of sale was made, and certain other assets, amounting to $8,269.40, which Funkhouser had refused to accept at the time when the list of assets was under consideration. Accordingly the shares of stock 60 L. R. A.

were transferred on the books of the company, under the direction of Funkhouser, to himself and certain others, his associates in the transaction, and he and his said associates became thereupon, and now are, the only stockholders in the company. None of them had held stock therein theretofore. At the same time, pursuant to the contract, the defendant Barber resigned his office and procured the resignation of the defendants Reynolds, Woodman, and Lovett, and of the other principal officers and directors of the company, and a new board of directors was elected, and new officers took charge. On November 20, 1899, evidently in contemplation of a transfer of all his interest in the corporation, the defendant Barber drew out $2,200 of the company's moneys upon a claim of unpaid salary. Subsequent to the change in management of the company, this was discovered, and a controversy arose between Barber and the new management with reference thereto, as a result of which suit was brought by the company to recover said sum. Thereupon Barber made a counterclaim for some $10,000 of salary alleged to be due him and not withdrawn, and as a result of examination and investigation of the company's books with reference to this claim certain irregularities and mismanagement came to light, which were set forth in an amended petition and furnished the principal points of controversy in the case as finally tried.

Thus there are two branches to the case: Upon the one hand, a suit by the corporation to recover the money taken out by Barber as back salary just prior to the time he sold his stock, and certain other moneys which at various times he is alleged to have appropriated wrongfully to his own use; and, on the other hand, a suit to recover for Barber's mismanagement and for profits made by him through the use of the company's money at a time when he stood in a fiduciary relation thereto. The principal mismanagement consisted in borrowing funds of the company to purchase its stock, and in making a profit out of the purchase of the stock and the dividends accruing thereon. At the time the stock was bought with money borrowed from the company, it was worth about $55 per share. But seven years later, when the defendant Barber sold out his interest in the company, it had come to be worth $115 per share. During the time dividends had accrued in considerable amounts, and had been paid to and received by Barber. The decree compels Barber to account for the profits and for the dividends, on the ground that the loan of the company's funds and the use of those funds in purchase of the stock was unauthorized, and that the profits and the dividends belonged in equity to the company. Upon the issue as to salary, the court found that Barber was entitled to recover for back salary, as claimed, and applied to the amount found to be due him thereon upon the amounts found due the company by reason of his mismanagement.

The facts with reference to the mismanagement, as found by the court, are substantially these: In January, 1892, and for some time prior to that date, the stockholders of the company were divided into two factions. The one consisted of the defendants, Barber, Lovett, Reynolds, and Woodman, who held 237 shares, and some other stockholders, not sufficient, however, to constitute a majority. The other faction was controlled by one Hamilton, and held in the aggregate 507 shares. As the controversy became acute, the Hamilton faction required the Barber faction to purchase their 507 shares of stock, or else to submit to the election of a board of directors who would choose a new secretary and general manager and entirely alter the policy and management of the company. It appears that Barber and his associates were experienced insurance men, while Hamilton and his faction were not, and the court has found that Barber, Lovett, Woodman, and Reynolds believed it to be for the best interests of the company, as well as for their own interest, that the company should be managed by persons of experience in the business. Accordingly they agreed among themselves to purchase the 507 shares, and thus preserve control of the company. For that purpose they agreed also to procure money temporarily by borrowing of banks on their own notes, paying said notes with money which they could borrow from the company as soon as they could obtain control thereof, unless in the meantime they were able to sell enough of the shares purchased to pay off their notes, or to pay them off by the sale of other property. In pursuance of this design, they borrowed the necessary funds of banks, purchased the shares, and distributed them among themselves; the majority going to the defendant Barber. A period of financial depression was imminent, and after the purchase it became impossible to dispose of the shares, as the defendants had hoped, so that it was necessary to borrow of the company in order to pay off their notes at the banks. Accordingly the defendants resorted to the company's funds, borrowing a portion upon real estate security, and another portion upon notes secured by pledge of the stock.

As to the money borrowed upon real estate security, the court has found that the loans were made in good faith, with bona fide intention of repaying them in full, principal and interest; that the security was fair and reasonable; that the loans were made according to the usual mode of business of the company, were entered upon the books in the regular way, were known to the officers, directors, and stockholders of the company, were in large part included in the annual reports of the company, and have all been paid in full, either by cash or conveyances of property to the company, except the interest on a mortgage loan to the defendant Barber. The loans on collateral security, on the contrary, were not carried on the books of the company openly in the name of the parties who obtained them. They were not such loans as the statute authorized the company to make, and the court has found that they were not properly secured. The court has also found that it was agreed between the defendants Barber, Lovett, and Reynolds, when these collateral loans were originally obtained from the company, that they would pay no interest thereon, and that after a short time they ceased to pay any. These loans were kept standing on the books, in one form or another, until the sale of the stock to Funkhouser in December, 1899, when the collateral loan account, which consisted of these items, was turned over to Barber, as above stated. The court found on this point that the apportionment of the consideration which Funkhouser was to pay, and did pay, to Barber for all the shares of stock in the company, as provided for in the contract, whereby \$75,000 was stated to be the consideration for the shares of stock, and the remaining \$40,000 a bonus, was made after the sale was practically consummated, to enable Barber to buy in the shares of the company held by other stockholders for the purpose of selling and delivering them, and that the real value of the stock and the true consideration received therefor was not \$75,000, but the full sum of \$115,000. Upon this basis the court found that the portion of said 507 shares of stock which was covered by the collateral loans, namely, 203 $\frac{1}{2}$ shares, was at all times after the sale by Hamilton in equity the property of the company, and that the company was entitled to recover the full consideration which Funkhouser paid Barber therefor, namely, \$115 per share.

Another item of mismanagement grew out of a mortgage loan to the defendant Woodman. In 1886 Woodman and his wife borrowed \$1,400 of the plaintiff upon a mortgage. In January, 1898, there was \$1,600 due upon the loan, and on that date Woodman assigned to Barber his half interest in 75 shares of the stock purchased from Hamilton and his associates, which had been apportioned to Lovett and Woodman as partners. Thereupon the company released the mortgage, and Barber charged the \$1,600 on the books of the company as cash. This item was carried on the books in various ways until December 1, 1899, when Barber paid it. The court considered that this amounted to a use of \$1,600 of the company's funds in the purchase of the stock, and that the profits on 37 $\frac{1}{2}$ shares, amounting to \$2,612.50, should be accounted for to the company.

A similar item grows out of the purchase by Barber from the plaintiff of 20 shares of stock, originally held by the wife of the defendant Reynolds. This stock was sold to the company on August 1, 1899, and applied on a mortgage of $2,700, given by her and her husband to the company. The court found that Barber purchased the stock of the company, giving his note for a portion, and carrying the remainder upon the books of the company by various devices until December 1, 1899, when the whole was paid. It held, therefore, that he was liable to the company for the profit on these shares.

A further item of mismanagement grows out of a mortgage for $2,600 executed by one Raff. In January, 1894, an instalment of principal and a large amount of accrued interest and taxes had fallen due. At that time the mortgage was assigned by its then holder to the defendant Barber for about the sum of $1,300. The court has found that Barber knew at the time that foreclosure would be necessary, and immediately instituted a suit in his own name for that purpose. Pending a stay, on order of sale pursuant to decree in the foreclosure suit, Barber assigned the mortgage to the plaintiff company as collateral security for a note which he owed it, and afterwards drew out $2,500 of the company's money in payment therefor. Subsequently the foreclosure sale was confirmed, and a large deficiency judgment entered. This judgment was never assigned to the company; but after receiving a master's deed in the foreclosure proceedings, he conveyed the property by warranty deed to the plaintiff. The court found that the company paid taxes amounting to nearly $1,200, and, taking this into account, held that the total amount of the company's money used in the transaction was over $5,100. It found, further, that this was an improvident, and unlawful investment, in case the mortgage was bought originally for the company, as Barber alleged, and that, if it was not so bought originally, the sale to the company pending stay in the foreclosure suit was a violation of his trust, so that in either event he did not act for the best interests of the company, and upon reconveyance should account to it for said sum of $5,100.

The other items are of a different nature. In 1895 Barber, while secretary and manager of the company, drew two checks, for $1,500 each,—one to the defendant Reynolds, and the other to the defendant Lovett. These checks were indorsed and deposited by Barber in his personal account. Thereupon he drew his check in favor of the company for the aggregate sum, deposited it to the credit of the company, and credited said sum of $3,000 on collateral notes signed by himself and said defendants, as a payment thereon. These checks were issued in payment of alleged claims for services rendered by Lovett and Reynolds in preventing legislation hostile to the company and other similar matters, and the court has found that such claims were not bona fide, and were barred by the statute of limitations, and that the transaction was in effect a conversion of $3,000 of the company's money. It has also found that at various times the defendant collected sums amounting to $237.37, belonging to the company, for which he failed to account. We think that the item of interest on the mortgage loan above mentioned is to be put in the same category.

And here belongs, also, the claim for $2,200 of the company's funds withdrawn by Barber on November 20, 1899, on account of back salary. Upon the issues as to salary, the court found that in 1890 a contract was entered into between Barber and the company, whereby he was to receive a certain salary for the remainder of that year and for the year 1891, and from January 1, 1892, to January 16, 1895, a salary at the rate of $5,000 per annum. The term of employment under the contract was for five years. Barber served, however, continuously from the inception of the contract until December 2, 1899, and after the expiration of the term provided no action of any kind was ever taken by the company, by its board of directors, or by any committee or officer, other than Barber, with reference to the amount of salary. But in 1895, on account of general financial depression, it became necessary to reduce the salaries of all employees, and at that time Barber voluntarily reduced his own salary to $3,000 per annum. The court finds that from that date he drew his salary from month to month substantially on the basis of such reduction until he terminated his connection with the company. The evidence tends to show that during the period from 1895 to 1899, he made repeated admissions that his salary was paid, that he made statements of the condition of the company from which it is evident he considered his salary was $3,000 per year, and that the statement of the assets and liabilities which he made to Funkhouser, pursuant to his contract, was made upon the same basis. The court found, however, that he was not estopped by his voluntary action, but was entitled to receive salary at the rate of $5,000 per annum during the whole period from 1895, and that there was due him on account of undrawn salary the sum of $9,485.22.

Thus, as already indicated, this suit involves two distinct questions. The liability of the defendant Barber to account to the company, as at present constituted, for his mismanagement and unauthorized dealings with the company's funds prior to the sale of all the stock to Funkhouser and his associates is one question. His liability to the company for moneys and assets of the company withdrawn and converted to his own use is quite another question. Connected with this last question is his claim for unpaid salary.

We shall first address ourselves to the question of Barber's liability for mismanagement. Complaint is made of the findings of fact of the trial judge upon the several items with respect to which mismanagement is charged. The evidence on these points is very voluminous, and in some respects is conflicting. Much of it takes the form of expert testimony with reference to the company's books, and is made up of conclusions deduced by accountants from their examinations of the books and papers of the company, which are difficult to follow, and at times are somewhat conjectural. But upon review of the evidence we are satisfied that the findings of fact are accurate and complete, and are well sustained by competent and credible evidence. We have no disposition to interfere with any of them. Accepting these findings of fact, however, several important questions of law arise, with reference to which the decree rendered must be tested.

Counsel for appellant makes three points. The first is that the several transactions recited amounted to loans of the company's money to Barber, and that, as the money borrowed has been repaid, he and not the company is entitled to the profits. We cannot assent to this proposition. The use of the company's money amounted, as the court has found, to a speculation by one of the officers in violation of his trust, which resulted in a profit. Were this an ordinary case, we think there can be no question that the corporation would be entitled to sue, or a stockholder on its behalf and for the benefit of all others. But it is urged that this is not an ordinary case. None of the present stockholders were owners of stock in the corporation at any time previous to December 2, 1899. All of them acquired their interest in the corporation by and through the sale from Barber to Funkhouser on that date. Accordingly, the second point made by counsel is that as the defendant Barber came to own all of the stock, and the present stockholders acquired their stock through him, there was a merger in said defendant of all the claims which the corporation or its stockholders might have held against him, and such claims became extinguished thereby. We do not think this point is well taken. The trial court has found, upon conflicting evidence, that the defendant was never the owner of all the stock in the corporation, but was only the agent of some of those whose stock he procured and sold to the present stockholders. There is ample evidence to show that this is true, and that as to several shares of stock he had at no time any beneficial interest. The third and most serious point is that a recovery in the present case would be entirely for the advantage and inure to the benefit of the present stockholders. It would amount, in substance, to a recovery back by them of the purchase money which they paid the defendant Barber for his stock, since the money, when recovered for the corporation, would be for distribution among them,—the sole stockholders of the company as now constituted.

This raises numerous and difficult questions. It must be determined whether the present stockholders, or any of them, are entitled to complain of the acts of the defendant and of his past management of the company; for, if any of them are so entitled, there can be no doubt of the right and duty of the corporation to maintain this suit. It would be maintainable in such a case, even though the wrongdoers continued to be stockholders and would share in the proceeds. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 294. We have, therefore, to consider first how far, if at all, subsequent shareholders may complain of prior mismanagement of the corporation. Next we must consider how far subsequent shareholders may complain of mismanagement, when they hold through 60 L. R. A.

such mismanagement or have acquired their shares from persons who participated therein. The third question to be considered is whether the result of a recovery in this case would be inequitable, as permitting the present stockholders to recover back purchase money, or a portion thereof, for which they received full consideration, and to acquire shares worth $115 each at $55 per share, and, in addition thereto, recover and divide among themselves a further sum of $60 per share, imposed upon the defendant Barber for his delinquencies in matters which have in no way injured the present stockholders, or any of them, or their interests. Finally, assuming that, by reason of the foregoing propositions, the present stockholders are in no position to complain and have no standing in equity, may the court look beyond the corporation to the ultimate and substantial beneficiaries of a recovery, or is it bound to deal with the corporation as a separate person in all respects?

Sound reason and good authority sustain the rule that a purchaser of stock cannot complain of the prior acts and management of the corporation. Haues v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450, sub nom. Haues v. Contra Costa Water Co. 26 L. ed. 827; Dimpfell v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 110 U. S. 209, 28 L. ed. 121, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573; Taylor v. Holmes, 127 U. S. 489, 32 L. ed. 179, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1192; Southwest Natural Gas Co. v. Fayette Fuel Gas Co. 145 Pa. 13, 23 Atl. 224; Alexander v. Searcy, 81 Ga. 536, 8 S. E. 630; Clark v. American Coal Co. 86 Iowa, 436, 17 L. R. A. 557, 53 N. W. 291; United Electric Securities Co. v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. 68 Fed. 673; Venner v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 Fed. 581; Heath v. Erie R. Co. 8 Blatchf. 347, Fed. Cas. No. 6,306; Dannmeyer v. Coleman, 8 Sawy. 51, 11 Fed. 97; Pennsylvania Tack Works v. Sowers, 2 Walk. (Pa.) 416; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4569. In Alexander v. Searcy, 81 Ga. 550, 8 S. E. 636, the court says: "The weight of authority seems to be that a person who did not own stock at the time of the transactions complained of cannot complain or bring a suit to have them declared illegal." In United Electric Securities Co. v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. it is said: "As a general proposition, the purchaser of stock in a corporation is not allowed to attack the acts and management of the company prior to the acquisition of his stock; otherwise, we might have a case where stock duly represented in a corporation consented to and participated in bad management and waste, and, after reaping the benefits from such transactions, could be easily passed into the hands of a subsequent purchaser, who could make his harvest by appearing and contesting the very acts and conduct which his vendor had consented to." These remarks are not without application to the case at bar. The present shareholders are all subsequent purchasers. They obtained their stock through the defendant Barber. They hold a large number of their shares under a purchase from him and his associates through the very mismanagement now complained of. A majority of the remaining shares come directly from Barber and his associates in the wrongs upon which this suit is based. In other words, the present stockholders are contesting acts through which they get title to a large portion of their stock, and acts which those through whom they derived the greater part of the remainder could not have challenged because they participated therein, and, by contesting these acts, which did not injure any of the present stockholders in the least, are recovering back a large part of the purchase price of stock which was admittedly worth all that they paid for it. Such cases illustrate forcibly the wisdom of confining complaints of this kind to those who were stockholders at the time or their successors by operation of law.

The rule that a suit for mismanagement cannot be maintained by one who was not a stockholder at the time has been criticized as based on jurisdictional considerations peculiar to the Federal courts and on obsolete common-law doctrines as to champerty and maintenance. 4 Thomp. Corp. §§ 4560-4571; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 270. In our judgment it does not depend upon either. The Federal equity rule, while designed in part to prevent collusive proceedings in fraud of the jurisdiction of those courts, goes far beyond the requirements of such a purpose. If that were the sole purpose of the rule, it should go no further than to prevent such suits where the vendor of the stock was a citizen of the same state as the corporation. If the vendor and purchaser were citizens of the same state, and the vendor, an original stockholder, had never had the same citizenship as the corporation, no fraud on the jurisdiction of the court would be possible, and in such case, if recovery were proper and the purchaser's cause were meritorious, it would be highly unjust for the court to abrogate its jurisdiction. This consideration alone disposes of the criticism. The rule has its foundation in a sound and wholesome principle of equity, namely, that the rules worked out by chancellors in furtherance of right and justice shall not be used, because of their technical character, as rules to reach inequitable or unjust results. Resting on this basis, "the value and importance of the rule . . . are constantly manifested." Field, J., in Dimpfell v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 110 U. S. 209, 28 L. ed. 121, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573. The right of the stockholder to sue exists because of special injury to him for which otherwise he is without redress. If his interest is trifling and the injury thereto of no consequence, he cannot sue to compel righting of wrongs to the corporation. McHenry v. New York, P. & O. R. Co. 22 Fed. 130; Albers v. Merchants' Exchange, 45 Mo. App. 206. Hence there is obvious reason for holding that one who held no stock at the time of the mismanagement ought not to be allowed to sue, unless the mismanagement or its effects continue and are injurious to him, or it affects him specially and peculiarly in some other manner. Chicago v. Cameron, 22 Ill. App. 91, on Appeal 120 Ill. 447, 60 L. R. A.

11 N. E. 899, is a case of the first type. Carson v. Iowa City Gaslight Co. 80 Iowa, 638, 45 N. W. 1068, is of the second type. Except in such cases, the purchaser ought to take things as he found them when he voluntarily acquired an interest. If he was defrauded in the purchase, he should sue the vendor. As to the corporation and its managers, so long as he is not injured in what he got when he purchased, and holds exactly what he got and in the condition in which he got it, there is no ground of complaint. Clark v. American Coal Co. 86 Iowa, 436, 17 L. R. A. 557, 53 N. W. 291.

The cases which hold that a subsequent stockholder may sue for mismanagement may be noticed briefly. Those commonly cited are: Ramsey v. Gould, 57 Barb. 398; Young v. Drake, 8 Hun, 61; Parsons v. Joseph, 92 Ala. 403, 8 So. 788; Winsor v. Bailey, 55 N. H. 218; Forrester v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. 21 Mont. 544, 55 Pac. 229, 353. In Ramsey v. Gould plaintiff, believing that there had been mismanagement, bought shares for the purpose of proceeding against the directors and officers and "bringing them to justice." The court permitted the suit upon the ground that plaintiff's motives were immaterial. But it assumed, without discussion, that he had an interest to vindicate, and had suffered some wrong, which is the real question on which such cases depend. Moreover, it is by no means clear that the motives behind a stockholder's suit are immaterial. Where stock is acquired for the purpose of bringing suit, it has been held that the complainant is a mere interloper, entitled to no consideration. Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 461, sub nom. Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co. 26 L. ed. 827; Moore v. Silver Valley Min. Co. 104 N. C. 534, 10 S. E. 679; Kingman v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 30 Hun, 73; Du Pont v. Northern P. R. Co. 18 Fed. 467, 471. And stockholders' suits not brought in good faith in the interests of the corporation have been dismissed on that ground. Beshoar v. Chappel, 6 Colo. App. 323, 40 Pac. 244; Belmont v. Erie R. Co. 52 Barb. 637. In Young v. Drake the court follow Ramsey v. Gould. The further point is made that "the plaintiff acquired all the rights of the person of whom he purchased." Of course, in a case where those of whom he purchased had participated or acquiesced in the mismanagement, this view would preclude the purchaser from suing. And he could not sue as being a bona fide purchaser in ignorance of the disability attaching to his vendor, because shares of stock are not negotiable, and the sale cannot pass greater rights than those possessed by the vendor. Clark v. American Coal Co. 86 Iowa, 436, 17 L. R. A. 557, 53 N. W. 291; 4 Thomp. Corp. p. 3410. But it may be doubtful whether a purchaser of stock buys, or intends to buy, anything beyond the vendor's present interest in the corporation and its assets. His vendor's causes of action for past injuries and rights to complain of past mismanagement are scarcely in contemplation of the parties. We must not suffer ourselves to be deceived by speaking of causes of action of the corporation in this connection, since causes of action of this character belong to the corporation for the benefit and in the interest of its stockholders. Parsons v. Joseph and Winsor v. Bailey adopt the view of Mr. Morawetz that the rule announced by the Federal courts is a rule of practice based on jurisdictional peculiarities of those courts, and not of general application. In Forrester v. Mining Co. the transaction was not complete and still required ratification by the stockholders. The complainants, although they bought after the acts were done, were stockholders while the matter was still formative, and had an undoubted right to interfere to prevent its consummation. Hence what is said as to the point in question is dictum only.

The fallacy in the view that one who has not been injured by a transaction and is not affected thereby can acquire a right to sue in equity to set it aside, because he has acquired the shares of the person injured, is exposed in such cases as Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 102 U. S. 148, 26 L. ed. 106, and Hoffman v. Bullock, 34 Fed. 248. The right to complain of such transactions is one which the stockholders injured may or may not exercise as they choose. Where such transactions are not absolutely void, they may, if they so elect, acquiesce and treat them as binding. The discretion whether to sue to set them aside or to acquiesce in and agree to them is incapable of transfer. If the new stockholder is injured, there is another question. In that case he also has a power of proceeding or remaining inactive as he may prefer. Where he is not injured, he can take no advantage of the power which was in his vendor and the latter did not care to exercise. In Graham v. LaCrosse & M. R. Co. 102 U. S. 153, 26 L. ed. 108, the point was urged which is so often made in connection with suits by subsequent stockholders, and upon which Mr. Morawetz bases his statement that such stockholders should be allowed to sue. Bradley, J., says: "But it is contended that this is a case in which the debtor corporation was defrauded of its property, and that, as the company had a right of proceeding for its recovery, any of its judgment and execution creditors have an equal right; that it is a property right, and one that inures to the benefit of creditors. Conceding that creditors who were such when the fraudulent procurement of the debtor's property occurred, . . . the question still remains whether . . . subsequent creditors have such an interest that they can reach the property for the satisfaction of their debts. We doubt whether any case going as far as this can be found. . . . It seems clear that subsequent creditors have no better right than subsequent purchasers to question a previous transaction in which the debtor's property was obtained from him by fraud, which he has acquiesced in and which he has manifested no desire to disturb. Yet in such case subsequent purchasers have no such right." Hence, upon review of the authorities and the principle on which they appear to proceed, notwithstanding the position of some of the text writers, the sounder doctrine, sustained by the better and more numerous adjudications, appears to be that subsequent stockholders have no standing, as a general rule, to attack prior mismanagement of the corporation.

It appears to be well settled, also, that stockholders who have acquired their shares and their interest in the corporation from the alleged wrongdoers and through the prior mismanagement have no standing to complain thereof. Brown v. Duluth, M. & N. R. Co. 53 Fed. 889; Re Syracuse, C. & N. Y. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 1; Schilling & S. Brewing Co. v. Schneider, 110 Mo. 83, 19 S. W. 67; Langdon v. Fogg, 14 Abb. N. C. 435; Parsons v. Hayes, 18 Jones & S. 29; Hollins v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 29 N. Y. S. R. 209, 9 N. Y. Supp. 909; Clark v. American Coal Co. 86 Iowa, 436, 17 L. R. A. 557, 53 N. W. 291; 4 Thomp. Corp. p. 3410; Cook, Corp. §§ 40, 736, note. If a stockholder's predecessor in title has acquiesced in a course of mismanagement, it has even been held that he cannot maintain a suit to restrain its continuance. Trimble v. American Sugar Ref. Co. 61 N. J. Eq. 340, 48 Atl. 912. In Thomp. Corp. p. 3410, the learned author says: "But as share certificates do not, under any theory, rise to the grade of strictly negotiable paper, it should follow, and especially in regard of the transfer of any litigious rights which may attach to them, that their holder cannot, by selling them to another, transfer to that other any better litigious rights, inhering in them, than he himself possesses. If, therefore, he has, by his conduct as a shareholder, estopped himself from maintaining a suit in equity to undo corporate action, which he might otherwise have maintained, this estoppel will attend the shares in the hands of his vendee." In consequence, it would make no great difference in the case at bar, as to the standing of the present shareholders of the company in a court of equity, if we held that subsequent shareholders could attack prior mismanagement. The present shareholders hold 260 shares through a purchase from Barber, who acquired title through the acts complained of, and the money which they paid for those very shares, which they hold through such purchase, is now claimed to belong to the corporation, and is sought to be recovered from their vendor. Nor is this all. The greater part of the remaining shares were held by Barber and his associates when the alleged wrongs were committed, and are now held by the present stockholders under a purchase from Barber. To allow them to open up these transactions is to allow them to go counter to their own title to a large part of the stock, and to assert rights and claims which their vendor could never have asserted, and this, too, as to past transactions, which have no present effect upon the value of their stock, and do not continue to be felt in any way in the corporate management.

There is another and still stronger reason why the present stockholders have no standing in a court of equity to complain of the transactions on which this suit is based. To permit them to recover, under the circumstances of the case at bar would be highly inequitable. It would be to give them moneys to which they have no just title or claim whatever, and enable them to speculate upon wrongs done to others with which they have no concern. It would enable them to recover back a large part of the purchase money they paid and agreed to pay for the stock, notwithstanding the stock was worth all that they paid for it, and notwithstanding they obtained and now retain all that they bargained for. So long as they received all that was contracted for, there is no equity in allowing them to recover back a considerable portion of what they paid, merely because their vendor had previously wronged someone else who could have obtained redress in the name of the corporation which they are now able to use. This is especially manifest in respect to the dividends. As Barber and his associates acquired shares by unauthorized borrowings of the company's money, and so held them in trust for the corporation, as representing all the then stockholders, in equity the dividends paid upon such shares doubtless were received impressed with the same trust. But who were the beneficiaries of that trust? Not the other stockholders only, but Barber and his associates, together with such remaining stockholders. Barber and his associates held most of the stock outside of the shares in question. Instead of receiving all the dividends on those shares, they should have received, in equity, the greater portion only. Had a stockholder gone into equity at that time and recovered the dividends for the company, they would simply have been for distribution among those who held the shares not subject to a trust for the company, and Barber and his associates would still have been the heaviest beneficiaries. For it is well settled that a recovery in such case inures to the benefit of all stockholders, as well those who were wrongdoers as those who were innocent. 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4491. But after an entirely new set of stockholders have come in, holding these shares under Barber and his associates and the remainder of the latter's shares under purchase from them, to let them recover back these dividends is to let them reclaim over 50 per cent of the purchase money, and recover from Barber moneys which in equity belonged to him when he took them. The fact that a relatively small portion belonged to others cannot alter the unconscionable character of such a recovery, so long as the present stockholders are not those others and have no standing in equity as their representatives. Recovery by or for the benefit of the present stockholders means, to put it plainly, that through the instrumentality of a court of equity they are to get shares, worth by their own valuation $115 each, for $55 each, are to get back dividends which never would have been payable to them in any event and were not bargained for when they bought, and are to receive, in addition to the shares, worth $1.15 on the dollar, 60 cents more on each dollar, imposed on Barber for his delinquencies. Barber wronged the old stockholders. His conduct in many respects was unconscionable and indefensible. But his fellow stockholders were supine for many years. They took no steps to investigate what he was doing, or to protect or assert their rights. Now third parties, who bought all of Barber's shares, including those which he held as a result of his wrongful manipulations, seek to assert those rights and reap a profit thereby. Because the inequitable conduct of Barber shocks the conscience of the chancellor is no reason why he should give his conscience a further shock by allowing Funkhouser and his associates to recover moneys to which they have no legal or equitable claim.

Conceding, then, that all of the present stockholders are so circumstanced that no relief should be afforded them in a court of equity, may the corporation recover, notwithstanding? We think not. Where a corporation is not asserting or endeavoring to protect a title to property, it can only maintain a suit in equity as the representative of its stockholders. If they have no standing in equity to entitle them to the relief sought for their benefit, they cannot obtain such relief through the corporation or in its own name. Arkansas River Land, Town & Canal Co. v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 13 Colo. 587, 22 Pac. 954; Des Moines Gas Co. v. West, 50 Iowa, 16; Schilling & S. Brewing Co. v. Schneider, 110 Mo. 83, 19 S. W. 67; Flagler Engraving Mach. Co. v. Flagler, 19 Fed. 468; Parsons v. Hayes, 14 Abb. N. C. 419; Langdon v. Fogg, 14 Abb. N. C. 435. It would be a reproach to courts of equity if this were not so. If a court of equity could not look behind the corporation to the shareholders, who are the real and substantial beneficiaries, and ascertain whether these ultimate beneficiaries of the relief it is asked to grant have any standing to demand it, the maxim that equity looks to the substance, and not the form, would be very much limited in its application. "It is the province and delight of equity to brush away mere forms of law." Post, J., in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald & M. Constr. Co. 44 Neb. 463, 62 N. W. 899. Nowhere is it more necessary for courts of equity to adhere steadfastly to this maxim, and avoid the danger of allowing their remedies to be abused, by penetrating all legal fictions and disguises, than in the complex relations growing out of corporate affairs. Accordingly, courts and text-writers have been in entire agreement that equity will look behind the corporate entity, and consider who are the real and substantial parties in interest, whenever it becomes necessary to do so to promote justice or obviate inequitable results. In 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4479, the learned author says: "As in point of substance and sense the corporation consists of the aggregate body of its shareholders, it is obvious that in the most substantial sense the directors are trustees for the shareholders, and that, in any action to redress breaches of trust on the part of the directors, the shareholders are the real parties in interest." Again: "For the purposes of substantial right, though not for the conveniences of legal procedure, the aggregate body of shareholders in a joint-stock company should be deemed the corporation." 1 Thomp. Corp. § 17. Mr. Morawetz also writes very cogently to the same effect: "It is essential to a clear understanding of many important branches of the law of corporations to bear in mind distinctly that the existence of a corporation independently of its shareholders is a fiction, and that the rights and duties of an incorporated association are in reality the rights and duties of the persons who compose it, and not of an imaginary being." 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 1. "While a corporation may, from one point of view, be considered as an entity, without regard to the corporators who compose it, the fact remains self-evident that a corporation is not in reality a person or thing distinct from its constituent parts. The word 'corporation' is but a collective name for the corporators or members who compose an incorporated association." Ibid. In Moore v. Schoppert, 22 W. Va. 282, 290, the court says: "The relation between a corporation and its several members may, for all practical purposes, be treated as that of trustee and cestui que trust. In contemplation of law, the property and rights of an incorporated company belong to the united association acting in the corporate name, and not to the stockholders. The latter, however, are the real owners; and a technical trust thus arises in their favor, which will be protected and enforced by the courts of equity."

This principle that in equity the corporation is regarded as a trustee for those who are the ultimate substantial beneficiaries of what is held and acquired in the corporate name finds many important illustrations in various departments of the law of corporations. Thus, it has been held that a sole stockholder may be treated in equity as the corporation, when the equities of a case so require. Swift v. Smith, 65 Md. 428, 57 Am. Rep. 336, 5 Atl. 534; 7 Thomp. Corp. § 8403; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5097. The case of Swift v. Smith has been criticised, as we think with some reason, so far as it deals with the sole stockholder as if he had some title to the property. But so far as it sustains the proposition that between the corporation and the stockholder the latter is to be recognized as the real beneficiary, and consequently that equitable rights and remedies, the benefit whereof would inure solely to the shareholder, are to be regarded as exercised for him by the corporation, and not as something belonging to it independently, the decision is in accord with the authorities. It has also been applied frequently where acts have been done or assented to by the whole body of shareholders, and attempt has been made to evade liability by conjuring with the corporate name. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 262; Sheldon Hat Blocking Co. v. Eickemeyer Hat Blocking Mach. Co. 90 N. Y. 607, 60 L. R. A.

Another case where this principle comes into play is to be seen in attempts to place property beyond the reach of creditors by fraudulent incorporations. In such cases courts do not hesitate to look behind the corporation to the real and substantial beneficiaries. First Nat. Bank v. F. O. Trebein Co. 59 Ohio St. 316, 52 N. E. 834; Terhune v. Hackensack Sav. Bank, 45 N. J. Eq. 344, 19 Atl. 377; Kellogg v. Douglass County Bank, 58 Kan. 43, 48 Pac. 587; Lusk v. Riggs (Neb.) 91 N. W. 243. In First Nat. Bank v. F. O. Trebein Co. the court says: "The fiction by which an ideal legal entity is attributed to a duly formed incorporated company, existing separate and apart from the individuals composing it, is of such general utility and application as frequently to induce the belief that it must be universal, and be in all cases adhered to, although the greatest frauds may thereby be perpetuated under the fiction as a shield. But modern cases, sustained by the best text writers, confine the fiction to the purposes for which it was adopted." It has likewise been applied to cases of estoppel. Thus, Mr. Thompson says: "We may also conclude, from the premise that the body of stockholders are in substance the corporation, that estoppels are concurrent as between the stockholders and the corporation,—in other words, that whatever will estop the stockholders will estop the corporation, and that whatever will estop the corporation will estop the stockholders." 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5269. But the commonest instance of application of this principle is in stockholders' suits for mismanagement. Ordinarily such suits are to be brought in the name of the corporation, at the instance of the corporate authorities. But where, for some reason, this course is not open, the stockholders injured will not be deprived of all remedy, but upon proper showing will be permitted to sue directly by joining the corporation as a defendant. The very basis of these suits is that "courts of equity recognize that the stockholders are ultimately the only beneficiaries." Chicago v. Cameron, 120 Ill. 447, 11 N. E. 899. Stockholders are allowed to sue, in order to obtain redress for such wrongs, because "in their effect and essential character they are wrongs to the individual shareholder, inflicted upon his corporate interests by means of the control over those interests secured through the corporate organization and management." Brewer v. Boston Theatre, 104 Mass. 378. See also State ex rel. Bugbee v. Holmes, 60 Neb. 39, 42, 82 N. W. 109. It is but another application of the same principle to hold that where no question of title is involved, but some equitable remedy is sought in the corporate name, depending purely upon the doctrines of a court of equity, the court, to prevent abuse and perversion of its doctrines and remedies, will look through the corporation to the real parties in interest, and, if those parties have no standing in equity, will refuse the remedy.

Cases of this kind must be differentiated sharply from those where the proceeding is at law, or where a question of title to the corporate property is involved. There is no question that stockholders, as such, have no title to the corporate property which they can convey or encumber in their own names. Humphreys v. McKissock, 140 U. S. 304, 35 L. ed. 473, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 779; Wheelock v. Moulton, 15 Vt. 519; Smith v. Hurd, 12 Met. 385, 46 Am. Dec. 690; Parker v. Bethel Hotel Co. 96 Tenn. 252, 31 L. R. A. 706, 34 S. W. 209; Button v. Hoffman, 61 Wis. 20, 50 Am. Rep. 131, 20 N. W. 667; Spurlock v. Missouri P. R. Co. 90 Mo. 200, 2 S. W. 219. But this, in substance, is only another way of saying that the corporation must act through its proper agents and in the prescribed way. 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4476. It is also true, for convenience of legal procedure and to avoid confusion, that restitution or redress, even where the injury has affected the interests of the stockholders, is to be sought primarily through the corporation. But this rule must always yield to the requirements of equity, and is cast aside in view of the fact that the stockholders are the real beneficiaries whenever the usual course is not open. Brewer v. Boston Theatre, 104 Mass. 378, 395; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4477. Cases like the one at bar are obviously within the same reason. To permit persons to recover through the medium of a court of equity that to which they are not entitled, simply because the nominal recovery is by a distinct person through whom they receive the whole actual and substantial benefit, and that nominal person would, in ordinary cases, as representing beneficiaries having a right to recover, be entitled to relief, is perversion of equity. It turns principles meant to do justice into rules to be administered strictly without regard to the result. It is contrary to the very genius of equity. When the corporation comes into equity and seeks equitable relief, we ought to look at the substance of the proceeding, and, if the beneficiaries of the judgment sought have no standing in equity to recover, we ought not to become begoggled by the fiction of corporate individuality, and apply the principles of equity to reach an inequitable result.

Hence, we think the rule to apply to such cases is this: Where a corporation is proceeding at law, or where it is asserting a title to property, or the title to property is involved, the corporation is regarded as a person separate and distinct from its stockholders, or any or all of them. But where it is proceeding in equity to assert rights of an equitable nature, or is seeking relief upon rules or principles of equity, the court of equity will not forget that the stockholders are the real and substantial beneficiaries of a recovery, and if the stockholders are the real and substantial beneficiaries of a recovery, and if the stockholders have no standing in equity, and are not equitably entitled to the remedy sought to be enforced by the corporation in their behalf and for their advantage, the corporation will not be permitted to recover. This rule finds many illustrations in the authorities.

In Arkansas River Land, Town & Canal Co. v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 13 Colo. 587, 22 Pac. 954, the court said: "It is true that, for some purposes, a body corporate is sometimes regarded as a legal entity, or a fictitious person having a distinct existence. This fiction is not recognized in equity. The reason is clear. Without organization and members, without officers and stockholders, a corporation is but a naked body. It may be authorized to exercise corporate franchises, but is without means or instrumentalities for such exercise. It is clear, therefore, that a body corporate cannot maintain a suit for equitable relief, except as the representative of the stockholders. It necessarily follows that, if the shareholders are without equity, they cannot, through the corporate organization or in its name, obtain relief either for themselves or for the corporation. 'In equity the conception of a corporate entity is used merely as a formula for working out the rights and equities of the real parties in interest, while at law this figurative conception takes the shape of a dogma, and is often applied rigorously, without regard to its true purpose and meaning. In equity the relationship between the shareholders is recognized whenever this becomes necessary to the attainment of justice; at law this relationship is not recognized at all.' 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 227. At the very outset of the discussion, then, it must be assumed that, in a suit of this nature, the corporation and the individual plaintiffs cannot be separated. It follows that, if the individual plaintiffs are not entitled to relief, as counsel admits, the corporation is not, and the judgment dismissing the bill might very properly be affirmed without further discussion."

In Parsons v. Hayes, 14 Abb. N. C. 419, the court says: "Again, considering that the fundamental position is that Catlow became, in fact, shareholder to the amount of all the capital stock, the following was the relation between the parties: The corporation was the holder of the legal title of the property of the corporation, subject to corporate uses. Excepting this legal title for corporate uses, the shareholders were the parties interested in the property, in fact, owning all of it, excepting the legal title, which, as against them, could be used for corporate purposes. The trustees were the statutory corporation. The shareholders were members or a part of the corporation. The corporation held the legal title for the pecuniary benefit of the shareholders, having no beneficial or pecuniary benefit in it. On the claims for the plaintiff, the thing possessed is the right of the corporation to have an action against its trustees for damages for their acts, which it is claimed were wrongful to the corporation. This right, if it existed, was held by the same tenure and for the same purposes that other property would be held. The corporation would have a bare title to it for the beneficial use of shareholders. It seems to be evident that the corporation could not claim as damage to its interests what would be damage to the beneficial interest, when the owners of the latter had consented to the so-called injury."

In Flagler Engraving Mach. Co. v. Flagler, 19 Fed. 468, the promoters and directors of a corporation put in certain patent rights as part of its capital. Afterwards by fraudulent practices they induced others to buy stock at extravagant prices. The purchasers got control of the corporation, and brought a suit in equity in the name of the corporation against the former directors for mismanagement. The court said that the purchasers might have a right to set aside the sales of stock made to them through fraud, but that they could not, by obtaining control of the company, set up an artificial case and recover through the company what was really their loss individually, and not as stockholders.

In Schilling & S. Brewing Co. v. Schneider, 110 Mo. 83, 19 S. W. 67, a corporation brought suit against certain stockholders to have shares which they held declared to be the property of the corporation. The court treated the remaining stockholders as the real parties in interest, and expressly referred to them as such, and held that, as their predecessors in interest could not have complained of the use of moneys of the corporation in acquiring the shares, the stockholders in whose interest the suit was brought could not do so in their own name or in that of the corporation.

The only decision which has been cited to the contrary is Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald & M. Constr. Co. 41 Neb. 374, 429, 59 N. W. 838. There it was held that a suit for mismanagement was maintainable in equity as to a transaction in which four fifths of the stockholders participated and the remainder acquiesced. There had been no change in the stockholders. Suit was brought by one who had acquiesced to recover for the benefit of the corporation. It was said that the action was for the benefit of the corporation, which was a distinct person, and was not affected by the circumstance that the stockholder himself was in no position to complain. But a rehearing was granted, if we may judge from the motion and brief of counsel, on this very ground; and upon rehearing this branch of the case was decided upon an entirely different point, namely, that there had been no acquiescence on the part of the complaining stockholder. Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald & M. Constr. Co. 44 Neb. 463, 62 N. W. 899. Hence, while there is no express retraction of the statement in the former opinion, we are satisfied that the court intended to recede from it, and that we are not bound thereby. We reach this conclusion the more readily because the proposition that acquiescence of all the stockholders does not preclude the right of the corporation to relief, as advanced in the first opinion, is contrary to the uniform and long-established course of decisions in all courts, and the understanding of all writers upon the subject. 2 Cook, Corp. §§ 278, 279; 4 Thomp. 60 L. R. A.

Corp. § 5269; 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 887; 1 Morawetz, Corp. §§ 262-264. The adjudications to the same effect as the statements of the text-writers cited are legion.

But it is said the defendant Barber, by reason of his delinquencies, is in no position to ask that the court look behind the corporation to the real and substantial parties in interest. The trial court took this view, saying: "I have come to the conclusion that, there being no equities in this case in favor of Mr. Barber, it is not the duty of this court to look behind the entity of the corporation." We do not think such a proposition can be maintained. It is not the function of courts of equity to administer punishment. When one person has wronged another in a matter within its jurisdiction, equity will spare no effort to redress the person injured, and will not suffer the wrongdoer to escape restitution to such person through any device or technicality. But this is because of its desire to right wrongs, not because of a desire to punish all wrongdoers. If a wrongdoer deserves to be punished, it does not follow that others are to be enriched at his expense by a court of equity. A plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own case, not on the weakness of the defendant's case. It is his right, not the defendant's wrongdoing, that is the basis of recovery. When it is disclosed that he has no standing in equity, the degree of wrongdoing of the defendant will not avail him. This principle can hardly need demonstration; but abundant illustrations are at hand. For instance, a creditor cannot complain of a fraudulent conveyance by his debtor, unless he is injured thereby. Baldwin v. Burt, 43 Neb. 245, 61 N. W. 601. The conduct of the debtor may have been ever so fraudulent. But, if it appears that the creditor has not been prejudiced, he acquires no right merely from the evil intent or unconscientious acts of the debtor. Another example may be seen in Roberts v. Northern P. R. Co. 158 U. S. 1, 13, 39 L. ed. 873, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 756. In that case a county had granted land to a railroad company without authority, and the grant, under statutes and decisions of the state, was of no effect. Afterwards the county sold the same land to an individual. The court said: "Whatever might be the result in a court of law of a contest between these respective grantees of the county, it may well be doubted whether a court of equity could be successfully appealed to by a purchaser from the county of property worth upward of $200,000 for a nominal consideration of less than $400. If the county had found that it had been overreached in its bargain with the railroad company, or had learned that its grant of these lands was invalid for want of power, and had come into a court of equity, offering to do equity by an offer to return or account for the consideration received, the condition of things would have been different from what it now is. In such a proceeding, the rescission would have inured to the benefit of the taxpayers of the county; but, under the present claim, the benefit would go to a private party, who bought with knowledge of the county's previous sale, and who admits in his answer that he secured his own grant for a grossly inadequate consideration because of the fact of such previous sale." In other words, the wrongdoing of the defendant will not blind a court to the fact that the plaintiff may have no standing in equity.

Counsel say that the court will not look through the corporation to the real plaintiffs, in order to preserve to Barber the fruits of his wrongdoing. If such were the only purpose, we should agree. But the court will bear in mind the real parties in interest, in order to prevent those parties from misusing equitable rules and remedies to obtain relief to which they have no right, and recover back moneys which they paid out voluntarily upon full consideration, without any deception, and to which they can assert no legal claim whatever.

Turning, now, to those items which involve withdrawal of moneys and assets of the company by Barber and conversion thereof to his own use, it must be evident that the foregoing discussion does not apply thereto. So far as its title to property and its right to its moneys and assets are concerned, a clear distinction between the company and its stockholders is always drawn. As we have seen, even if Barber had owned all the stock in the company, he would have had no title to the corporate property, so far as to be able to deal with it in his own, rather than in the corporate, name. But he was only a majority stockholder. When he withdrew money or assets of the corporation, and converted it to his own use, there was as clear a conversion as if the transaction had taken place between natural persons. If he concealed and covered up these transactions by availing himself of the opportunities afforded him as secretary and manager of the company, and they were not discovered until a change in management resulted in an investigation of the books, we see no reason why the company should not recover the sums so misappropriated. We are therefore of opinion that, so far as relates to the $3,000 converted under pretense of payment to Reynolds and Lovett for services as lobbyists, detailed in the twenty-third finding of the district court, and the conversion of the various collections, detailed in the twenty-eighth finding, the plaintiff should have judgment. We think, likewise, that it ought to recover the interest on the mortgage loan as found in the sixteenth finding. The trial court held that this loan was made in good faith, was duly entered on the books of the company, and properly secured and acquiesced in by the company and its officers. But it further found that a large amount of interest on the loan remained unpaid. There is nothing in the record to justify any inference, much less a finding, that Barber was not to pay all the interest on this loan. He had charge of the books and accounts of the company, and the evidence shows conclusively that he manipulated them in many ways so as to conceal the true nature of his dealings and the actual condition of the transactions between himself and his employer. As to this item of interest, the case stands the same as any other between debtor and creditor.

The same considerations apply to the money withdrawn on November 20, 1899. Unless the claim for back salary is a just and valid one, this was simply a conversion of that amount of money of the company. It becomes necessary, therefore, in this connection, to pass upon the issues as to Barber's claim for unpaid salary, since the company has filed a cross-appeal from that portion of the decree in which such claim is allowed. Undoubtedly, as a general rule, when parties have contracted for performance of certain services for a definite period at a fixed salary, and the employment continues beyond the period agreed upon, in the absence of any new contract, it will be presumed that the employment continued under the same contract and upon the terms originally fixed. Wallace v. Floyd, 29 Pa. 184, 72 Am. Dec. 620; Crane Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Adams, 142 Ill. 125, 30 N. E. 1030. But this presumption must yield to evidence showing a change of terms. Hale v. Sheehan, 41 Neb. 102, 59 N. W. 554; McCullough Iron Co. v. Carpenter, 67 Md. 555, 11 Atl. 176; Com. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 6 Met. 64. It may be conceded that it would take two to make the new agreement, and that a mere intention on the part of Barber to accept a less sum, or even an express statement by him that he would accept the less sum, would not of itself bind him so to do. Richard Thompson Co. v. Brook, 37 N. Y. S. R. 506, 14 N. Y. Supp. 370. In that case certain employees of a corporation agreed among themselves to accept a reduction of salary. The corporation was not a party to the agreement, and it was never communicated to or acted on by the corporation or its directors. Such a case is very different from the one at bar. Here, while there was no action by the corporation expressly, the court has found that from the time Barber as general manager reduced his own salary, along with the salaries of other employees, to the time he ceased to be an officer of the company, he drew his salary from time to time substantially on the basis of the reduction; and the evidence is clear and convincing that he took the moneys withdrawn in full satisfaction of his claim for salary, and had no thought of claiming more until his right to withdraw the $2,200 was challenged after the new management took charge. We think these circumstances are sufficient to show that the company relied on his voluntary action in reducing his own salary, and took no express action thereon, because none was necessary, and that it was understood by both parties that his salary was that which he had voluntarily fixed upon. In Shade v. Sisson Mill & Lumber Co. 115 Cal. 357, 47 Pac. 135, the corporation rendered statements monthly to an employee, in which he was credited with a less salary per month than he should have received. It was held that the employee, by acquiescence in these statements so rendered him was estopped to claim afterwards a salary in excess of that for which he was given credit. So long as Barber's reduction of his own salary was carried out by himself for a long series of years, and even at the time when he withdrew the $2,200 he did not claim the right to withdraw any such sums as would be due to him if his present claims were allowed, we see no ground whatever on which to sustain the judgment in his favor in this behalf. Hence, we are of opinion that the company should recover the item of $3,000 converted on April 17, 1895, the item of $237.37 for collections unaccounted for, the unpaid interest on the mortgage loan, amounting at the date of the decree in the lower court to $1,510, and the item of $2,200 withdrawn on November 20, 1899.

It is therefore recommended that the decree of the district court be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a new decree in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Barber for the several sums last above stated and interest thereon at the rate by law provided. We further recommend that each party pay his own costs in this court.

Barnes and Oldham, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to enter a new judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Barber in accordance with said opinion. It is further ordered that each party pay his own costs in this court.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

B. P. DORITY et al., Appts.,
v.
Helen DORITY.

(.....Tex.....)

1. A lease of land which is the separate estate of a married woman, for a period of more than one year, is a conveyance within the meaning of statutes requiring husband and wife to join in the conveyance of real estate the separate property of the wife, and forbidding the conveyance of an estate for a term of more than one year unless the conveyance be in writing; and the wife must, therefore, join in its execution notwithstanding a statute giving the husband the sole management of the wife's property during marriage.
2. A husband may be enjoined, in a suit which does not seek the dissolution of the marriage, from further interference with his wife's separate estate, notwithstanding the statute gives him the sole management of it during marriage, where he refuses to support her, and so diverts the income of her property as to deprive her of the benefit which the law entitles her to receive therefrom through his management.

CERTIFICATION by the Court of Civil Appeals for the First Supreme Judicial District of an appeal by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Nueces County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to establish plaintiff's right to manage and control her own estate. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—The above decision as to the right of a court, in a suit by a married woman other than for divorce, to restrain her husband from exercising over her separate property the control expressly given to him by statute, seems to be one of first impression. It is a clear example of the fundamental power of equity to modify the strict legal rights of parties by reason of special circumstances.

Messrs. G. R. Scott, James W. Durst, R. P. Clarkson, D. W. Doom, and D. H. Doom for appellants.

Messrs. McCampbells & Stayton and J. C. Scott, for appellee:

The husband does not own his wife's separate estate, but only has the right to manage the same as a trustee for her; and she may sue him when it becomes necessary for her to do so for the protection of her rights in the property.

Ryan v. Ryan, 61 Tex. 473; Black v. Black, 62 Tex. 296; Nickerson v. Nickerson, 65 Tex. 281; O'Brien v. Hilburn, 9 Tex. 297; Roper v. Roper, 29 Ala. 247; Rainey v. Rainey, 35 Ala. 282; Shulman v. Fitzpatrick, 62 Ala. 571; Sampley v. Watson, 43 Ala. 377.

The law will not permit the husband to defraud and swindle his wife out of her separate property merely because she may not have sufficient grounds to secure a judgment of divorce from him, and cannot have her separate property set aside to her in such judgment; but she will be protected in her property rights, even as against her husband, and though she may not bring a divorce suit against him.

Magee v. White, 23 Tex. 180.

The husband cannot lease the separate real estate of his wife without her joining him in the lease and acknowledging it privily and apart from him, the same as required by the statute for a fee-simple deed of conveyance of such property.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes to us upon certificate of dissent from the court of civil appeals for the first district. The action was brought in the district court by Helen DORITY against her husband, B. P. Dority, and James W. Durst, A. A. Thompson, and R. P. Clarkson, for the purpose of setting aside leases of land owned by Mrs. Dority in her separate right, which had been made by her husband to the other defendants, and of establishing her own right to manage and control her separate estate as a feme sole, and to enjoin her husband from interfering therewith. The district judge held that the leases in question were void, because made in excess of the authority of the husband over his wife's separate property; that, under the facts shown, they operated as a legal fraud upon the rights of Mrs. Dority; also, in substance, that Mrs. Dority was entitled, under the circumstances developed, to the management and control of her own property; and that her husband should be restrained from interfering therewith. The majority of the court of civil appeals agreed with the trial court upon all of these points, and Associate Justice Pleasants dissented from the decision upon each of them. A statement of the facts of the case is essential to an understanding of the points involved in the dissent:

The plaintiff and defendant B. P. Dority were married in 1873, and have acquired the property in question in such way, as held by the court of civil appeals, as to make it the separate property of the wife. No question as to this is now before us. The evidence tends to show that for several years before their separation, and until the present time, plaintiff has been in very delicate health, while her husband, a wheelwright by trade, has been very strong, healthy, and able to work when he could secure employment. Plaintiff raised poultry, and, with cows, which were her separate property, conducted a dairy, and, from the products of her industry, earned, in the main, her support. Her husband earned little, and, up to two years before the trial, contributed to his wife's maintenance only a few groceries. For two years before the trial he contributed nothing. At all times he has had the management of his wife's ranch, which constituted the chief part of her separate property, and has received whatever revenue has been derived from it. They lived together on their homestead in Corpus Christi until their separation took place. Dority, while contributing little to the support of his wife, has made no claim to any part of her personal earnings. This had been the condition of affairs between them for some years before 1899. In that year the taxes upon her property and upon the homestead for the year 1898 were delinquent, and the property was advertised for sale. Of this fact Dority notified his wife; saying at the same time that he could not pay the taxes, and did not know where they would get the money to meet the demand. In order to meet it, Mrs. Dority executed a lease of her ranch to one Keyes at $200 per year. Her husband refused to assent to it, and would not permit the lessee to take possession; considering his wife's action a reflection upon him. This, as she says, was the immediate cause of their separation. She informed her husband that she would not longer live with him, and they have since that time lived apart. This occurred October 26, 1899, and Mrs. Dority brought suit for divorce November 10, 1899, upon the ground of cruel treatment, excesses, and outrages. She succeeded in the district court, but the court of civil appeals reversed the judgment in her favor, holding that the evidence showed no legal ground for divorce, and remanded the cause, which she dismissed May 16, 1901. (Tex. Civ. App.) 62 S. W. 106. In the meantime the parties had occupied apartments in their home, living apart, until January, 1901, and Dority had continued to assert control of the ranch and some other property; and a few days after the separation he executed to defendant Durst a lease, bearing a date anterior to the separation, by which he let to Durst the ranch for one year, with the privilege in Durst of taking it for two years longer, in consideration of $10 per month, and the privilege to Dority of pasturing therein some 90 head of horses, his separate property and 15 or 20 cattle, community property. Dority thereafter sold the horses to Durst, and the latter held the ranch until about December 23, 1900, and paid to Dority $150 rent, all of which was applied by him to payment of attorneys' fees in his litigation with his wife. In December, 1900, Dority, Durst, and defendant Thompson orally agreed that the last named should take the unexpired portion of the Durst lease from December 23, 1900, to October 23, 1902; recognizing Durst as his landlord, but paying to Dority rent at $20 per month, and agreeing to make improvements at the rate of $5 per month. Thompson still held possession at the time of the trial of this case, and had paid to Dority $80 of rent; payment of the balance having been stopped by injunction in the divorce suit. The sum paid was also appropriated by Dority to his own use. In January, 1901, Dority left home, and went to Mexico, where he remained until May 7, 1901. He then returned, and offered to resume relations with his wife, and to live with her as her husband; but, upon her refusal to have anything to do with him, he left her in possession of the homestead, and has not since molested her. On the 21st of May, 1901, Thompson being still in possession of the ranch under the agreement, lasting until October, 1902, Dority executed to defendant Clarkson a lease of the property for ten years next ensuing, with privilege in the lessee of renewal for five years, at rental of $25 per month. It was orally agreed that Clarkson was not to have possession until the expiration of Thompson's lease. The lease also contained the provision that the lessee should, out of the rent, pay all expenses and costs incurred in resisting the attempt of any person to recover possession of the land. Dority assigned this lease contract to pay his attorneys' fees and personal debts for more than $650, and a note given for money borrowed to defend a suit with other parties involving Mrs. Dority's title to the land. All of these leases were made without the knowledge or consent of Mrs.

Dority. She continued, after the separation, to earn money as before, though suffering greatly from chronic sickness and becoming continually weaker and less able to work. Being defeated, as stated, in her effort to raise means to pay the taxes through a lease of her land, she borrowed the money and repaid it out of her earnings, and thus paid the taxes due up to the time of the trial upon the homestead and her separate property, while her husband was controlling the ranch and diverting its revenues to other purposes. During this period she has received nothing whatever from him, but has become indebted for various kinds of necessities. Dority now has no property except an interest in the homestead and in the household and kitchen furniture, which is community property in use by Mrs. Dority. It is found by the court of civil appeals that there is no reasonable probability of the parties ever living together again. The record shows that, in addition to her suit for divorce, plaintiff, on the 13th day of November, 1899, instituted in the county court, under article 2972, Rev. Stat., a proceeding against her husband to enforce the appropriation by him to her support of a portion of the proceeds of her lands. This he resisted and defeated on the grounds that the property had not for the five years before produced any revenue which had been appropriated by him.

The questions upon which the difference of opinion exists may be stated thus: First. Did the power of "sole management" given by the statute to the husband over the wife's separate property include the power, if fairly exercised, to make leases for a longer term than one year? Second. If so, do the facts warrant the conclusion that the power was exercised in this case in such manner as to constitute a fraud upon the rights of the wife, which entitled her to maintain an action to have the leases set aside? Third. Do the facts justify the decree enjoining Dority from interfering with his wife's separate property?

1. The decision of the first question depends upon whether leases such as those in question are conveyances, within the meaning of article 635, Rev. Stat., requiring the husband and wife to join in "the conveyance of real estate the separate property of the wife," or are authorized by article 2967, giving to the husband "the sole management" of the wife's property during marriage. Article 624 (a part of the same title with article 635) provides: "No estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than one year, in lands and tenements shall be conveyed from one to another, unless the conveyance be declared by an instrument in writing." The majority of the court of civil appeals, construing the two articles together, held that the joint action of husband and wife was essential to the creation of leases for longer terms than one year, for the reason that article 624 declared such terms to be "estates in land," and the instruments creating them "conveyances," and article 635 applied to all conveyances of the real estate of the wife. The dissenting justice held that the "conveyances" intended in article 635 were only such as purported to convey the whole title of the wife. The provision of article 624 was contained in the act of February 5, 1840, concerning conveyances, which did not expressly regulate the conveyance of the property of married women; and that provision was not connected, as it has become in the revisions, with the rule declared in article 635. The acts of February 3, 1841, and of April 30, 1846, prescribing the mode of conveyances by married women, were not adopted in the form of amendments of the act of 1840, but by their terms they regulated the conveyance of "any estate or interest in land the separate property of the wife." Those statutes, before the revision in 1879, had been construed as prescribing an exclusive mode of conveying land of married women, and the language was so altered by the revisers as to affirmatively express this construction; and their report shows that no other change affecting this question was intended to be made in the law. As respects the question before us, article 635 has the same force and effect as the act of 1846, of which it is a condensed revision; and consequently, if a lease for more than one year creates and passes "an estate or interest in land," the joinder of the husband and wife in its execution, and the separate acknowledgment of the wife, are essential to its validity. The statute regulating such conveyances, and that giving to the husband the sole management of the wife's property, must both be observed; and it is evident that the power conferred by the latter cannot include the doing by the husband, alone, of those things in which the joint action of husband and wife are required by the former. As we have seen, the question is to be determined from the language of the act of 1846. It relates to any "deed or other writing purporting to be a conveyance of any estate or interest in land the separate property of the wife." We need not dwell upon an exact definition of the word "conveyance," for, from the very terms of the statute itself, it necessarily results that any writing which is necessary to convey land, and which purports to convey any estate or interest in land of a married woman, is a conveyance such as is meant. That a leasehold for more than one year is an estate or interest in land is recognized by the statute (article 624). When the acts of 1841 and 1846 were adopted, the other statute, regulating conveyances generally, declared such terms for more than five years to be estates in land, and the instruments creating them to be conveyances; and the Congress, in adopting the married women's statute, must have had in mind those provisions, and, by the language employed must have meant to include such conveyances. One statute required written conveyances to pass such an interest, and the others prescribed the persons by whom, and the mode in which, they should be made. Ballard v. Carmichael, 83 Tex. 363, 18 S. W. 734. In the revision of 1879 the term for which parol leases might be made was reduced to one year, but the provision for conveyances by married women was introduced as a part of the chapter upon conveying; and the association between the rules originally adopted by different statutes was thus preserved, so that the conveyances which one required to be in writing were by the other required to be executed by the husband and wife, if the property conveyed were the separate estate of the wife. That such statutes, enabling husband and wife to convey the wife's separate property, apply to leases of it, has been held by the courts of the highest authority, and we find no conflicting decision. George v. Goldsby, 23 Ala. 326; Chandler v. Jost, 81 Ala. 411, 2 So. 82; Warren v. Wagner, 75 Ala. 188, 51 Am. Rep. 446; Jackson ex dem. Campbell v. Holloway, 7 Johns. 81. Jones v. Marks, 47 Cal. 242, is authority for the proposition that a lease is a conveyance, in the sense of a statutory provision like article 624. It is true that the original statutes, as well as the Revised Statutes, declare that the conveyances provided for "shall pass all the right and interest which the husband and wife, or either of them, may have in or to the property therein conveyed;" and it may be urged that this shows that only conveyances of the entire title were in contemplation. But the answer is that by "property therein conveyed" is meant the estate or interest conveyed, which need not be the whole. Otherwise the prior use of the words "any estate or interest" would be rendered wholly meaningless. This construction is also enforced by the decisions of this court holding that the husband and wife may mortgage her separate property, which they could not do if only empowered to convey absolutely the whole title, and others holding that the statute applies to the granting of easements over such property. Hall v. Dotson, 55 Tex. 524; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Durrett, 57 Tex. 51. These decisions refute the contention that only alienations of the entire title of married women are regulated by the statute. Whether or not a lease for a year, or less, by the husband of his wife's land, would be valid, is not involved, unless argumentatively, in the dissent certified; the difference being as to the validity of longer leases. In the case of Chandler v. Jost, 81 Ala. 411, 2 So. 82, the court held that such leases for a year were valid, while those for longer terms were void. The opinion of this court in Ballard v. Carmichael, 83 Tex. 363, 18 S. W. 734, may also have an important bearing upon this question. We think the court of civil appeals correctly held that the leases for terms in excess of one year were void, and that the wife could maintain an action to set them aside and recover the property. O'Brien v. Hilburn, 9 Tex. 297.

2. The conclusion reached upon the first question renders the second immaterial.

3. The question whether or not, at the suit of a married woman, other than for divorce, a court may restrain a husband from exercising over his wife's separate property the control expressly given to him by statute during marriage, is one of grave importance and of considerable difficulty. At common law a wife could not sue her husband. As a result of our statutes recognizing the separate existence of married women, and conferring upon them capacity to own property, it is settled in this state that causes of action in their favor, incidental to their ownership, may arise and be asserted in the courts against their husbands. O'Brien v. Hilburn, 9 Tex. 297; Ryan v. Ryan, 61 Tex. 473; Hall v. Hall, 52 Tex. 298, 36 Am. Rep. 725; Price v. Cole, 35 Tex. 461. In general, however, the wife cannot have a cause of action against her husband, and hence cannot sue him. Thus, it was held in Nickerson v. Nickerson, 65 Tex. 282, that she cannot sue her husband for a tort committed by him upon her person; and in Trevino v. Trevino, 63 Tex. 650, it was held that, except by suit for divorce, or a proceeding under article 2972, Rev. Stat., the wife cannot maintain an action to require her husband to support her. Each decision is based upon the proposition that the wife had no cause of action of the character asserted. It will therefore be assumed, for the purposes of this decision, that, besides actions for divorce, the only ones which a wife may maintain against the husband are those which are founded upon her title to her separate property, and are incidental to it. Whenever such a cause of action arises, it is clear, under the decisions, that she has capacity to assert it against her husband. In systems where common-law and equity jurisprudence prevail, unchanged by statute, the legal title to land conveyed to the wife for her sole and separate use vests in the husband; but the equitable title vests in the wife, and equity treats the husband as trustee, holding for her benefit, and requires him to apply the fruits and revenues of the property to her use. It is a common exercise of chancery power to control the husband, as trustee, in the management of property thus held, and, where necessity exists, to take away his powers and bestow them upon a more suitable person. In some jurisdictions the statutes giving married women capacity to hold property expressly make their husbands trustees, and subject them to removal for proper cause. The decisions cited from Alabama are based upon such a statute. Under such systems the fruits and revenues, as well as the corpus, of the property, belong beneficially to the wife, and herein they differ from ours in an important particular. Here the title to the property is vested in the wife, and the only right or power which the husband has over it is that of sole management during marriage; but the fruits and revenues become community property, in which the husband has an equal interest, and of which he has complete power of disposal. It is thus evident that the statute confers upon the husband, not only a power over the wife's separate estate, but a right with respect to it, and these are incidents of the marriage. His position, therefore, is not that of a simple trustee, as it is under the English chancery jurisprudence. If it were, the present case would not involve great difficulty. It does not follow, however, that the power given to the husband is irresponsible, or that the right is unqualified and indefeasible. Whether or not a husband, under our system, is to be regarded as a trustee for his wife, in respect of her separate estate, is a question upon which expressions of some of the most eminent justices of this court indicate differences of opinion. The opinions of Judge Hemphill show a decided tendency to liken married women's statutory separate estates to those existing under the equity jurisprudence of England, where the husband held as trustee for the sole and separate use of the wife. Of these doctrines, Judge Bell, in Magee v. White, 23 Tex. 189, said: "Their whole tendency is to the building up of a system in which all distinction will be destroyed between the statutory estate of a married woman and an equitable estate, limited to her sole and separate use, — a system in which every married woman who has a separate estate will become a ward of chancery, and her husband converted into a trustee for the management of her estate, under the supervisory power of the courts, and subject to be controlled by the court, or removed from his trust, whenever the court becomes dissatisfied with his management, or whenever it becomes necessary to make orders to prevent the misapplication of the rents, issues, and profits of the estate." Further on he said: "If this is permitted, it will be difficult to stop short of an equity system, uncertain and oppressive, in which, as has been before said, the separate estate of the wife shall be placed under the constant supervision of the courts, and, as a part of which, the courts will exercise authority to control or remove the husband from the management of his wife's property, whenever they may think proper to do so, to prevent waste, misapplication of proceeds, etc." In Richardson v. Hutchins, 68 Tex. 88, 3 S. W. 279, Judge Stayton said: "While a husband does not, here, hold title to his wife's separate estate in trust for her, as he is held to do in England and in the states of this Union generally, when a conveyance is made to a wife for her separate use and benefit, and no trustee named, yet it does not follow from this that the husband is not, as to the wife's separate property, essentially a trustee, charged with duties for the violation of which any estate subject to the payment of his debts will be liable. A person is said to be a trustee in whom a power over property, or affecting it, rests for the benefit of another; and a person having such power is as essentially a trustee as is one in whom the title to the property which he has the right to control is vested for the benefit of another. The husband is here made by statute the trustee for the wife, with power to manage and control her separate property, and we see no reason why he shall not be held to the duties and liabilities which ordinarily attach to that relation. So long as he manages the separate estate of his wife with reasonable care, not diverting it from the purpose for which the law places it in his hands and control, though loss may result from his management, he is not liable therefor; but can it be said that such a trustee may convert the separate estate of the wife into money or other property, and appropriate that to the benefit of himself or to the benefit of the community, and not be liable for its value?"

These expressions are important only because they indicate, in a general way, the conceptions of these able jurists of the nature of the statutory separate estate of married women, and the husband's relation to it. In none of the cases was the question before us, or any one like it, involved; nor were the cases under consideration by Judges Bell and Stayton at all similar. Judge Bell's language would seem to indicate an inclination of the mind against the theory that the husband is trustee for the wife, and subject, as such, to the control of the courts in his management of her estate; but that which he really reprobated was the adoption into our jurisprudence of the English chancery system, under which the husband, purely as trustee, and the wife, as ward, would be under the constant control and supervision of the courts. His remarks do not imply even an impression that the wife has not such an interest in the proper management of her estate as to entitle her, even during marriage, to protection at the hands of the courts against mismanagement on the part of the husband. Judge Stayton's view, that the husband, in some sense, is to be regarded as trustee, because he exercises powers such as belong to trustees, and is to some extent, at least, accountable as such, is, in our opinion, correct. That it is the duty of the husband to support the wife, and that the management of her separate property is committed to him partly for that purpose, is put beyond question by our statutes and decisions. One of her rights is to have this support from him, and, so far as her separate estate constitutes a fund from which the means to satisfy it are to be derived, the right is an incident to her ownership of such estate. The fruits and revenues of that estate constitute a part of such fund. Article 2972, which entitles her to go into court and secure a judgment devoting to her support a sufficient portion of the proceeds of her separate lands, as well as the decisions of this court, clearly shows this. The rights of the husband over the wife's property, and his duty to manage it properly and afford her this support, are thus made correlative. Wright v. Hays, 10 Tex. 133, 60 Am. Dec. 200. If he wholly fails to perform this duty, and cannot be made to perform it by ordinary remedies, is his right to the management of her property unaffected by this repudiation of the duty that goes with it, and must the courts, because of this right, deny to the wife any redress? We think the decisions which affirm her right to sue him to enforce her property rights furnish an answer, and that the character of the remedy to which she is entitled must depend upon the necessity of the case. When the husband, by nonperformance of his duties and the abuse of his powers, has defeated the purposes of the law in conferring the right to manage the wife's property, that right should not be allowed to stand in the way. The wife owns the property, and is entitled to a support out of its revenues when the husband does not furnish it; and this, in our opinion, is a right for the enforcement of which she should have an adequate remedy in the courts. If it be said that the law furnishes her a remedy by divorce, the answer is that a suit for divorce is not a remedy for the enforcement of property rights, nor can it be sustained upon a mere violation of such rights. They may be brought into and adjusted in connection with the proceeding, but are not dependent upon it. A suit for divorce can only be maintained when some of the causes prescribed by statute exist, and such causes are by no means coextensive with those which a party may have for the enforcement of rights of property. Such rights may be infringed in many ways for which there would be no remedy by divorce. Besides, if ground for divorce existed, why should the law require that they be availed of for the protection of mere property interests, when, perhaps, conscientious scruples restrain the party wronged. The proceeding provided for by article 2072 may furnish a sufficient remedy in cases where the husband so manages the wife's property as to make its proceeds subject to the judgment of the court, and to afford a fund adequate to the wife's maintenance, but not in cases like this, where his transactions are such that the fruits of the property cannot be reached. This was demonstrated by the result of the proceeding which plaintiff instituted. The community property and the separate estate of the husband may also be made liable for necessities for the wife, if anyone can be found to furnish them, but this at best uncertain means of relief wholly fails where no such property exists. And if it be true, as held in Trevino v. Trevino, 63 Tex. 650, that the wife cannot maintain an action against him to require him to support her, this only strengthens the position that she is entitled to get her support by the proper management of her separate property. Married women may also contract for necessities, and bind their separate property for the prices of them; but why should they be forced, out of respect for supposed rights of husbands, to thus consume the corpus of their estates, when their revenues, properly applied, would supply all needs? The answer is deducible from the decisions that when the husband totally fails in the discharge of his duty, and so diverts the fruits of the wife's property as to deprive her of the benefits which the law entitles her to receive therefrom through his management, the right and power which the law gives to enable him the better to discharge the duty is not an obstacle to the granting of such relief as the nature of the case may require. That these rights of the wife may be asserted by herself, under some circumstances, without action in the courts, although the marriage is not dissolved, is settled by many decisions of this court.

Wright v. Hays, 10 Tex. 130, 60 Am. Dec. 200; Cheek v. Bellows, 17 Tex. 613, 67 Am. Dec. 686; Cullers v. James, 66 Tex. 494, 1 S. W. 314; Fullerton v. Doyle, 18 Tex. 13; Kelley v. Whitmore, 41 Tex. 648; Ann Berta Lodge No. 42, I. O. O. F. v. Levertton, 42 Tex. 20; Clements v. Bwing, 71 Tex. 372, 9 S. W. 312; Hector v. Know, 63 Tex. 617; Slator v. Neal, 64 Tex. 222; Davis v. Saladee, 57 Tex. 326. While these decisions may not wholly apply to a case like this, where the husband is present, asserting control of the wife's property, they do affirm the principle that his right of management is dependent upon the discharge of the duties which go hand in hand with that right, and that the wife during marriage has rights of property of which she may avail herself when the purposes of the law in making the husband the manager of her estate are defeated by his abandonment of the duty. When there has been no abandonment by the husband of his rights and powers as such, it may be true that the wife is not, by the decisions referred to, restored to all the capacities of a feme sole merely by his misconduct; but we think that it is also true that if the husband has repudiated the duties, and is asserting only the rights and powers of his position for selfish purposes, the wife has rights of property which she can enforce in the courts, and, if they can only be adequately enforced by enjoining the husband from controlling her property, that this may be done. We do not understand that Justice Pleasants holds that in no case could a wife be entitled to such relief, but understand him as holding that the facts in this record did not justify such action. We shall not comment at length on the facts. We are bound by the conclusions of the court, if there was any evidence to sustain them, and whether there was, or not, is the question presented by the certificate.

We think the facts stated justify the conclusions that the husband wholly and habitually failed to support his wife; that he has had the management of property belonging to her, the revenues of which, properly utilized, would have supported her, or at least have greatly lessened the hardships of her situation; that he has so systematically and so long managed to keep them out of her reach as to justify the inference that he will continue to do so; and that there is no other remedy afforded by law which will enable her to get the benefit of her property, but to restrain him from its management, and leave her free to utilize it for herself. The court of civil appeals has merely stated the conclusion that the judgment of the district court was sustained by the facts, and we must presume that the court drew all conclusions necessary to sustain its judgment, so far as there is evidence tending to establish them. We are not to be understood as holding that the mere fact of a separation, caused by an unjustifiable refusal of a wife to live with her husband, would entitle her to such relief as is here granted, if the husband is present, asserting his rights, and attempting to perform his duties. It may be conceded that in such a case his rights would continue, for the reason that the wife cannot by her own acts terminate them. But his right would be to manage the property, as the law intends he shall manage it, for the purposes for which it is committed to his care. The rights of the wife with respect to her separate property would continue in full force, and her fault in causing the separation would not bar her assertion of them, and would not, therefore, protect the husband in the misuse of her property. It is said that the disposition which the husband has made of money received and of other property was within his powers. This may be true, but it does not meet the question as to whether or not he should be left free in this way to continue to defeat the rights of his wife. That question goes deeper, and brings up for review his exercise of the powers and rights intrusted to him, and the effect thereof upon the rights and interests of his wife. Each act of his, as between his wife and third parties, may be within his lawful power, while it lasts, and yet, as between himself and wife, his course of conduct may be an utter perversion and abuse of those powers.

We are of the opinion that the judgment of the majority of the Court of Civil Appeals is sustained by the evidence stated in the certificate.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

John H. McDANIELS, Appt.,
v.

J. J. CONNELLY SHOE COMPANY, Defendant, and

(.....Wash.....)

1. Affidavits controverting a denial by the garnishee of possession of goods of the debtor under a statute permitting such affidavits stating reason to believe the answer to be incorrect and the particulars wherein it is so, are sufficient to raise an issue, where they state that plaintiff believes with good reason that the answer is incorrect, because garnishee took into his possession the debtor's stock of goods and attempted to acquire title thereto without complying with the terms of the statute requiring the purchaser of a stock of goods to ascertain the creditors of the seller, and have the purchase price applied to their claims.
2. A statute forbidding the purchase of a stock of goods in bulk without ascertaining the seller's creditors, and having their claims settled, does not deprive the seller of his property without due process of law, and is not void as class legislation; nor is it in restraint of trade.

(December 30, 1902.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County in favor of the defendant garnishee in an action brought to recover for goods sold and delivered, in which it was sought to reach an amount for which the garnishees were alleged to be liable. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—This seems to be the first case involving a statute making a transfer of a stock of goods in bulk invalid as to the seller's creditors, unless steps are taken to discharge their claims. On the general question of the participation by purchaser in fraud of vendor, which will invalidate transfer for good consideration as against the vendor's creditors, see note to Kansas Moline Plow Co. v. Sherman (Okla.) 82 L. R. A. 38.

Mr. Fenley Bryan, with Messrs. Bates & Murray, Leopold M. Stern, F. S. Blattner, and John H. McDaniels, for appellant:

The judiciary can only arrest the execution of a statute when it conflicts with the Constitution.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 168.

This act does not take away the right to sell property or the right to pay debts. It is not an excess of the legislative authority that security is given for debts not yet due at the time the lien is given.

Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, § 209.

The power of the legislature to protect creditors by giving them liens on the property of their debtors is unquestioned.

Gleason v. Tacoma Hotel Co. 16 Wash. 412, 47 Pac. 894; Fitch v. Applegate, 24 Wash. 25, 64 Pac. 147; State v. Hoskins, 106 Tenn. 430, 61 S. W. 781; McCoy v. Cook, 13 Wash. 158, 42 Pac. 546.

Such law merely grants a new remedy, and is applicable to debts created prior, as well as subsequent, to its passage.

Gordon v. South Fork Canal Co. McAll. 513, Fed. Cas. No. 5,621; Davies Henderson Lumber Co. v. Gottschalk, 81 Cal. 641, 22 Pac. 860; Bolton v. Johns, 5 Pa. 145, 47 Am. Dec. 404; Sullivan v. Brewster, 8 How. Pr. 207.

Messrs. Ira A. Town, A. R. Titlow, and F. M. Halsted for respondents.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant brought an action in the superior court of Pierce county against the J. J. Connelly Shoe Company, as defendant, to recover upon certain accounts for merchandise which had theretofore been assigned to him by the wholesale dealers who had sold the merchandise to the defendant. At the time of commencing the action the appellant sued out a writ of garnishment against the respondents A. J. Burchill and William Turner, averring in his affidavit for the writ, in the language of the statute, that he had reason to believe, and did believe, that the respondents were indebted to the defendant the J. J. Connelly Shoe Company, and that they had in their possession and under their control personal property and effects belonging to the defendant. The respondents answered separately to the writ, averring, in substance, that they were not indebted to, and did not have in their possession or under their control any personal property or effects of, the defendant. To these answers the appellant filed a controverting affidavit, in which he alleged that he had good reason to believe, and did believe, that the answers of the respondents were incorrect, particularly that part of the answers which averred that the respondents had no personal property or effects in their possession or under their control belonging to the defendant; further averring, in substance, that the defendant had theretofore been engaged in the retail boot and shoe business in the city of Tacoma, and had become indebted in large sums to various wholesale dealers, among whom were the assignors of the appellant; that just prior to the commencement of the action the defendant had undertaken to sell to the respondents, and the respondents had undertaken to purchase of the defendant, its stock of goods in bulk; that the goods had been delivered, and the agreed purchase price paid, without a compliance with the provisions of the statute relating to the sale of stocks of goods in bulk, and was therefore fraudulent and void. The respondents thereupon moved for a discharge upon their answers, which motion the trial court granted, entering a judgment of dismissal of the garnishee action. This appeal is from that judgment.

The trial judge sustained the motion to dismiss on the ground that the act of the legislature of March 16, 1901, relied upon by the appellant, is unconstitutional and void; and it is to this question that the arguments are mainly directed. The respondents, however, insist that the controverting affidavits were insufficient to raise an issue, and that the judgment of dismissal should be sustained for that reason. But without following the argument in detail, we are satisfied that the affidavits were sufficient to raise the issue sought to be raised. The statute (Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 5409) provides that, if the plaintiff should not be satisfied with the answer of the garnishee, he may controvert the same by affidavit in writing signed by him, stating that he has good reason to believe that the answer of the garnishee is incorrect; stating in what particulars he believes the same is incorrect. The affidavits controverting the answers of the respondents sufficiently complied with the statute in this respect. They not only stated that the appellant had good reason to believe, and did believe, that the answers were incorrect in the particular wherein it was averred that the respondents had no property or effects in their possession or under their control belonging to the defendant J. J. Connelly Shoe Company, but the grounds upon which that belief was based were detailed at length, namely, facts were alleged tending to show that the respondents had taken into their possession and attempted to acquire title to a stock of goods belonging to the defendant under circumstances prohibited by statute.

The further question involves the constitutionality of the act of March 16, 1901 (Sess. Laws 1901, p. 222; Pierce, Code, §§ 5346 et seq.). The 1st section of this act makes it the duty of every person who shall bargain for or purchase any stock of goods in bulk, for cash or on credit, before paying the vendor any part of the purchase price thereof, to demand of and receive from the vendor a written statement showing the names and addresses of all of the creditors of the vendor, together with the amount of such indebtedness, whether due or to become due, owing to each of such creditors, verified according to a form set out in the statute. The 2d section makes "fraudulent and void" any sale of a stock of goods in bulk unless the vendee demands and receives from the vendor the statement mentioned in the first section, verified as therein provided, "and without paying or seeing to it that the purchase money of said property, is applied to the payment of the bona fide claim of creditors of the vendor as shown upon such verified statement, share and share alike." The 3d section makes it perjury on the part of a vendor to make and deliver a statement which does not include all of the creditors of the vendor, with the correct amounts owing to each of them, or which contains any false or untrue statement, and provides a punishment for the same. The 4th section declares that any sale or transfer of a stock of goods out of the usual or ordinary course of business or trade of the vendor, or whenever substantially the entire business or trade theretofore conducted by the vendor shall be sold or conveyed, or whenever an interest in or to the business or trade shall be sold or conveyed, or attempted to be sold or conveyed, shall be a sale in bulk, in contemplation of the act; followed by a proviso to the effect that, if the vendor shall produce and deliver a written waiver of the provisions of the act, then this section shall not apply. The 5th and last section provides that nothing in the act contained shall apply to sales by executors, administrators, or receivers, or to sales made by any public officer acting under judicial process.

The first objection to the constitutionality of the act is that it deprives persons of their property without due process of law. As we understand the argument, the contention is not that the act deprives an owner of property of his day in court, where his property rights are judicially called in question, or that it in any manner authorizes the actual physical taking by one of the property of another, but it is that as the term "property," in legal signification, includes in its meaning the right of any person to possess, use, enjoy, or dispose of a thing, the act violates the Constitution, inasmuch as it restricts the right of an owner to dispose of his property. The act, it is true, does prohibit owners of certain kinds of property from disposing of it in a particular way, without complying with certain conditions, but it is not for that reason necessarily unconstitutional. While the legislature may not constitutionally declare that void which in its nature is, and under all circumstances must be, entirely honest and harmless, yet it may, under its police powers, place such reasonable restrictions on the right of an owner in relation to his property as it finds necessary to protect the interests of the public, or prevent frauds among individuals. If this were not so, it would be easy to find many unconstitutional acts on the statute books. Statutes familiar to every person, such as those regulating the manner of conveying real property, regulating the mortgaging and sale of personal property, requiring certain articles of food made in imitation of other well-known articles to be branded with their true names, regulating the sales of poisons, and the like, are statutes restricting the rights of an owner in relation to his property, yet such statutes, in so far as they tend reasonably to prevent injury to the public, and frauds among individuals, are uniformly held constitutional. Turning to the act before us, its purpose is plain. It was intended to prevent retail dealers in goods, wares, and merchandise from defrauding their creditors. As such, it is among the undoubted subjects of legislation; and the real question to be considered, therefore, is, Is the act so far an abuse of the power of legislation as to take it out of the rule of due process of law? In our opinion, it is not. It is a general rule that, when the business is a proper subject of police regulation, the legislature may, in the exercise of that power adopt such measures as they see fit to correct the existing abuses, so long as the measures adopted have relation to and a tendency to accomplish the desired end, and violate no direct constitutional provision. This act is within the rule. That it has relation to and will tend to prevent the particular frauds aimed at, cannot be doubted. Nor is there any direct constitutional provision against the enactment of such laws. Whether the act is more harsh than was necessary, or whether it is not the wisest or best that could have been adopted, are legislative questions, with which the courts have nothing to do. It is enough for the court to know that the act is within the legislative power.

It is next said that the act violates that provision of the Constitution which prohibits the legislature from granting to a class of citizens privileges and immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens; in other words, it is class legislation. In Redford v. Spokane Street R. Co. 15 Wash. 419, 46 Pac. 650, we held that where a law is uniform so far as it operates, its constitutionality is not affected by the number of persons within the scope of its operation; and, applying this principle, we held in Fitch v. Applegate, 24 Wash. 25, 64 Pac. 147, that a law giving laborers in certain enumerated industries liens upon the general property of their employers was constitutional. The same principle is applicable to the case in hand. It is true that 60 L. R. A.

the mere fact of classification is insufficient to relieve a statute from the reach of this clause of the Constitution,—that it must appear that the classification is made upon some reasonable and just difference between the persons affected and others, to warrant classification at all; but, applying this test, the act is sufficient. The reason is found in the nature of the business itself. It is well known that the business of retailing goods, wares, and merchandise is conducted largely upon credit and furnishes an opportunity for the commission of frauds upon creditors not usual in other classes of business. In fact, charges of fraud made against retail dealers who have sold their stocks in bulk are among the most common with which the courts are called upon to deal. Legislation, therefore, which restricts the absolute right of persons engaged in such business to transfer their property, so long as it applies alike to all persons engaged therein, is not class legislation, within the meaning of the Constitution, merely because it does not apply to all owners of property. Nor is the act in restraint of trade. It prevents no one from dealing in the usual and ordinary course, nor does it prevent the selling of stocks of goods in bulk. It restricts only the application of the proceeds when stocks are sold in the latter manner. It may be that, because of this, sales in this manner will not be so readily made as formerly; but, if this be so, it is only another case where private desires must yield to the public good, and not one of unconstitutional enactment.

As to the particular provisions of the act, there is, indeed, much that may be criticised, and doubtless certain of its provisions will require construction when attempt is made to work it out in detail. But the former are not so gross as to authorize the courts to declare the law a nullity, and the latter can best be determined when the questions actually arise.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with instructions to proceed with a hearing upon the merits.

APPEAL by the defendant corporation from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stephens & Bunn, for appellant:

There is one duty to the plaintiff, and that is the duty of the master.

A failure to provide a safe place in which a servant shall work is a failure of the master, and of the master alone.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a personal-injury case. On the 2d of January, 1899, the respondent was fireman on train No. 13, a mixed passenger and freight train running from Cheney to Coulee City. On this day a snowplow train had been sent ahead of the passenger train to clear the road and prepare the track for the passenger train, and at a point about 6 miles west of Almira, a station between Cheney and Coulee City, No. 13, upon which respondent was firing the lead engine, ran into the snowplow, and respondent was injured by the collision to such an extent that his leg had to be amputated. Suit for $25,000 damages on account of his injuries was brought by the respondent against the Northern Pacific Railway Company, which was operating the trains above spoken of. Respondent joined as defendants with the railway company Frederick W. Gilbert, who was at the time the superintendent of the division of the railroad upon which plaintiff was working, and A. G. Kamm, who was the chief despatcher employed by the railroad of the division before mentioned. The trial of the cause resulted in a verdict for respondent for $15,000 against the railway company alone, Kamm and Gilbert having been dismissed from the case by the court at the end of all the testimony. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and from such judgment this appeal was taken.

The statement of the case by the appellant is very extensive and minute in detail, but we think we have stated sufficient to settle the propositions necessary for the determination of the cause. The complaint alleged negligence in the company in failure to promulgate and enforce ample and sufficient rules for the running of the trains; failure to provide proper machinery and appliances; in running defective locomotives and engines; that the same were unskillfully equipped, manned, and fitted out; failure to furnish competent servants; an insufficient number of servants; negligently ordering train No. 13 to proceed westerly from Almira station to Coulee City on the night in question; and various other allegations of negligence, and failure on the part of Gilbert and Kamm to prepare, publish, and enforce all necessary rules, regulations, and orders for the running and operation of their trains. A joint demurrer of the defendants was interposed to the complaint on the ground of misjoinder, which was overruled, and on this ruling is based one of the assignments of error. It is contended by the appellant that there is no joint liability between the railway company and the despatcher and the division superintendent; that the master cannot be liable together with any of its employees joined in an action based upon charges of this character; and it is insisted that this court has decided this question in favor of appellant's contention in Doremus v. Root, 23 Wash. 710, 54 L. R. A. 649, 63 Pac. 572. But we do not so understand the decision in that case. There the action, brought against the railroad company and Root, was based exclusively upon the alleged negligence of Root while acting as conductor of one of the railroad company's freight trains, the respondent in that case being fireman and Root conductor on the same train. The jury returned a verdict finding for the plaintiff and against the defendant railroad company, and assessed the damages of the plaintiff at $15,000. After the verdict was read, and before the jury was discharged, the attorney for defendant Root inquired of the court what construction the court would place upon the verdict with respect to defendant Root, and the court ruled that said verdict was, and should be considered as, a verdict in favor of defendant Root. The verdict was then recorded, and the jury discharged. Afterwards a judgment was entered in favor of Root and against the plaintiff for costs, and judgment was finally entered against the railroad company for the amount of the verdict, with costs to the respondent. This court held in that case that, inasmuch as the negligence of the railroad company was alleged to be the negligent action of the servant, and the jury having affirmatively found that the servant was not negligent, it must follow that there was no negligence on the part of the master, the railroad company; and that, as there had been no appeal from the judgment in favor of the servant, the cause could not be retried, and it was, therefore, ordered dismissed. In so far as the decision in this case and the discussion leading up to it are concerned, the particular question involved here was not involved in that case, nor attempted to be decided. If, however, any inference is to be drawn from the decision in that case, it is opposed to appellant's contention, for at the threshold of the case the question of nonjoinder was raised and vigorously discussed in appellant's brief, and, if the court had concluded that the appellant's contention was right on that jurisdictional question, it would not have been necessary to have examined or decided the subsequent point upon which the court's decision was based. On this question, however, there is a square conflict of authority, and we have examined it with reference, not only to the cases which are cited in appellant's brief, but with reference to the cases cited in the brief of the appellants in the case of Doremus v. Root, 23 Wash. 710, 54 L. R. A. 649, 63 Pac. 572. Section 242 of Shearman & Redfield on the Law of Negligence, 5th ed., is cited to support the contention that the master and servant cannot be joined. This and the succeeding section are in reality a discussion of the principle involved in the distinction that has been raised by some courts between the liability of an agent in case of nonfeasance and that of one in case of misfeasance; but in § 248 the rule is thus stated under the title "Joint Liability of Master and Servant:" "Wherever a master can be held responsible for the tortious negligence of his servant, the two are generally held jointly as well as severally liable; and if a servant employs a subagent under such circumstances that both the original master and the intermediate employer are liable for the negligence of the subagent, they are all jointly and severally liable,"—citing several cases, but stating that a different rule prevails in Massachusetts, and probably in Maine. The theory of the cases holding that there cannot be a joint liability is that there is really but one act of negligence; that the negligence can be imputed to the master, not by reason of his being a joint tortfeasor, but by reason of his peculiar relation to his agent; and that public policy holds him responsible for the agent's acts under the doctrine of respondent superior; and it seems that theoretically there may be something in this idea. Many of the cases, however, base their opinions upon the old distinction which we have spoken of between a case of misfeasance and one of nonfeasance, a distinction which this court, in Lough v. John Davis & Co. (Wash.) 59 L. R. A. 802, 70 Pac. 491, held not to be sound, either on reason or on authority. Without specially reviewing the cases on this subject, which are collated in Waras v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 72 Fed. 637, in which the right to join the master and servant is denied, there are cited, as sustaining the affirmative of the proposition: Wright v. Wilcox, 19 Wend. 343, 32 Am. Dec. 507; Suydam v. Moore, 8 Barb. 358; Montfort v. Hughes, 3 E. D. Smith, 591; Phelps v. Wait, 30 N. Y. 78; Wright v. Compton, 53 Ind. 337; Greenberg v. Whitcomb Lumber Co. 90 Wis. 225, 28 L. R. A. 439, 63 N. W. 93; Newman v. Fowler, 37 N. J. L. 89. In support of the view that the master cannot be joined as defendant in an action against his servant for negligence, where the master is not personally concerned in the negligence either by his presence or express direction, the following are cited: Parsons v. Winchell, 5 Cush. 592, 52 Am. Dec. 745; Mulchey v. Methodist Religious Soc. 125 Mass. 487; Clark v. Fry, 8 Ohio St. 358, 72 Am. Dec. 590; Seelen v. Ryan, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 158; Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 553, 16 Am. Rep. 503; Beuttel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 26 Fed. 50; Page v. Parker, 40 N. H. 47; Bailey v. Bussing, 37 Conn. 349. Other cases have been decided since with equally conflicting results. But, without entering into a discussion or an analysis of these conflicting opinions, considering the fact that universal authority will hold responsible in independent actions both the master and the agent or servant whose tortious act is the cause of the injury, and the holding of this court that, as to the liability of the servant or agent, there is no distinction between cases of misfeasance and those of nonfeasance, and in further consideration of the reformed procedure which obtains in this state, we are inclined to hold with those cases which permit the rights of all parties to be determined in one action, thereby discourteous and rendering unnecessary a multiplicity of suits, rather than to compel the plaintiff to pursue and exhaust his remedy against one actor, and then, if compensation cannot be realized for the damage sustained, to proceed against another. We think this view is more in harmony with the spirit of our Code and modern procedure generally. It is therefore held that no error was committed by the court in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the complaint.

The next pertinent claim is that the cause should have been removed to the Federal court upon the application which was made and the bond which was offered when Kamm and Gilbert were dismissed from the case. We do not think this contention can be sustained. It is true, under the authorities, if the application is made seasonably, it should be granted, even though it was not made at the commencement of the trial, as was decided in Powers v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 60 L. R. A.

169 U. S. 92, 42 L. ed. 673, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 264, cited by appellant. In that case, however, the plaintiff discontinued as to the resident defendants when the cause was called for trial; but in the case at bar it was the request of the defendants themselves that brought about their dismissal, in opposition to respondent's contention. This question is distinctly settled in Whitcomb v. Smithson, 175 U. S. 635, 44 L. ed. 303, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 248, a late case, decided in January, 1900, and one which seems to us to be exactly in point. In answer to the proposition urged here, the court in that case said: "This might have been so if, when the cause was called for trial in the state court, plaintiff had discontinued his action against the railway company, and thereby elected to prosecute it against the receivers solely, instead of prosecuting it on the joint cause of action set up in the complaint against all the defendants;" citing Powers v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 169 U. S. 92, 42 L. ed. 673, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 264. "But," said the court, "that is not this case. The joint liability was insisted on here to the close of the trial, and the nonliability of the railway company was ruled in invitum. . . . The case was prosecuted by plaintiff accordingly, and at the close of the evidence a motion was made to instruct the jury to return a verdict in behalf of the railway company because the evidence did not sustain the allegations of the complaint as to the negligence of that defendant, and the court granted the motion on that ground in view of the rules of the company, which it found 'to amply cover all the contingencies arising in the prosecution of the various duties incident to railroad service at the point.' This was a ruling on the merits, and not a ruling on the question of jurisdiction. It was adverse to plaintiff, and without his assent, and the trial court rightly held that it did not operate to make the cause then removable, and thereby to enable the other defendants to prevent plaintiff from taking a verdict against them. The right to remove was not contingent on the aspect the case may have assumed on the facts developed on the merits of the issues tried." We think this case is decisive of the question raised, and that no error was committed by the court in refusing to transfer the case to the Federal court.

We have examined the record in detail, and, although it is voluminous, we have been unable to discover any reversible error, either in the admission or rejection of testimony or in the giving or refusing to give instructions. But even if slight error had crept into some of the proceedings in relation to the proof of negligence, we think, under the theory of the appellant, that it would not have been prejudicial, and that the court would have been justified in instructing the jury that negligence had been proved. It is settled law that a rear-end or head-end collision is prima facie the result of negligence, where the rights of passengers and of railroad companies are in controversy. If any different rule obtains in a litigation between the railroad company and an employee who is injured, it must be upon the theory that the employee is in some way responsible for the negligence, either through contribution on his part or contribution by a fellow servant. It is conceded and asserted in this case that the conductors on both the trains, viz., the passenger train No. 13 and the snowplow train, were guilty of negligence, and that the accident would not have happened had it not been for such negligence. After discussing the rules which provide the duty incumbent upon the conductor to use certain precautions in cases of this kind, and referring to the fact that train No. 13 left Almira only ten minutes after the snowplow train, and the assertion that the officers are charged by the rules with the duty of assuming that another train is coming when their train is delayed; that explosive caps or torpedoes are provided for placing upon the tops of the rails as signals to be used in addition to the regular signals; and many other precautionary provisions,—the appellant says: "It is shown by the record that trains very often lose time or actually have to stop between stations. This has been true ever since railroad trains commenced running, and because of this all trains were equipped, as this snowplow train was equipped, with appliances to protect them ahead and in the rear. These appliances are so effective and so easily used that there is no occasion and no reason for a rear-end collision of this sort, except in the instance where the train crews are wholly negligent and careless in the use of the signals, or in the entire failure to use them. It will be noted that there was no careless or negligent use of the signal appliances which were on this snowplow train. They had the appliances, they had torpedoes, they had fuses, and they had lanterns; but, instead of there being a negligent or careless use of them, they did not use them at all. Any one of these signals would have avoided a collision or accident of this sort. A torpedo placed on the track, even though there be but one, is a signal for any following train to stop until it has burned out. . . . There was a conductor on the train, who could have done these things; there was a rear brakeman on the train, who could have done these things; and every single one of these men knew and must have known that train was losing time from the moment that it left Almira; and every one of these men knew and must have known that a fast-running passenger train was behind them, running in the same direction. It is almost inconceivable under such circumstances, and almost impossible to believe, that these appliances for their protection were not used; but they were not, and thus the injury was caused." Like negligence is attributed by the appellant to the managers of both the snowplow train and the passenger train. This charge must be made upon the theory that the fireman was a fellow servant with the conductor of the train, and that, therefore, the negligence of the conductor was the 60 L. R. A.

negligence of the fireman. We cannot conceive that it is the duty of the fireman to assume or know that the conductor has not done his duty,—a duty so plain and palpable as is charged upon him by the appellant in this case; or that he is to leave his box, and establish a surveillance over the conductor and other operators of the train. Such conduct on his part would not only be unbecoming or intolerable, but, if tolerated, might lead to the gravest results. There must be some one in control of trains of cars while in transit. There must be some directing mind, some particular person in whom responsibility is lodged; and it would lead to most disastrous confusion if the practice obtained to confer responsibility and directing power equally and miscellaneously upon conductors, brakemen, engineers, firemen, and other operators of a railroad. The proof of such a practice would be the strongest proof of negligence. But it may be confidently asserted that no such practice prevails. It is matter of common knowledge that the conductor of a train under ordinary circumstances is the controlling power. His official title indicates it; and the assumption of the master's authority by him, together with the actions of the company towards him, proves it. As was pertinently said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184: "The conductor of a railway train, who commands its movements, directs when it shall start, at what stations it shall stop, at what speed it shall run, and has the general management of it, and control over the persons employed upon it, represents the company; and therefore that, for injuries resulting from his negligent acts, the company is responsible. If such a conductor does not represent the company, then the train is operated without any representative of its owner." But, whatever may be said of the doctrine of fellow servants in other jurisdictions, under the uniform holdings and announcements of this court the fireman on this train cannot be held to be a fellow servant of the conductors on both or either of the trains which collided, and the negligence which led to this collision is proved upon both equally. The negligence of the company was so overwhelmingly proved in many instances in this case that, even if there had been negligence on the part of someone who might be construed to be a fellow servant of the respondent, the appellant would not thereby be relieved of its responsibility. Northern P. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 1 Wash. 599, 21 Pac. 32. It is uniform authority that, if negligence of the master contributes to the injury, he is liable, even though the negligence of a fellow servant was contributory. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cummings, 106 U. S. 700, 27 L. ed. 266, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493. This principle has been uniformly followed by this court, and was again announced in Ralph v. American Bridge Co. (Wash.) 70

Pac. 1098, where it is said: "It is also well settled that, if the negligence of a fellow servant concur with the negligence of the master, it does not excuse the primary negligence of the master for injury to another fellow servant."

An investigation of the whole case convinces us that no substantial error was committed in any respect.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Reavis, Ch. J., and Fullerton and Anders, JJ., concur. Mount, J., being disqualified, did not take part in this decision.

CANADIAN BANK OF COMMERCE,
Appt.,
v.

C. E. BINGHAM, Resp't.

(.....Wash.....)

Payment by the drawee of forged checks made payable to a fictitious person to one who cashed them upon an indorsement purporting to be that of the payee, without requiring identification of the one to whom payment was made, will not prevent his recovering back the money so paid, where he was ignorant of the facts, and relied upon the indorsement of the one who cashed the checks; and the latter will not be placed in a worse position by the recovery than he would have been had the checks not been paid.

(December 20, 1902.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Skagit County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount which had been paid on a check having a worthless indorsement. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Milliom & Houser, for appellant:

In the absence of actual fault or negligence on the part of the drawee bank, its constructive fault in not knowing the signature of the drawer, and detecting the forgery, will not preclude its recovering back the amount, or recalling its certificate as against one who has received the money, or taken the check with knowledge of the forgery; or who took the check under circumstances of suspicion without proper precaution; or whose conduct has been such as to mislead the bank, or to induce payment or certification of the check, without the usual scru-

There is a steady tendency of the modern courts to enlarge, rather than restrict, this rule of law. Many of the authorities seem to hold it sufficient to rest the right to recover on the strength of the prior indorsement of the paying bank, independent of the question of negligence.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff (appellant) is a banking institution doing a general banking business in Seattle. The defendant is a banker doing a general banking business in the town of Sedro-Woolley. The Tyee Logging Company is a logging company operating in Skagit county, and having its principal place of business near Sedro-Woolley, the place of business of defendant, and a patron and depositor of plaintiff, upon whom its checks were from time to time drawn in the course of its business. On the 9th of September, 1901, some unknown person issued seven certain checks in the name of the Tyee Logging Company, on plaintiff, all made payable to fictitious persons, and aggregating the total sum of $429.85. The checks so issued were forgeries, written out on the regular blank checks of the Tyee Logging Company. Some time between the 9th and 11th days of September, 1901, said checks were presented by some one unknown (presumably the person who committed the forgeries) to defendant at his banking house in Sedro-Woolley, and were by him cashed after being indorsed by the person presenting the same, in the name of the fictitious payee. Thereafter said checks were duly indorsed by defendant, and presented to plaintiff at its banking house in Seattle, and were by it paid in ignorance of the fictitious indorsements and of the same having been forged. On the same being presented to the Tyee Logging Company, they were repudiated as forgeries, whereupon demand was made by plaintiff upon defendant for the amount so paid out on said checks, and, payment being refused, this action was brought to recover the same. To plaintiff's complaint, defendant interposed a demurrer challenging the sufficiency of the allegations therein contained to state a cause of action, which demurrer was by the court sustained; and, plaintiff electing to stand upon its complaint, judgment was entered in favor of defendant, dismissing plaintiff's action, from which plaintiff appeals to this court.

The ground of error is the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint and in dismissing the action. The two essential allegations of the complaint are as follows: "That at the time of the payment of said check this plaintiff was without knowledge or notice that the same had been forged, and without knowing that the indorsement thereon of the said name thereon, as the same appeared upon said check, was not genuine, but believing that said check had been regularly issued by the said Tyee Logging Company, and believing that the same had been properly indorsed by the owner and holder thereof, and relying upon the subsequent indorsements thereon of the defendant, did pay the said check as 60 L. R. A.

aforsaid." "That at the time of the cashing of said check by the defendant, he was guilty of negligence, in this: that he failed and neglected to have the holder and the person in whose possession said check was at the time of presentation for payment as aforesaid properly identified, or identified at all, and he failed in any manner to use reasonable diligence or care to ascertain whether or not said person so presenting said check was the owner thereof, or was the person named in said check as payee, or was the identical person to whom said check was issued, or to whom it purported to be issued, or that he had any lawful authority, or any authority whatever, to indorse said check, or that he was the lawful holder thereof; that, had defendant used any care or caution, he would have easily discovered that said check was a forgery."

The respondent relies upon the general doctrine that the drawee bank is bound to know the signature of its own depositor, and that, having failed to detect the forgery, and having paid the money on the check, which was presented by the paying bank, it was estopped from recovering back the money so paid. While the appellant concedes the general law to be as so stated, it insists that there is a well-defined exception to the general rule, viz., that, if it appears that the one to whom payment was made was not an innocent sufferer, but was guilty of negligence in not doing something which plain duty demanded, and which, if it had been done, no loss would have been entailed upon anyone, he is not entitled to retain the moneys paid through a mistake on the part of the drawee bank. We think that this exception must be sustained, and that it has a proper application to the allegations of the complaint. There are several principles of law to be considered in the discussion of this case. One is, as is contended by respondent, that a bank is supposed to know the signatures of its depositors, and that constructive negligence is imputed to it if it pays money on checks over the forged signature of its depositor. This rule, however, must be considered in connection with a second well-established rule of law, that money paid through a mistake can be recovered back, and also of a third universal rule, that the transfer of stolen property conveys no title, and that each successive purchaser has recourse upon the party from whom he purchased, because, the consideration for the transaction having failed, and nothing having been conveyed, the contract is void, and the party, having received money for nothing, has no right to retain it. Neither of these rules must be invoked to the entire exclusion of the others, but each is frequently modified by another. Thus, while it is true that constructive negligence is imputed to the bank which pays out money on a check over the forged signature of its depositor, it is also true that it received nothing of value for the money paid for the check, and that no title to the check was transferred by the paying bank. In such a case it might appropriately be said that the doctrine of com parative negligence applies, and that the constructive negligence of the drawee bank was overcome by the active negligence of the paying bank in not using the ordinary precautions which are used by banks, viz., demanding an identification of the person presenting the check, and putting forth some inquiry as to its genuineness before paying it and sending it on, dignified and accredited by its own indorsement, which would tend to lull the suspicious and abate the watchfulness of the drawee bank. In such case, it seems to us, the original and potent negligence which caused the loss to fall on one of two innocent persons should be imputed to the paying bank. Unquestionably the loss would have been its if the drawee bank had recognized the forgery and refused to honor the check. Why should the mere accident, occurring afterwards, of the bank failing to detect the forgery, permit it to shift the loss, which had already been entailed on it, to another? If the delay of the drawee bank in not promptly reporting the forgery had been the means of preventing the payee bank from obtaining recourse on the forgers, and placing it in a worse position than it would have been in if payment had been refused, that would be a question worthy of consideration, but is not a question involved in this case. Certainly the governing principle upon which the respondent is entitled to retain the appellant's money, if he is so entitled, is that by the action of the appellant he has been prevented from recovering the money out of which he had been defrauded by the forger before the appellant had taken any action in the premises, or, stated affirmatively, that he has been prejudiced by the action of the appellant in paying the check instead of allowing it to go to protest. This is in harmony with the undisputed rule that a drawer or maker of a check, who is deceived by a forgery of his own signature, may recover the payment back, unless his mistake has placed an innocent holder of the paper in a worse position than he would have been in if the discovery of the forgery had been made on presentation, and with the rule that allows the maker of a note, who pays it over his own forged signature, to recover, from the person who received it, for money paid by mistake, unless his negligence has caused loss to an innocent purchaser. There are no arbitrary rules of law governing these cases, and none are contended for. There is no reason why there should be in the case at bar. It is stated in many of the authorities that there is a great conflict of authority on this question, but an investigation leads us to the conclusion that this conflict is more seeming than real; for, while the language of several of the earlier cases gives some color to respondent's contention, and while the general rule is that a bank is responsible for a knowledge of its depositor's signature, and this is asserted in some of the cases with something of vehemence, the language of an opinion must always be construed with reference to the circumstances of the case; and, so construing the cases cited by the appellant, and all other cases which our independent investigation has been able to collate, they have, with few, if any, exceptions, gone beyond the establishment of the general principle above announced, without attempting to deny the exceptions contended for by appellant, and many of them openly indorse such exceptions.

The case upon which the doctrine contended for by respondent is founded, and which is universally quoted in support of such rule, is an old English case,—Price v. Neale, decided by Lord Mansfield and reported in 3 Burr. at page 1354. This case seems to have attracted some attention from the fact that Lord Mansfield stopped the attorney who was arguing the case, with the remark that the case could not be made plainer by argument. This was an action for money had and received, brought by Price against Neale. In this case two bills had been forged and paid, as in the case at bar. There is a meager statement of the case, and a still more meager argument by the court. One of the bills, it seems, had been accepted by the drawee before it had been bought by the defendant, and the court remarks: "The plaintiff lies by for a considerable time after he has paid these bills, and then found out 'that they were forged,' and the forger comes to be hanged. He made no objection to them at the time of paying them. Whatever neglect there was, was on his side. The defendant had actually encouragement from the plaintiff himself for negotiating the second bill, from the plaintiff's having, without any scruple or hesitation, paid the first; and he paid the whole value, bona fide. It is a misfortune which has happened without the defendant's fault or neglect. If there was no neglect in the plaintiff, yet there is no reason to throw off the loss from one innocent man upon another innocent man; but in this case, if there was any fault or negligence in anyone, it certainly was in the plaintiff, and not in the defendant." It will be seen that, even in this case, while stating the general doctrine that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to be satisfied that the signatures were not forgeries, it is expressly stated that there was no fault or negligence on the part of the defendant, who paid the bills, while the complaint in the case at bar alleges, not only general negligence, but specific negligence, to the effect that the paying respondent failed and neglected to have the holder and the person in whose possession the check was at the time of presentation for payment properly identified, or identified at all, outside of the other allegations that, had he used any care or caution, he would have easily discovered that the check was a forgery. So that, construing this opinion in accordance with the rule above announced, viz., with reference to the circumstances of the case, it can scarcely be said to be an authority in favor of sustaining the demurrer to this complaint. One of the cases cited by the respondent, viz., Deposit Bank v. Fayette Nat. Bank, 90 Ky. 10, 7 L. R. A. 849, 13 S. W. 339, decided that where forged checks on a bank, purporting to be drawn in the name of one of its principal depositors, and running through a period of five months before the forgery is discovered, are accepted and paid by the drawee bank to other banks, which accept and pay them in good faith after inquiry of the drawee as to the depositor's account, the drawee bank must stand the loss. After quoting from Lord Mansfield's opinion, supra, and stating that the doctrine had never been departed from, the court recognized the exception contended for by appellant as follows: "Nor is it just to say that the rule adopted, requiring the bank to know the signature of its depositor, is without an exception; for it is undoubtedly true that the neglect or knowledge of intervening parties who come into the possession of the check, and receive the money on it from the bank where it is payable, will in some instances be of such a character as to enable the bank to recover back the money." That case was distinguished from the cases maintaining the exception to the rule, and was decided upon the circumstances surrounding it, viz., that, as the court said: "These checks were continued to be paid during a period of near five months before the forgery was discovered,—a fact, it seems to us, that should be decisive of this case." It is true that Edwards, Bills, Notes, & Neg. Inst. § 272, announces the rule in Price v. Neale, 3 Burr. 1354, accrediting that case as the foundation of the text, but, recognizing the distinction for which we are contending, says, in § 276: "It is now settled, both in England and in this country, that money paid under a mistake of fact may be recovered, however negligent the party paying may have been in making the mistake, unless the payment has caused such a change in the position of the other party that it would be unjust to require him to refund." It will be found that, in all cases where repayment has been refused, it has been on the ground, either that no negligence at all by the paying party has been shown, or that the payment by the drawee bank had placed the paying party in a worse position than he would have been had the payment been refused. Another case cited,—First Nat. Bank v. Marshalltown State Bank, 107 Iowa, 327, 44 L. R. A. 131, 77 N. W. 1045,—after announcing the general rule, says: "The rule, however, has one qualification, introduced by some cases, and which we feel inclined to adopt. When the holder of the check has been negligent in not making due inquiry, if the circumstances were such as to demand an inquiry when he took the check, the drawee may recover." It would seem that the remark of the court was pertinent to the case at bar, for certainly it is the duty and the ordinary rule of banks, when dealing with strangers, in the payment of checks presented by them, to demand at least an identification. Redington v. Woods, 45 Cal. 406, 13 Am. Rep. 190, announces the rule that the drawee of a check is bound, at his peril, to know the handwriting of the drawer, and that, if he pay a check in which the signature of the drawer had been forged, he must suffer the loss, as between himself and the drawer or an innocent holder to whom he has made payment. That was the case of a raised check, and is not pertinent to the discussion of the case at bar. Levy v. Bank of United States, 4 Dall. 234, 1 L. ed. 814, does not seem to us to be in point. National Park Bank v. Ninth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 77, 7 Am. Rep. 310, is simply an announcement of the general rule, relying upon the case of Price v. Neale, 3 Burr. 1354; Germania Bank v. Boutell, 60 Minn. 189, 27 L. R. A. 635, 62 N. W. 327, which is asserted by the respondent to be a case in point, it seems to us is not in point, so far as the circumstances of the two cases are concerned, for there the paying bank took the precaution which the court says any prudent bank would take,—to have the payee identified and the check indorsed by a responsible person. It is the allegation of the complaint in this case that the failure of the respondent to have the payee identified was an act of imprudence and negligence, and the case cited sustains this contention, in asserting that any prudent bank would have taken that precaution. So, with all the cases we have been able to find, there are none that have gone so far as to hold that, where the paying bank had been guilty of such negligence as failing to have the payee identified, or failing to make any inquiries in regard to the genuineness of the check, when presented by an absolute stranger, it could retain moneys which had been paid by the drawee bank through an inadvertence or mistake in failing to detect the forgery of the depositor's signature. But the authorities affirmatively sustaining the exception to the general rule speak with no uncertain sound. In Ellis v. Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. 4 Ohio St. 628, 64 Am. Dec. 610, the court, after mentioning the general rule, holds: "But this exception does not apply when, either by express agreement or a settled course of business between the parties, or by a general custom in the place, and applicable to the business in which both parties are engaged, the holder takes upon himself the duty of exercising some material precaution to prevent the fraud, and, by his negligent failure to perform it, has contributed to induce the payee to act upon the paper as genuine, and to advance the money upon it." The exception spoken of by the court there was the exception to the rule that money paid under a mistake of facts and without consideration may, as a general rule, be recovered back. In this case the respondent did not exercise the material precaution to prevent the fraud which the court, in Germania Bank v. Boutell, 60 Minn. 189, 27 L. R. A. 635, 62 N. W. 327, said that any prudent bank would exercise. "Nor," said the court in Ellis v. Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. "does it apply in any case where the parties are in a mutual fault, or where the money is paid upon a mistake of facts, in respect to which both were bound to inquire." In National Bank v. Bangs, 106 Mass. 441, 8 Am. Rep. 349, it was held that the responsibility of a drawee, who pays a forged check, for the genuineness of the forged signature, is absolute only in favor of one who has not by his own fault or negligence contributed to the success of the fraud or to mislead the drawee; and if the payee took the check, drawn payable to his order, from a stranger or other third person, without inquiry, although in good faith and for value, and gave it currency and credit by indorsing it before receiving payment of it, the drawee may recover back the money paid. The court cited Price v. Neale, 3 Burr. 1354, in support of the general doctrine therein declared, but stated: "But this responsibility, based upon presumption alone, is decisive only when the party receiving the money has in no way contributed to the success of the fraud, or to the mistake of fact under which the payment was made;" citing Gloucester Bank v. Salem Bank, 17 Mass. 33, to the effect that, if the loss can be traced to the fault or negligence of either party, it shall be fixed upon him.

The confusion which has crept into the decisions of the courts is based upon the fact that the responsibility is an absolute responsibility, instead of a presumption of negligence which may be overcome. If this doctrine is carried to its legitimate conclusion, a case might arise where the forger was so skilful that no expert would be able to detect it, and yet the paying bank might, under circumstances showing indisputable negligence and carelessness in the purchasing of such check, shift the loss which its negligence brought upon it on to an innocent party, upon the theory that the rule was ironclad and absolute, instead of being a presumption alone. In Third Nat. Bank v. Allen, 59 Mo. 312, a bank, having paid to a stranger a check drawn upon a sister bank, collected from the latter the amount of the check. The paper turned out to have been forged, and, at the time of the payment, neither bank was aware of, or had reason to suspect, the fact. Next day the paying bank ascertained the forgery, and on that day or the succeeding day notified the other bank of the fact. It was held that the notification was given in reasonable time, and that the money could be recovered back. In People's Bank v. Franklin Bank, 88 Tenn. 299, 6 L. R. A. 724, 12 S. W. 716, it was held that where a bank had negligently cashed a forged check purporting to be drawn upon another bank, and had, upon its indorsement of that check, received payment of the drawee bank, it was liable to the latter bank for the amount received, upon subsequent discovery that the check was forged. In that case the defendant answered, admitting that it received and cashed the check, and stating that it was unable to furnish the name of the party or parties by whom the check had been presented and to whom it had been paid; presumed that it required identification, but of this it was not certain. In the discussion of the case, it was said: "Notwithstanding some conflict of authority upon the subject, a careful investigation of the adjudged cases and of the textbooks leads us to the conclusion that the bank can recover of a party to whom payment is made on a forged check, indorsed by the party to whom paid, where the party to whom paid has been guilty of negligence in receiving and indorsing the check." First Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 151 Mass. 280, 24 N. E. 44, seems to be a case directly in point. There a forged check, purporting to be drawn upon a bank by a firm which was one of its customers, was made payable to a payee named, or bearer. Another bank, of which the firm was not a customer, when the check was presented to it by an unknown person, without attempting to identify him, and upon his indorsing it in the payee's name, cashed it, and was credited with the amount as money by the drawee. The drawee negligently failed to discover the forgery for a month or two, but then immediately notified the bank cashing the check, which was not prejudiced by the delay. Held, that the bank cashing the check must bear the loss. The opinion in this case is written by Devens, J., who, after noticing the general rule which we have discussed, said: "This presumption is conclusive only when the party receiving the money has in no way contributed to the success of the fraud or the mistake of fact under which the payment has been made. In the absence of actual fault on the part of the drawee, his constructive fault in not knowing the signature of the drawer and detecting the forgery will not preclude his recovery from one who took the check under circumstances of suspicion, without proper precaution, or whose conduct has been such as to mislead the drawee, or induce him to pay the check without the usual security against fraud." "The bank is bound to know the signature of its depositor, and, if it pays out money on a forged check, it cannot charge the depositor with the amount, but, as against him, must bear the loss itself. Where, however, the loss can be traced to the fault or negligence of the drawer (or holder), it will be fixed upon him." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 222, 223. "But on the other hand, it may be observed that the holder who obtained payment cannot be considered as having altogether shown sufficient circumspection. He might, before he discounted or received the instrument in payment, have made more inquiries as to the signatures and genuineness of the instrument,—even of the drawer or indorsers themselves; and, if he thought fit to rely on the bare representation of the party from whom he took it, there is no reason that he should profit by the accidental payment, when the loss had already attached upon himself, and why he should be allowed to retain the money, when by an immediate notice of the forgery he is enabled to proceed against all other parties precisely the same as if the payment had not been made, and consequently the payment to him has not in the least altered his situation, or occasioned any delay or prejudice. It seems that of late, upon questions of this nature, these latter considerations have influenced the court in determining whether or not the money shall be recoverable back; and it will be found, on examining the older cases, that there were facts affording a distinction, and that, upon attempting to reconcile, they are not so contradictory as might on first view have been supposed." Chitty, Bills, p. 431. Dan. Neg. Inst. p. 684, under the title, "Exceptions to the rule holding bank responsible when it pays forged checks," says: "Even where the general doctrine that the bank has no remedy, where it has certified or paid a forged check, against the holder, is recognized as a fixed principle of law, there are some exceptions which are insisted upon as reasonable and just. As the responsibility of the bank is based upon the presumption that it has greater means and better opportunities to become familiar with the handwriting of depositors than are afforded the holder, it is declared to be decisive alone when the party holding the check has in no way contributed to the success of the fraud. And if the loss can be traced to the fault or negligence of any party, it will be fixed upon him. In the absence of actual fault or negligence on the part of the drawee bank, its constructive fault in not knowing the signature of the drawer, and detecting the forgery, will not preclude its recovering back the amount, or recalling its certificate, as against one who has received the money or taken the check with knowledge of the forgery, or who took the check under circumstances of suspicion without proper precaution, or whose conduct has been such as to mislead the bank, or to induce payment or certification of the check without the usual scrutiny or precautions, against mistake or fraud." Mr. Morse, in his work on Banks and Banking, 3d ed., § 464, under the title, "The old rule 60 L. R. A.

unreasonable," says: "The old doctrine was that a bank was bound to know its correspondent's signature. A drawee could not recover money paid upon a forgery of the drawer's name, because, it was said, the drawee was negligent not to know the forgery, and it must bear the consequences of its negligence. This doctrine is fast fading into the misty past, where it belongs, . . . for it was founded in misconception of the fundamental principles of law and common sense." In § 466 the same author says: "But it follows, obviously, that, if the payee, holder, or presenter of the forged paper has himself been in default, if he has himself been guilty of a negligence prior to that of the banker, or if by any act of his own he has at all contributed to induce the banker's negligence, then he may lose his right to cast the loss upon the banker." Many of the cases go so far as to hold that the indorsement of a check by a purchasing bank is a warranty of the genuineness of the check, and that the drawee bank can recover back the money paid on such check. We are not able, however, to say that such is the weight of authority; but the overwhelming weight of (if not universal) authority undoubtedly sustains the right of the drawee bank to recover back money paid upon a forged check under the circumstances shown by the allegations of the complaint in this case.

The judgment will be reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

A statute requiring every railroad company to drain off the water accumulating along its right of way from the construction of the road, without regard to whether such water is detrimental to the public health and welfare or injurious to contiguous lands, and providing that, if any company, after due notice, fails to comply with the statute, a proper ditch may be constructed by the public authorities upon petition of any owner or tenant of land contiguous to the road feeling himself aggrieved, and the cost assessed upon the railroad company, is held to be unconstitutional as a taking of private property for private use. (Ohio) 525.

Requiring an owner of property, who has made and filed a valid contract for the placing of a building thereon, under which, by the terms of the statute, the entire contract price may be applied to the claims of laborers and material men, to furnish a bond which will make him liable to them in an additional amount in case their claims are not satisfied by the contractor, is held to be unconstitutional. (Cal.) 815.

A statute forbidding the purchase of a stock of goods in bulk without ascertaining the seller's creditors, and having their claims settled, is held not to deprive the seller of his property without due process of law, and not to be void as class legislation, or as in restraint of trade. (Wash.) 947.

Amending unconstitutional statute.

A statute so framed as to be wholly or in part unconstitutional, but having a title expressing a constitutional object, is held to be capable, by amendatory legislation, of being rendered constitutional, without having recourse to an enactment independent throughout its provisions. (N. J. Err. & App.) 564.

Municipal corporations; ordinances.

The authority of a municipal corporation to provide fuel for paupers is sustained, but the right of the legislature to empower it to buy and sell fuel in competition with private enterprise is denied, although it is scarce and high in price, and the cost to 60 L. R. A.

consumers may be thereby reduced, unless there is such a scarcity as to create a general and wide-spread distress in the community, which cannot be met by private enterprise. (Mass.) 592.

General charter authority to define nuisances is held not to empower a municipal corporation to declare anything a nuisance per se which in fact was not recognized as such by common law. (Ind.) 831.

An ordinance subjecting one in possession of premises on which liquor is sold, disposed of, obtained, or furnished in violation of law, to fine, whether the act is with his knowledge or consent or not, is held to violate a constitutional provision that absolute and arbitrary power over the lives, liberty, and property of freemen exists nowhere in the republic. (Ky.) 723.

A municipal corporation is held to have power to stipulate as to the maximum rates to be charged by a gas company when allowing it to lay pipes in the streets, under a statute giving it exclusive power over its streets, highways, and alleys. (Ind.) 822.

An ordinance requiring the closing of stores at 7:30 P. M. excepting Saturday night, is held not to be authorized by general charter authority to make by-laws, rules, and regulations for preserving the health of the citizens, and such as are deemed necessary for the better government of the town. (N. C.) 634.

An ordinance limiting the speed of trains of an interstate railway which carries United States mail to 10 miles an hour within the corporate limits of the municipality, which is passed for the safety of the public and the protection of life and property, is held not to be void as imposing an unreasonable restriction upon interstate commerce and the speedy transportation of the mail. (Ill.) 391.

Bankruptcy.

Since the national bankruptcy law contains no provision for involuntary proceedings against persons engaged chiefly in the tillage of the soil, it is held that it does not supersede the provision of the state law authorizing such proceedings. (Md.) 577.

Persons negotiating for the sale and purchase of goods are held not to occupy a fiduciary relation toward each other within the meaning of the section of the bankruptcy act of 1898 which prevents a release from affecting debts created by fraud while acting in any fiduciary capacity, so as to prevent the release from being operative in case the goods were obtained by the purchaser through fraud and false representations. (Mo.) 885.

Executors and administrators.

The allowance of $455 out of an undertaker's bill for $526 for the burial of an aged janitor, whose companions were laboring men, and whose most intimate friend was a street sweeper, and whose estate was less than $5,000, is held to be excessive. (Iowa) 571.

Anti-trust act.

A combination of the manufacturers of a product of a state, the market for four fifths of which is found in other states, to limit production and raise the price, is held to be a violation of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890. (C. C. App. 9th C.) 152.

Drains.

Requiring citizens to become members of drainage districts, and share the expense of drainage, against their wills, is held not to make a drainage law unconstitutional. (Mo.) 190.

Power to condemn property injured by a sewer system for a temporary period necessary to perfect some other method of disposing of the sewage is held not to be conferred by general authority to construct sewers and acquire by eminent domain the property necessary for that purpose. (Conn.) 211.

A statute providing for the drainage of wet and overflowed lands in certain cases is held not to be unconstitutional merely because it fails to declare expressly that it was enacted in the interests of the public welfare, and does not expressly make it the duty of the county commissioners, in whom is vested authority to construct drains and sewers when they find the same to be necessary, to determine whether the proposed ditch will be a public benefit. (Minn.) 161.

Carriers.

A statute providing that, when freight which has been shipped, to be conveyed by two or more carriers to its destination under a contract by which the responsibility of one carrier ceases on delivery to the next in good order, has been lost, damaged, or destroyed, it shall be the duty of the initial or connecting carrier, on application, to trace such freight within thirty days after the application, and inform the applicant, in writing, as to the time, place, and manner of the loss or injury, and the names of the parties by whom the truth of the facts can be established; and making a carrier who fails to trace the freight and give such information within the prescribed time liable for the value of the freight,—is held not to be unreasonable or unconstitutional. (Ga.) 817.

Public improvements.

A provision in a street paving contract requiring the contractor to maintain the work for a period during which such pavement, if properly made, ought to wear, is held to place no illegal burden on abutting property owners, who are required to bear the original cost of the paving, although the duty to repair pavements is, by statute, placed on the city at large. (N. Y.) 768.

Homestead.

The right of a man to convey or encumber his homestead without the co-operation of his wife, as allowed by law, is held to be a vested one, which the legislature cannot destroy, notwithstanding it may be defeated by the filing by the wife of a claim as prescribed by statute. (Mo.) 880.

Schools.

The natural right of parental dominion is held not to render unconstitutional a statute requiring children to be sent to school. (N. H.) 739.

Militia.

A statute requiring the board of county commissioners in each county in which there is a company or battery of state troops to provide each company or battery with an armory for its meetings, drills, etc., is held to be unconstitutional and void. (Fla.) 539.

Courts.

The right of the court to prohibit the publication of testimony taken in a trial in which no obscenity is involved is denied where the Constitution guarantees a public trial and the liberty of the press. (Tex. Crim. App.) 631.

Master and servant.

A statute making a railroad company liable for injuries to servants through the negligence of fellow servants is held not to violate the equality clause of the Federal Constitution, although it does not confine such liability to acts performed in the operation of trains, but extends it to risks similar to those incurred by the employees of persons or corporations engaged in other lines of work. (Mo.) 249.

Sunday.

Forbidding a barber to exercise his trade on Sunday, is held to be a proper exercise of the police power, and not to restrain him unconstitutionally of personal liberty, or deprive him of liberty or property without due process of law. (Utah) 468.

Whether the pumping of an oil well on Sunday is a work of necessity within the meaning of a Sunday law is held to be a question for the jury, where the evidence is conflicting as to the injury which will be caused by not pumping it. (W. Va.) 638.

The hearing of charges against a member of a benefit society, and expelling him from membership because of violation of the rules, are held not to be a judicial proceeding within the rule which forbids such proceedings on Sunday. (R. I.) 626.

Taxes.

The constitutional requirement of uniformity and equality in taxation is held not to be violated by taxing shares of stock in foreign corporations and exempting those in domestic corporations, whose property is taxed within the state. (Mich.) 321.

Shares in a joint-stock association are held to be properly dealt with as personality in applying the laws providing a transfer or succession tax, although the property of the association is real estate. (N. Y.) 476.

The use of property in the business of interstate commerce is held not to exempt it from liability to taxation like other property within the jurisdiction in which it is situated. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 641.

A waterworks plant owned and operated by a city is held to be exempt from taxation, and the fact that water is furnished by the city to citizens and other consumers at prescribed rentals is held not to affect the exemption. (Kan.) 850.

The fact that a telegraph line is engaged in interstate commerce is held not to prevent a state tax on the value of that portion of the property which is within the state, although the value of the whole line as a unit is taken into account in fixing such value. (Ind.) 671.

The right of corporations to consolidate is held to be a grant of a corporate franchise subject to Miss. Const. § 180, so that any exemption of one of the old companies from taxation is cut off, although § 181 provides for the continuation of exemptions to which corporations "are legally entitled" at the adoption of the Constitution, and § 279 of the schedule provides for the continuation of rights and charters of corporations. (Miss.) 33.

Smuggling.

The attempted smuggling of goods into the United States is held to justify their forfeiture, as against the claims of one from whom they were obtained by the smuggler by a fraudulent purchase, which remains unrescinded. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 595.

Attempt.

A statute making the penalty for attempt one half that prescribed for the commission of the offense is held to be void for uncertainty in cases where the penalty for the offense is imprisonment for life. (Cal.) 270.

Street railways.

Purchasing the consent of abutting owners to the construction of a street railroad in a city street is held not to be contrary to public policy. (Ohio) 531.

Redemption of pay checks.

An act requiring the redemption in money of checks issued in payment of assigned wages, which is applicable only to merchants on the one hand and coal miners on the other, is held to be void as class legislation. (Ind.) 308.

Eminent domain.

Authority to condemn the right to construct a telegraph line along a railroad right of way is held to be conferred by a statute permitting the condemnation of any lands, whether owned by private persons in fee or in any less estate, or by any corporation, whether acquired by purchase or by virtue of any provision in the charter of such corporation. (Tex.) 145.

A reservoir company is held to have no power to take, by right of eminent domain, land devoted to the purposes of a railroad, unless such taking is required by public necessity; and the facts that the site is the only available one on the stream, and that the railroad company might procure an equally available location for its purposes elsewhere, are held to be immaterial. (Colo.) 383.

The financial returns which a water plant can be made to bear are held to be necessarily considered in determining the value of the franchises of its owner when taken by right of eminent domain. (Me.) 856.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Contracts; validity; consideration.

An agreement between parties to a contract that neither shall maintain a suit thereon after breach, all differences to be settled by arbitration, is held to be without binding force, as tending to oust the courts of their jurisdiction. (Neb.) 436.

A contract between an attorney at law and one who is not such an attorney, by which the latter agrees to procure the employment of the former by third persons for the prosecution of suits in courts of record, and to assist in looking after and procuring witnesses whose testimony is to be used in the cases, in consideration of a share of the fees which the attorney shall receive, is held to be against public policy, and void. (Neb.) 429.

A clause in a contract for a tour to conduct entertainments, the performance of which will extend into several countries, that suits upon it shall be brought in the 60 L. R. A. country where the contracting parties are domiciled, is held to be valid, and enforceable by the courts of other countries. (Mass.) 812.

The naming of a child for promisor in accordance with his previous request is held to be a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise to convey to the child a particular tract of land because of such act. (Iowa) 840.

Bills and notes.

A promissory note is held not to be rendered nonnegotiable by an agreement to pay the sum named "with exchange" on a point other than that at which it is payable. (Neb.) 434.

Notice of dishonor of a promissory note is held to be sufficient if sent to the last indorser by the first mail of the day following dishonor, even though such indorser is an agent for collection merely. (Neb.) 431.

The amount of a note given for medical services by an unlicensed practitioner is held to be recoverable by a bona fide purchaser, notwithstanding the provisions of a statute prohibiting the practice of medicine without a license. (Neb.) 737.

A promissory note payable at a future day to an incorporated charitable educational institution dependent, for the most part, on voluntary contributions for its support, the amount thereof to form, by itself, or with other similar contributions, a permanent endowment fund for such institution, which is accepted by the board of directors, and, in reliance upon which, such institution continues its work and incurs debts and obligations, and solicits subscriptions from others, is held to be supported by a sufficient consideration, and not to be revoked by the maker's death before its maturity. (Minn.) 870.

Banks.

Payment by the drawee of forged checks made payable to a fictitious person, to one who cashed them upon an indorsement purporting to be that of the payee, without requiring identification of the one to whom payment was made, is held not to prevent his recovering back the money so paid, where he was ignorant of the facts, and relied upon the indorsement of the one who cashed the checks; and the latter will not be placed in a worse position by the recovery than he would have been had the checks not been paid. (Wash.) 955.

Landlord and tenant.

An option to renew a lease in accordance with the terms of the instrument giving the lessee the privilege of renewal is held to be exercised, so as to be binding on the lessee, by the statement of his authorized agent, shortly before the expiration of the term, that the lease will be renewed, on the faith of which the landlord makes improvements which he is under no obligations to make, followed by the assurance of the agent of intention to remain, and that no written renewal is necessary, when pressed for such writing after the expiration of the term, and while the lessee is still in possession. (Iowa) 399.

A landlord who leases a building in separate sections is held to be under no implied obligation to keep the portion remaining in his possession in repair, so that damages resulting to property through breach of it can be set up as a counterclaim in an action for rent. (Wis.) 585.

Insurance.

Carrying a loaded gun from one room of a house, in which it had been left by another person, to an adjoining room, is held to be "handling firearms" within the meaning of a clause in an accident insurance policy limiting to $500 the recovery for any injury received while hunting, or while using or handling loaded firearms. (Neb.) 424.

After-born children of a subsequent marriage are held to be entitled to share in the benefit of a policy of life insurance taken 60 L. R. A.

for the benefit of the children of the insured. (N. C.) 615.

In distributing the loss upon a building, machinery, and stock between insurance policies covering all the items for a gross sum and those specifically liable on each item, all of which provided that the liability should not be greater "than the amount hereby insured shall bear to the whole insurance," it is held that the blanket policies should be regarded as insuring each item to the entire amount unappropriated when it is reached, making the adjustment item by item in the order of greatest loss, if that will work substantial equity and justice to all concerned, and deducting the sums appropriated to the respective items as they are adjusted and passed. (Conn.) 536.

Receiving the premium after the destruction of all the insured property, so that nothing remains to which insurance might attach, is held to waive a provision in a policy that the insurer shall not be liable for a loss occurring before payment of the premium. (Neb.) 918.

The breaking of a plate-glass window by the explosion of gas generated by the use of gasoline to clean clothes is held not to be caused by the blowing up of the building, within the meaning of an insurance policy thereon, which exempts the insurer from loss caused by the blowing up of buildings. (Iowa) 838.

Carriers; baggage.

Only what a passenger takes with him for his own personal use and convenience is held to be within the meaning of a statute requiring carriers to check baggage. (Ky.) 846.

Chattel mortgages.

A stipulation in a chattel mortgage authorizing the mortgagee to take possession of the mortgaged property upon failure of the mortgagor to make payments secured thereby is held not to be contrary to public policy, and to authorize the mortgagee to take peaceable possession of the property, even against the will of the mortgagor. (Tex.) 143.

A mortgage executed in the name of a third person, on chattels not yet acquired by the mortgagor, which does not purport to cover after-acquired property, is held not to bind such property as against a mortgage to another person, executed by the mortgagor in his own name after the property has come into his possession. (Mo.) 256.

Where a hotel building is affixed to land, and is held and conveyed with the land upon which it stands as real estate, it is held that it cannot thereafter, by mere agreement of the parties, become a chattel or personal property, and be legally encumbered by a chattel mortgage, until after its severance from the land. (Idaho) 283.

Sale of good will.

One who sells a trade, good will, and business, covenanting to warrant and defend the same, is held to have no right, after resuming business, to solicit trade from his former customers to the injury of the buyer. (Ill.) 291.

(CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.—DOMESTIC RELATIONS.)

Warranty.

One who purchases from the manufacturer an emery wheel, upon which the manufacturer has placed a placard warranting the speed capacity of the wheel, and who sells it in the same condition as when received from the manufacturer, but without any express representation as to its capacity, is held not to adopt the warranty of the manufacturer as his own by such sale. (Minn.) 311.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

A holder of stock in a national bank who, without knowledge or suspicion that the bank is insolvent or is likely to prove so, sells the stock, and who does everything reasonably possible to procure a transfer of the shares on the books of the bank, is held not to be liable as a stockholder, although the bank is declared insolvent before the transfer is effected, and both the bank and the purchaser were insolvent when the sale was made. (C. C. App. 3d C.) 266.

Corporations.

All the stockholders of a corporation whose by-laws, adopted by the stockholders in pursuance of authority given by the act of incorporation, provide that a majority vote at a stockholders' meeting shall be binding on the corporation, are held to be bound by all acts and proceedings within the scope of the power and authority conferred by the charter, which are approved and sanctioned by the vote of a majority of the stockholders, duly taken and ascertained according to law. (N. J. Err. & App.) 742.

Stockholders who have acquired their shares and their interests in the corporation from alleged wrongdoers, and through prior mismanagement, are held to have no standing to complain thereof. (Neb.) 927.

Camp-meeting association.

Power to adopt a regulation requiring lessees of lots to purchase all supplies from the lessor is held not to be reserved to an association organized for the maintenance of a camp meeting by a provision in the leases that the lessee shall keep and perform all such conditions or rules as the lessor shall from time to time impose, since such requirement is not reasonable. (N. Y.) 786.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

See also Injunction, VIII., infra.

Marriage.

If a marriage contracted in good faith is void by reason of some impediment, it is held that the parties may, after the removal of the impediment, become lawfully united by continuing to live together with the intention of sustaining toward each other the relation of husband and wife; and that, even where the existence of the impediment and its removal were unknown, continued cohabitation evidences consent to live in wedlock. (Neb.) 605.

Divorce.

A woman who consented to a decree of divorce against her to enable her husband to obtain a grant of property is held to have no right, after her husband had married another woman, to have the decree annulled, although, in consideration of her consent, he promised to remarry her after the grant was procured, and the decree was obtained by suppression of facts, and false testimony. (Utah) 294.

A withdrawal of an action for divorce, brought by a wife, is held not to be sufficient to support a conveyance by the husband to the wife of his interest in his father's estate as against the claims of his creditors. (Wis.) 406.

The resumption of marital relations by a wife living separate from her husband, and about to commence proceedings for divorce against him, to which she was entitled because of his wrongdoing, is held to be a sufficient consideration for his promise to convey property in trust for the benefit of their children, and, in the event of their death, for her benefit. (Ky.) 415.

Wife as witness.

A husband is held not to be able to waive the provisions of a statute that his wife shall in no case testify against him in a criminal prosecution except for an offense committed against her. (Tex. Crim. App.) 465.

Infants; necessities.

Services of an attorney in prosecuting for an infant an action to recover damages for an indecent assault upon her are held to be necessities. (R. I.) 128.

Bastardy.

The marriage, after the birth of a child, of a woman who was unmarried at the time such child was begotten and born, is held not to prevent her from maintaining an action in bastardy under a statute providing that such action may be maintained by any unmarried woman who shall thereafter be delivered of a bastard child, or is pregnant with a child which, if born alive, may be a bastard. (Neb.) 699.

V. FIDUCIARY RELATIONS.

See also Bankruptcy, I., supra.

Principal and agent.

An agent who is authorized by his principal to sell or exchange the property of the latter upon specified prices and terms is held to be in duty bound, upon learning that a more advantageous sale or exchange can be made, the facts concerning which are unknown to the principal, to communicate the same to him before making the sale as expressly authorized, and his failure to do so is held to amount to a fraud in law. (Minn.) 734.

V. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.

Coasting in street.

A municipal corporation is held not to be liable for injuries caused by failure to prevent coasting in its streets, since the duty of preventing such conduct rests on the officers as servants of the state. (Ky.) 575.

Death; right of action for.

The mother of an illegitimate child is held to have no right of action for his homicide, under a statute giving to a mother a right of action for the homicide of a child who contributes to her support. (Ga.) 555.

General statutory language providing indemnity to the next of kin of a person negligently killed is held not to apply in favor of nonresident aliens in case deceased is instantly killed, or dies without conscious pain. (Wis.) 589.

Injury to children.

An occupier of land who undertakes to burn rubbish thereon is held to be under no obligation to guard children of tender years, who are in the habit of resorting there to play, from injury by approaching the fire. (R. I.) 133.

The storing of dynamite in a partially buried box on a vacant lot to which children are accustomed to resort to play is held to be negligence which will render the one guilty thereof liable for injuries to a child by the explosion of one of the sticks, which was taken from the box by children who had resorted to the lot to play, and ignited by one of them in ignorance of its explosive character. (Wash.) 793.

A city, in clearing an alley of weeds, is held to be exercising its police power, so that it is not responsible for negligence in the performance of the work by one whom it has employed for that purpose, which results in the injury of a child attracted there by his operations. (Iowa) 401.

A mother who owns the property, takes care of the family, and who, by express direction amounting to a relinquishment of the father's right, is entitled to the earnings of their child, is held to have the right to maintain an action to recover for the loss and expense to which she is subjected by injuries negligently inflicted by a third person upon the child. (R. I.) 122.

Injury to passenger.

The attempt of a street railway company to operate its cars during a strike of its employees is held not to be negligence, so as to make it liable for an injury to a passenger struck by a stone thrown from the street into the car by a strike sympathizer. 60 L. R. A.

in no way under the control or direction of the company. (Minn.) 601.

The construction of a freight platform so near a railroad track that the elbow of a passenger may come in contact with freight on the platform as the passenger is seated inside of a passing car, with his elbow resting on the sill of one of the windows of the car, and protruding but slightly, is held to be gross negligence on the part of the railroad company, rendering it responsible in damages to a passenger injured thereby. (La.) 727.

Wrongful arrest of passenger.

A railroad company is held not to be liable to a passenger illegally arrested by officers of the law under color of their office, for failure to interfere and prevent the arrest, or for stopping the train to allow the officers to remove their prisoner therefrom. (Ga.) 713.

Injury to guest.

The proprietors of a saloon are held to be liable for an injury to a guest therein, caused by a third person pouring over his feet, while he was asleep, alcohol procured from the bartender, and setting fire to the same. (Minn.) 733.

Injury to servant.

The proximate cause of the death of an employee mortally burned in the employer's burning building, which he had entered to telephone an alarm of fire after he had failed to give an alarm elsewhere, as he had left the building to do, is held not to be the employer's negligence in constructing and maintaining the building so as to be likely to burn, but the employee's act in re-entering the building after he had reached a place of safety. (Tenn.) 459.

The negligence of a bridge foreman, whose duty it is to see that the bridge is free from obstructions on the approach of trains, in failing to see a maul left by a workman in such a way as to interfere with the passage of the train, and not that of the workman in so leaving it, is held to be the proximate cause of an injury to a member of the bridge gang who is struck by the maul as it is hurled from the track by the train. (C. C. App. 5th C.) 462.

One whose duty it is to do the blacksmith work necessary upon the implements used in the construction of a manufacturing plant is held to be, in making a link for the chain used to hold in position the box of a dump car, a fellow servant of one engaged in operating the car, so that the common employer is not liable for injury to the latter through insufficiency of the link made by the former. (Pa.) 453.

Omission to block a guard rail is held not to render a railroad company liable for injury to a servant whose foot is caught between the rails while he is attempting to uncouple cars, where the evidence shows that there are wide differences of opinion between railroad companies with respect to the relative safety to their servants and the public of the blocked and unblocked guard rails. (Neb.) 443.

A servant undertaking to clean a drain filled with decaying animal matter is held not to assume the risk of injuries from dangerous gases of which he has no knowledge, the effect of which it requires special scientific knowledge to measure and determine, although he knows the character of the contents of the drain, and that it emits offensive odors. (R. I.) 629.

Negligence of servant.

Negligence committed by a servant in the course of his employment, although he acts without the knowledge, or contrary to the known wishes of his master, is held to render the master liable. (Neb.) 313.

A railroad company is held to be liable for the act of its engineer, in whose custody it has placed signal torpedoes, in placing one on the track, in dangerous proximity to bystanders, and moving the engine over it for his own amusement, in consequence of which one of the bystanders is injured. (Wis.) 158.

Libel.

The publication, after due investigation, by a railroad company, that the reason for discharging an employee was that he had made statements which had been proved to be untrue, to the effect that one officer of the company had cast reflections upon the female ancestry of another officer, is held to be privileged, and not to be sufficient to sustain an action for libel unless it was inspired by malice. (Va.) 472.

Words spoken by a witness in a judicial proceeding concerning a stranger to the suit, which are pertinent to the issues involved, and fairly responsive to questions propounded to him, are held to be absolutely privileged notwithstanding actual malice. (Tenn.) 139.

Nuisance.

The storage of gunpowder by a fuse manufacturer in quantities necessary for his business, which is located in a proper place and is conducted with the utmost care, is held not to be a nuisance per se, so as to render him liable for injuries caused to neighboring property by the malicious explosion of the magazine by an employee. (Cal.) 377.

Fright.

Physical injury or disease resulting from fright or nervous shock caused by negligent acts, where such result might with reasonable certainty have been anticipated, or the negligence was gross, is held to give a right of action for damages. (N. C.) 617.

Fright, though resulting in physical injury, is held to give no right to recovery of damages, in the absence of contemporaneous injury to the plaintiff, unless the fright is the proximate result of a legal wrong against the plaintiff by the defendant. (Minn.) 403.

Malicious disbarment.

A judge of a court of record, is held not to be subject to a private action for oppressively, maliciously, and corruptly entering a decree disbarring an attorney. (Tenn.) 791.

Mail crane; frightening horse.

Erecting in or beside a highway a crane for delivering mail to passing trains, which, when the mail bag is strung upon it, is calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness, is held to be negligence which will render the railroad company liable to one who is injured by the frightening of his horse thereby, although the bag is actually placed in position by government employees. (Ala.) 269.

Defect in sidewalk.

The purchaser of a lot at sheriff's sale, who has not obtained any possession or control of the premises except such as arises constructively from the delivery and recording of the sheriff's deed, is held not to be responsible to the city, which has paid a judgment for injuries received by one falling into a negligently constructed coal hole in front of such lot three weeks after the issuance of the sheriff's deed, and while the former owner is still in possession. (Neb.) 923.

Injury to trees.

A telephone company which removes, destroys, or injures trees planted by an abutting owner along the street adjacent to his property under the terms of a city ordinance, in erecting poles and wires under its franchise, is held to be liable for the resulting damage, though no unnecessary injury is inflicted. (Neb.) 426.

Charivari.

One participating in a charivari of a wedding party is held to have no right to recover for injuries inflicted by the negligent discharge of a pistol by a coparticipant, where the statute imposes a fine upon whoever disturbs the peace of a family or neighborhood by loud and unusual noises, or disturbs any assembly of people met for a lawful purpose. (Ill.) 286.

Injury to tenant's family or property.

Mere failure of a landlord to comply with his agreement to make repairs on the leased premises is held not to render him liable for personal injuries suffered by a member of the tenant's family because of want of repair. (Md.) 580.

A landlord is held not to be relieved from liability for injury to tenants of a lower floor by the freezing and bursting of an automatic fire extinguisher in the portion of the building retained by him, by the fact that he has employed an independent contractor to keep the building heated. (N. H.) 116.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; WILLS; LIENS; DEEDS.

The news of market quotations and sporting items, gathered and furnished by a telegraph company to its patrons by means of tickers, is held to be property which will be protected by equity against appropriation by rival companies who intend to furnish it to their patrons in competition with complainant, to the injury or destruction of the service. (C. C. A. 7th C.) 805.

Facts with reference to contemplated buildings or improvements, which have been ascertained promptly by effort and expense, and compiled and put in form for the use of contractors, having a commercial value so long as they are not generally known, are held to be property, and entitled to protection as such. (Mass.) 810.

Waters.

Appropriation of considerable quantities of water in seasons when that may be done without sensible injury to lower owners is held not to give a prescriptive right to divert the whole stream in dry seasons. (Neb.) 910.

The right to the use of water, when acquired by appropriation, is held to be, in its nature, a property right, and to become a superior and better title to the use and enjoyment of such water than that of a riparian proprietor whose right attaches subsequently. (Neb.) 889.

Corpse.

The right to the custody and to decide upon the place of burial of the body of a deceased unmarried person is held to reside ordinarily in his next of kin; and it is held that the courts will not treat this right as having been waived or relinquished, except upon clear and satisfactory evidence of conduct indicative of a free and voluntary intent and purpose to that end. (Neb.) 440.

Entry for condition broken.

A right of entry for condition broken is held to be transferable after breach, independent of statute, as the English law against maintenance, which forbade such a transfer, is not in force in New Jersey. (N. J. Err. & App.) 750.

Wills.

Under a will by which a testator devises all his property to his widow during her life, with a provision that at her death his whole estate shall be equally divided between his children, and that the effects going into the hands of his daughters shall not be subject to the control of any husband, but shall belong to his "said daughters and their children;" and that, in case any of the children die without leaving issue, their part of the estate shall be equally divided between his other children, to be controlled in the same way,—it is held that the children of a daughter of the testator who, with such daughter, survive the life tenant, are entitled to share in common with their mother in the remainder interest which on the death of the testator vested in their mother, subject to open and let in any children subsequently born and living at the death of the life tenant; and their rights are held not to be affected by a deed of all her interests in certain realty belonging to the testator at his death, executed by their mother during the existence of the life tenancy. (Ga.) 274.

Mechanic's lien.

Consent to the erection of buildings on the land within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law, so as to make the property liable for liens after the contract has been forfeited and the vendor has resumed possession, is held not to be shown by a clause in an executory land contract: "that the vendee shall have a right to immediate possession" for the purpose of erecting buildings. (N. Y.) 315.

Deeds.

A deed by one to whom an undivided interest in certain land is conveyed, of all the "surface" of such land, retaining the right to maintain on the land such openings as may be necessary for ventilation, drainage, and taking out of coal, without liability for injuries to the surface by reason of mining such coal, and the right to remove the same, given to the owner of the other half interest in such land, who had previously conveyed to the grantor all the coal in, on, or underlying his undivided half of such land, with the right to make and maintain openings for ventilation and taking out of the coal, is held to convey to the grantee the surface only, and not to pass the grantor's right to oil and gas in and under such land. (W. Va.) 795.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.

Garnishment.

Violation of a state statute in sending a claim out of the state for the purpose of garnishment is held not to deprive the garnishee of the protection of the foreign judgment, under which he pays the claim, from liability to pay the debt a second time to his creditor within the state, if he has disclosed all defenses within his knowledge to the foreign court, and notified the debtor of 60 L. R. A.

the proceedings, notwithstanding which the foreign court, which has jurisdiction over the parties and the res, compelled him to pay the claim. (Ind.) 396.

A writ of garnishment against a county is held not to be authorized by a statute giving a right to a writ of garnishment to any person bringing a suit in any court of a state against any person, natural or corporate, and providing that officers, agents, and employees of companies or corporations shall be, as regards such companies or corporations, third persons, and as such subject to garnishment after judgment against the companies or corporation. (Fla.) 549.

Evidence.

The mere fact that the verdict of a coroner's jury must be returned to and filed with the clerk of a court of record in a state where the coroner has no judicial functions is held not to make it judicial in character, so as to entitle it to admission, in an action at law, as evidence of the facts found by him. (Or.) 620.

Assault.

In a civil action for assault and battery it is held that opprobrious words and abusive language cannot be considered by the jury in justification of the assault, but only in mitigation of damages, under a statute providing that, on the trial of the indictment for assault, defendant may give in evidence any opprobrious words or abusive language used by the person assaulted, and the jury shall determine whether they amount to a justification. (Ga.) 559.

Cloud on title.

To enable a reversioner to maintain a suit in equity to remove the cloud from his title, where the lessee, after having covenanted to pay the taxes, neglects to do so, and acquires title to the property at a tax sale, it is held that possession is not necessary. (Md.) 729.

Writ and process.

A member of the legislature is held to be subject, in a proper case, to be served with summons while at the seat of government for the purpose of attending the legislative session. (Neb.) 609.

Ejectment.

Possessory rights only are held not to be sufficient to sustain an action of ejectment without showing the legal title. (Conn.) 706.

Injunction.

An injunction against a husband in a suit which does not seek the dissolution of the marriage, to restrain him from further interference with his wife's separate estate, is held to be properly granted, notwithstanding the statute gives him the sole management of her estate during marriage, where he refuses to support her, and so diverts the income of her property as to deprive her of the benefit which the law entitles her to receive therefrom through his management. (Tex.) 941.

The draining, collecting, and diverting by a land owner of percolating waters on his premises for the sole purpose of wasting them is held to be properly enjoined, where such acts will destroy or materially injure the spring of a water company which makes use of the water thereof for supplying the people of a municipality with water for domestic use. (Minn.) 875.

Damages.

The measure of damages for wrongfully disconnecting a telephone because of a mistake as to the payment of rent is held to be the amount which will compensate the patron for the injuries caused by the breach of contract. (Ky.) 849.

Joinder of parties.

The joinder of master and servant as defendants in an action for injuries to another servant caused by the act of the defendant servant for which the master is responsible, is held to be proper. (Wash.) 949.

Conclusiveness of judgment.

A judgment in a suit between the owner of property abutting on a highway and the municipality to establish the boundary of the highway is held not to be conclusive on the owner of property located on the opposite side of the street, who is not made a party to the suit, and whose access to and from his property will be interfered with if the boundary so established prevails. (Iowa.) 720.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

Murder.

A master who whips a servant so that he dies is held to be guilty of murder, although he has a right to inflict the punishment, and the instrument is proper, if the punishment is so prolonged and barbarous as to indicate malice. (S. C.) 801.

Extradition.

A person who was not corporeally present in the demanding state at the time of the commission of a crime with which he is charged is held not to be a fugitive from justice in another state within the meaning of the United States Constitution, requiring the delivery up of fugitives from justice for punishment. (N. Y.) 774.

Lottery.

A scheme whereby a common fund is to be produced by the contributions of various parties, and afterwards distributed among the parties contributing thereto, and a valuable preference or privilege in the distribution thereof is made to depend upon chance, is held to be a lottery. (Neb.) 448.

Larceny of fish.

The taking with felonious intent of fish which are inclosed in a net, or in any other inclosed place which is private property, from which they may be taken at any time at the pleasure of the owner of the net or inclosure, is held to constitute larceny. (Ohio) 481.

Separation of jurors.

The mere separation of jurors impaneled to try a capital case, from their fellows, without the attendance of an officer, although an irregularity, is held not to be a sufficient cause for setting aside the verdict, if the court is satisfied that the prisoner has not sustained any injury from such separation. (Fla.) 547.

(CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.)

Reading testimony of dead witness.

Reading on a second trial of a criminal case testimony of a witness who died after the first trial, at which accused was present and represented by counsel, who was accorded the right of cross-examination, is held not to infringe the right of the accused to be confronted with the witnesses against him, in the presence of the court. (N. Y.) 318.

Coram nobis.

The writ of error coram nobis is held not to lie to vacate a judgment of conviction and secure a retrial of the accused, because of his inability within the statutory limit of time to prepare a record on appeal showing the errors of which complaint was made. (Kan.) 572.

Remarks of prosecutor.

The conduct of the assistant prosecutor on a trial for rape, repeatedly asking the son of the accused, on cross-examination, if he had not stated to a specified person that he suspected his father of having committed a similar offense with other girls, and that such conduct on the part of the accused caused the death of the witness's mother, and that, if at such conversation the witness did not cry out, and say, "I cannot go against my father even if he is guilty,"—is held to be ground for reversal. (Id.) 716.

1. A plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own case instead of the weakness of the defendant's case, as it is his right, instead of the defendant's wrongdoing, that is the basis of recovery. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Barber (Neb.) 927

2. The motive which induces a person to bring an action is immaterial, if he has a legal right to the remedy he is seeking. Hamilton, G. & C. Traction Co. v. Parrish (Ohio) 531

3. The only remedy of a landowner whose land is injured by water accumulated along a railroad right of way is an action at law for damages, and the legislature cannot give him a right to have the water drained off by the public authorities at the expense of the railroad company. *Chicago & E. Who may maintain.

4. An infant named for the promisor is in such privity to his father as to be entitled to enforce a promise made to the latter to convey land to the child in consideration of such naming. Daily v. Minnick (Iowa) 840

5. One who has given a deed of trust on property to secure a debt may maintain an action for an injury to it, if the security is ample for the debt, so that the loss from the injury will fall on him. Watkins v. Kaolin Mfg. Co. (N. C.) 617

6. An action under Ga. Civ. Code, §§ 2317, 2318, against a carrier for failure to trace and give information as to the time, place, 60 L. R. A.

and manner of loss or injury to goods shipped over a connecting line to which such goods had been delivered by the carrier in good condition, is properly brought in the name of the shipper, although he was not the owner of the goods. Central of Ga. R. Co. v. Murphey (Ga.) 817

7. A traveling salesman who is responsible to his employer for the loss or damage to samples in his possession has such an interest in them that, in case they are checked as baggage by a railroad company, and injured in transportation, he may maintain an action to recover for the injury. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Matthews (Ky.) 846

8. A municipal corporation may, for the protection of the citizens, maintain an action to enjoin a gas company from violating its contract as to the maximum rate to be charged for gas in consideration of receiving permission to place mains in the streets, although the municipality itself is not a consumer, and its rights in its municipal capacity are therefore not affected. Muncie Natural Gas Co. v. Muncie (Ind.) 822

9. A municipal corporation which has made a contract with a gas company laying pipes in its streets as to the maximum rates to be charged may maintain an action to enforce the contract as a trustee of an express trust, under a statute allowing action by such trustees, and providing that the term "trustee" shall be construed to include a person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another. Intervention.

11. The state cannot intervene in a proceeding to condemn for reservoir purposes land claimed by a railroad company, for the purpose of obtaining a forfeiture of the latter's rights, where it has no claim to the property in controversy, and no interest in the subject-matter of the dispute, and the result of the intervention will be to change 975

2. A denial of the right to take property by right of eminent domain upon the issues made by the pleadings after hearing testimony introduced upon motion for the appointment of commissioners, and motion to 60 L. R. A.

dismiss, is a final judgment, which may be reviewed by the appellate court. Denver Power & Irrig. Co. v. Colorado & S. R. Co. (Colo.) 383 Record.

3. A motion to modify the decree cannot be considered on appeal, where it was not made a part of the record. Muncie Natural Gas Co. v. Muncie (Ind.) 822

4. An objection to a bill of exceptions on the ground that part of the evidence is omitted therefrom is untenable, where the evidence referred to consists of ponderous articles which do not admit of physical attachment to the record, and these are all referred to in the written portion of the bill of exceptions, and articles answering to such reference were filed with the record in the case and produced at the hearing on appeal, bearing the marks of identification of the official reporter of the trial court. O'Neill v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (Neb.) 443

Hearing and determination generally.

5. Words used by the court in instructing the jury must, in determining whether or not they were erroneous, be construed in the sense in which they were used. Cox v. Royal Tribe of Joseph (Or.) 620

6. That instructions requested by the defeated party, embodying correct principles of law, were given to the jury, will not prevent a reversal if contradictory and erroneous instructions were given for his adversary. Gilmore v. Fuller (Ill.) 286

7. The reasonableness of an ordinance limiting the speed of trains within municipal limits, passed under general statutory authority, which merely prescribes the minimum rate, without prescribing the details of the regulation, is subject to review by the courts. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Carlinville (Ill.) 391

Presumptions.

8. The improper separation of jurors during the trial of a capital case is presumed, if the prisoner is convicted, to have been prejudicial to him; and the burden of proof is upon the prosecution to show that the prisoner has suffered no injury thereby. Gamble v. State (Fla.) 547

9. A third extension of time to file statement of evidence on a motion for new trial will be presumed to be within the time of a former extension, where it was duly allowed by the trial judge, and the statute requires extensions to be within the time of former ones, although the second one is not on file. Crafts v. Carr (R. I.) 128

Review of finding or verdict.

10. Whether or not the construction of a granite curb in place of an old one of blue-stone is new work or the repair of old work is a question of fact, upon which the determination of the trial court is not reviewable on appeal. People ex rel. North v. Featherstonhaugh (N. Y.) 768

11. A decision of the trial court on conflicting evidence as to the misconduct of counsel will not be disturbed on error. German Ins. Co. v. Shader (Neb.) 918

12. That the verdict is against the clear weight of evidence is not assignable for error. Bouvier v. Baltimore & N. Y. R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 750

Questions not raised below.

13. An objection to the declaration in an action for personal injuries, based on a formal defect in that it did not set forth any duty owing from defendant to plaintiff, cannot be raised before the appellate court in the first instance. Cox v. American Agri. Chemical Co. (R. I.) 629

Prejudicial error.

14. An instruction directing the jury to do substantial justice between the parties, although not to be commended, is not prejudicial error, where they are told to do so by finding a verdict "solely from the evidence in the case, applying the law as given in these instructions." German Ins. Co. v. Shader (Neb.) 918

15. That the personality was erroneously directed to be exhausted before the real estate, by a judgment subjecting to payment of debts of the assignor property assigned in fraud of the rights of creditors, will not require a reversal of the judgment if the entire property is insufficient to satisfy the creditors' claims. Oppenheimer v. Collins (Wis.) 406

16. Refusal to instruct the jury, upon a trial for violation of a Sunday law, that the burden of proof is on the state to show that the work was not a work of necessity or charity within the exception of the statute, is error. State v. McBee (W. Va.) 638

17. Submission to the jury of the question whether or not services rendered to an infant were necessities is not available as error to defendant, who is sought to be held liable therefor, where the jury found them to be necessities, and the court would have been compelled to make the same ruling had it undertaken to decide the question. Crafts v. Carr (R. I.) 128

18. The conduct of the assistant prosecutor on a trial for rape in repeatedly asking the son of the accused on cross-examination if he had not stated to a specified person that he suspected his father of having committed a similar offense with other girls, one of whom was a member of his family, and that such conduct on the part of the accused caused the death of the witness's mother, and that if at such conversation the witness did not cry and say "I cannot go against my father, even if he is guilty," is ground for reversal. State v. Irwin (Idaho) 716

19. The moderate use of intoxicants by the jurors in a capital case, though improper, will not require the reversal of a verdict against the prisoner, where none of the jurors became intoxicated, and it is clearly shown that no injury resulted therefrom to the accused. Gamble v. State (Fla.) 547

Judgment.

20. An appellate court may grant a new 60 L. R. A.

trial when there is no evidence to support the verdict. State v. Shaw (S. C.) 801

Filing new opinion.

21. The court has a right to file a new and fuller opinion containing every reason for the decision that was included in the first opinion and an additional reason also, although the cause has been remanded to a lower court. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. (Miss.) 33

Streets shown on the plan of the park of an association organized to maintain a camp meeting and lease lots to persons desiring the advantages of the ground are dedicated to the use of the lessees and those, at their request, using them for access to their lots, so that the association cannot prevent such use. Thousand Island Park Asso. v. Tucker (N. Y.) 786

2. Exclusive rights are not given by a statute merely authorizing an association 60 L. R. A.

organized to maintain a camp meeting to purchase and deal in provisions and other commodities for supplying the needs of lot lessees and visitors, and to maintain stores and shops for that purpose, and to authorize others to engage in such pursuits, and to make and establish regulations therefor. Id.

3. Power to prohibit hawking and peddling within a camp-meeting ground does not authorize the prohibition of the delivery therein of produce ordered by mail by lot lessees, although the price is not fixed until the goods are delivered. Id.

4. Power to adopt a regulation requiring lessees of lots to purchase all supplies from the lessor is not reserved to an association organized for the maintenance of a camp meeting by a provision in the leases that the lessee shall keep and perform all such conditions or rules as the lessor shall from time to time impose, since such requirement is not reasonable. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Camp meeting association; prohibition against delivery of goods on grounds of, as restraint of trade. 786

CARRIERS.

Duty and Liability towards passengers generally.

1. A carrier of passengers is charged with the highest degree of care and foresight consistent with the orderly conduct of its business, in respect to the protection of its passengers from injuries resulting from its acts or omissions, from the acts or omissions of its servants, and from the acts of strangers, who are under its control or direction; but it is charged with ordinary care and prudence only to guard against the lawless acts of third persons not under its direction or control. Fewings v. Mendenhall (Minn.) 601

2. A railroad company is bound to use extraordinary diligence to protect a passenger, while in transit, from violence or injury by third persons. Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Ponder (Ga.) 713

3. A railroad company owes no duty towards a passenger arrested by officers under color of their office to see that they use only such force as is necessary to make the arrest. Id.

4. A railroad company owes no duty towards a passenger arrested by the officers of the law acting under color of their office to inquire into the legality of the arrest. Id.

5. A railroad company is not liable to a passenger illegally arrested by officers of the law under color of their office for failure to interfere and prevent the arrest, or for stopping the train to allow the officers to remove their prisoner therefrom. Id.

6. A statement by a passenger on a railroad train in the hearing of the conductor to officers attempting to arrest him, that he has paid them all he owes them, is not of itself sufficient to put the conductor on notice that the arrest is for a debt instead of for a crime. Id.

7. The attempt of a street railway company to operate its cars during a strike of its employees is not negligence so as to make it liable for an injury to a passenger struck by a stone thrown from the street into the car by a strike sympathizer in no way under the control or direction of the company. Fewings v. Mendenhall (Minn.) 601

8. Failure of a street railway company, attempting to operate its cars during a strike of its employees, to pull down the blinds of a car or stretch a heavy canvas over the window outside the car, is not such negligence as will justify a recovery of damages by a passenger injured by a stone thrown into the car by a strike sympathizer. Id.

9. For a railroad company to have its freight platform so near the track that the elbow of a passenger projecting only 3' or 4 inches through an open window is broken by coming in contact with a bale of cotton on such platform is gross negligence, rendering the company liable for the injury sustained. Kird v. New Orleans & N. W. R. Co. (La.) 727

Contributory negligence of passenger.

10. A passenger is not, as a matter of law, guilty of such contributory negligence in permitting his elbow to project 3 or 4 inches through an open window as to relieve the company from liability for its gross negligence in constructing a freight platform so near the track that the passenger's arm is broken by contact with a bale of cotton thereon. Id.

Baggage.

11. Only what a passenger takes with him for his own personal use and convenience is within the meaning of a statute requiring carriers to check baggage. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Matthews (Ky.) 846

12. Notice to the carrier that a package delivered to it for transportation as baggage contains articles which are not such is not imputed by the fact that the passenger pays a charge for excessive weight. Id.

13. A carrier may assume liability for merchandise delivered to it by a passenger, equal to that which is imposed upon it in case of baggage, by accepting it for transportation as baggage, with knowledge of its character. Id.

Governmental control; connecting carriers.

Shipper's Right of Action for Failure to Trace Goods, see ACTION OR SUIT, 6.

See also CONTRACTS, 15.

14. The provision of Ga. Civ. Code, §§ 2317, 2318, requiring a carrier to trace and give information within thirty days after application as to the time, place, and manner of injury to goods shipped, under a contract relieving any of two or more connecting carriers from responsibility on delivery to the next carrier in good order, is not 60 L. R. A.

unreasonable or arbitrary as to the time allowed for tracing the goods when applied to a shipment from Georgia to Nebraska. Central of Ga. R. Co. v. Murphey (Ga.) 817

15. The provisions of Ga. Civ. Code, §§ 2317, 2318, that when freight which has been shipped, to be conveyed by two or more carriers to its destination, under a contract by which the responsibility of one carrier ceases on delivery to the next in good order, has been lost, damaged, or destroyed, it shall be the duty of the initial or connecting carrier on application by the shipper, consignee, or their assigns, within thirty days after the application, to trace such freight and inform the applicant in writing as to the time, place, and manner of the loss or injury, and the names of the parties and their official position, if any, by whom the truth of the facts can be established; and making a carrier who fails to trace the freight and give such information within the prescribed time liable for the freight lost, damaged, or destroyed,—are not unreasonable and arbitrary, nor an unlawful regulation by the state of interstate commerce, nor an infringement of the correlative liberty of silence, nor a compulsory private discovery by statutory terror. Id.

16. That the system employed by a carrier in tracing goods delivered by it to a connecting line, under a contract exempting it from responsibility on delivery of such goods to a connecting line in good order, was inadequate to enable it to trace the goods and give information as to the time, place, and manner of loss or injury thereto within thirty days as required by Ga. Civ. Code, §§ 2317, 2318, does not relieve it from liability for the loss or injury to the goods if the tracing within such time was not an impossibility. Id.

COMMON LAW.

As to Riparian Rights, see WATERS, 1-3.

The power of the courts to declare established doctrines of the common law inapplicable to the state of Nebraska should be used sparingly, and its exercise is not justified unless the inapplicability of a rule is general, extending to the whole or a greater part of the state, or at least to an area capable of definite judicial ascertainment. Meng v. Coffey (Neb.) 910

CONSPIRACY.

A combination of the manufacturers of a product of a state, the market for four-fifths of which is found in other states, to limit production and raise the price, is a violation of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890. Gibbs v. McNeeley (C. C. App. 9th C.) 152

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Conspiracy; unlawful combination in restraint of trade and commerce. 153

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Impairment of Obligation, see CONTRACTS, 15.

Delegation of power.

1. Vesting in township committees the power to divide the townships into districts for street lighting and road purposes is not an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. State, Allison, Prosecutor, v. Corker (N. J. L.) 564

2. The sections of the Nebraska irrigation act of 1895, chap. 69, creating a state board of irrigation, are not unconstitutional, as conferring judicial powers on executive officers, as the primary object of such board is for the purpose of supervising the appropriation, distribution, and diversion of water, which is an administrative, rather than a judicial, function. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 880

Vested rights.
3. The right of a man to convey or encumber his homestead without co-operation of his wife, as allowed by law, is a vested one, notwithstanding it may be defeated by the filing by the wife of a claim as prescribed by statute; and the legislature cannot destroy the right as to existing homesteads. Gladney v. Sydnor (Mo.) 880

Making Railroad Companies Liable for Injuries to Fellow Servants, see MASTER AND SERVANT, 7.
4. An act requiring the redemption in money of checks issued in payment of assigned wages, which is applicable only to merchants on the one hand and coal miners on the other, is void as class legislation. Dixon v. Poe (Ind.) 308

5. Forbidding the keeping open of a barber shop on Sunday, while permitting hotels, boarding houses, baths, restaurants, taverns, livery stables, and retail drug stores to be open, is not unconstitutional as depriving barbers of the equal protection of the laws, since the classification is not arbitrary. State v. Sopher (Utah) 468

6. Forbidding a barber to exercise his trade on Sunday is a proper exercise of the police power, and does not unconstitutionally restrain him of personal liberty, or deprive him of liberty or property without due process of law. Id.

7. A statute forbidding the purchase of a stock of goods in bulk without ascertaining the seller's creditors, and having their claims settled, does not deprive the seller of his property without due process of law, and is not void as class legislation; nor is it in restraint of trade. McDaniels v. J. J. Connelly Shoe Co. (Wash.) 947

Due process of law.

8. The constitutional provision as to due process of law is not violated by filing a new and fuller opinion after the cause has been remanded to a lower court. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. (Miss.) 33

9. An owner of property who, before it can be included in a drainage district, is given a day in court, is not deprived of his property without due process of law. Mound City Land & Stock Co. v. Miller (Mo.) 190

10. Failure to afford a railroad company an opportunity to be heard in opposition to the construction of a ditch to drain off waters accumulating along its right of way from the construction of its road renders a statute providing for the construction of such ditch upon petition of the owner or tenant of contiguous land unconstitutional as a taking of property without due process of law. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Keith (Ohio) 525

11. Notice of the time and place at which tax assessors will meet in sessions which are not secret, with the right of the taxpayer to appear and be heard, is sufficient to constitute due process in the assessment. Sandford v. Poe (C. C. App. 6th C.) 641

12. An ordinance subjecting one in possession of premises on which liquor is sold, disposed of, obtained, or furnished in violation or evasion of law, to fine, whether the act is with his knowledge or consent or not, violates a constitutional provision that absolute and arbitrary power over the lives, liberty, and property of freemen exists nowhere in the republic. Campbellsville v. Odewalt (Ky.) 723

13. An owner of property who has made and filed a valid contract for the placing of a building thereon, under which, by the terms of the statute, the entire contract price may be applied to the claims of laborers and material men, cannot constitutionally be required to furnish a bond which will make him liable to them in an additional amount in case their claims are not satisfied by the contractor. *Gibbs v. 1. A promise by an infant to pay for necessities consisting of services of an attorney in conducting a lawsuit will be implied, where the suit was brought by her next friend, was legally proper, and the infant conferred with the attorney, appeared as a witness, and profited by the successful prosecution of the suit. Crafts v. Carr (R. I.) 128

Consideration.

See also infra, 7-9.

2. The naming of a child for promisor in accordance with his previous request is a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise to convey to the child a particular tract of land because of such act. Daily v. Minnick (Iowa) 840

3. A withdrawal of an action for divorce, brought by the wife, is not sufficient to support a conveyance by defendant to plaintiff of his interest in his father's estate as against the claims of his creditors. Oppenheimer v. Collins (Wis.) 406

4. The resumption of marital relations by a wife living separate from her husband, and about to commence proceedings for divorce against him, to which she was entitled because of his wrongdoing, is a sufficient consideration for his promise to convey property in trust for the benefit of their children, and, in the event of their death, for her benefit. Moayon v. Moayon (Ky.) 415

Mutuality.

5. A contract by a man whose wife is living separate from him, and about to begin a suit for divorce because of his wrongdoing, that, in case she will resume her marital relations, he will convey one third of his property in trust for their children, and for her in the event of their death, is not void because it is not mutually binding upon the parties, and the remedy for its enforcement is not mutual to them. Id.

Formal requisites; statute of frauds.

6. The description of the property is sufficient to uphold the contract, where the agreement is to convey one third of all grantor's estate, real, personal, or mixed, of whatever kind or nature, belonging to him in his own right, which he acquired under the will of his mother, as well as all the other estate otherwise acquired and now owned by him. Moayon v. Moayon (Ky.) 415

7. Naming a child for grantor is sufficient performance of consideration to take an oral agreement to convey land to him in consideration thereof out of the statute of frauds, where payment of the purchase money, or part thereof, is allowed to do so. Daily v. Minnick (Iowa) 840

8. The purchase by promisor of a tract of land, and his declaration that it is the land he intends to convey in fulfillment of his promise, are sufficient to render certain his promise to convey to an infant a certain quantity of land in case he is named for him. Id.

9. A consideration previously received may constitute a sufficient performance of an oral promise to convey land to take it out of the statute of frauds. Id.

12. An agreement by which parties thereto stipulate in advance not to enforce, by a resort to a court of justice, a substantial right which may subsequently be involved in dispute between them, but to submit such right to the decision of a private tribunal, although other questions involved may be reserved for adjudication by the courts, cannot be enforced. Id.

13. Contracts in which a corporation, in consideration of stated payments made to it, makes promises, which are the main inducement to such contract, and are impossible to perform, are unlawful, being against public policy. State ex rel. Prout v. Nebraska Home Co. (Neb.) 448

14. A contract between an attorney at law and one who is not such an attorney, by which the latter agrees to procure the employment of the former by third persons for the prosecution of suits in courts of record, and also to assist in looking after and procuring witnesses whose testimony is to be used in the cases, in consideration of a share of the fees which the attorney shall receive for his services, is against public policy, and void. Langdon v. Conlin (Neb.) 429

Impairing obligation.

15. The provision of Ga. Civ. Code, §§ 2317, 2318, that one of two or more connecting carriers which fails, on application, to trace and give information of the time, place, and manner of loss or injury to goods shipped, shall be liable for the value of the goods lost, damaged, or destroyed, in the same manner as if the loss, damage, or destruction occurred on its line, notwithstanding a provision in the contract of shipment relieving each carrier from responsibility on delivery to the next carrier in good order,—is not an impairment of the obligation of a contract of shipment entered into after the enactment of such statute. *Central of Ga. Consolidation.

Right of Consolidated Company to Exemption from Taxation, see TAXES, 8.

2. A consolidation of the stock of corporations results uniformly and necessarily in the creation of a new corporation. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. (Miss.) 33

3. A consolidation which results in the formation of a new company, and not merely a merger of the constituent companies, retaining their separate existences, is authorized by statutes providing for the consolidation of companies under the name of one of 60 L. R. A.

them, without saying it shall be under its charter, and giving to the new company all the benefits, rights, franchises, and property of the original companies. Id.

4. The phrase "such terms as they may agree upon," in a statute authorizing the consolidation of railroad companies, relates to the mere administrative details attending consolidation, and conveys no substantive powers or rights. Id.

Compensation of officers.

5. The general manager of a corporation who, after the expiration of a contract fixing his salary at $5,000 per year, continues in the same employment, without any new agreement, and afterwards voluntarily reduces his salary to $3,000 per year, drawing it from month to month thereafter on that basis for many years, until he gives up the office, cannot subsequently recover the balance of the $5,000 per annum at which the salary was originally fixed. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Barber (Neb.) 927

Dealing with directors.

6. A contract by corporate directors, in the benefit of which one of their number participated, is voidable only, and not void per se, and may be subsequently ratified by the stockholders when the facts are disclosed to them. Hodge v. United States Steel Corp. (N. J. Err. & App.) 742

7. Directors cannot lawfully enter into a contract in the benefit of which even one of their number participates without the knowledge and consent of the stockholders. Id.

Reduction of stock.

8. A corporation whose act of incorporation provides for the payment to preferred stockholders of a yearly dividend at the rate of 7 per cent per annum in quarterly payments, which has declared and paid four such dividends in successive quarters before calling a meeting on the question of retiring part of the preferred stock, is within the provision of the New Jersey act of 1902, authorizing corporations which have issued preferred stock entitling the holders to receive dividends at a rate exceeding 5 per cent per annum, and which shall have "continuously" declared and paid dividends at such rate on such preferred stock "for the period of at least one year next preceding the meeting," to retire such preferred stock. Id.

Rights of stockholders.

9. Stockholders, as such, have no title to the corporate property which they may convey or encumber in their own name, as the corporation must act through its proper agents and in the prescribed way. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Barber (Neb.) 927

10. Subsequent stockholders have no standing to attack prior mismanagement of the corporation, unless such mismanagement or its effects continue and are injurious to them specially and peculiarly in some other manner. Id.

11. Stockholders who have acquired their shares and their interest in the corporation from alleged wrongdoers, and through prior mismanagement, have no standing to complain thereof. Id.

12. Stockholders in a corporation who are injured by the mismanagement thereof may, if they so elect, acquiesce in and treat such transactions as binding, where they are not absolutely void; and the discretion to acquiesce therein or bring suit to set them aside cannot be transferred. Id.

13. Individual stockholders of a corporation cannot question in judicial proceedings corporate acts of directors if the same are within the powers of the corporation and in furtherance of its purposes, and are not unlawful or against good morals, and are performed in good faith and in the exercise of an honest judgment. Hodge v. United States Steel Corp. (N. J. Err. & App.) 742

14. Although a corporation is regarded as a person separate and distinct from its stockholders, or any of them, when proceeding at law or asserting a title to property, or when the title to property is involved, a court of equity will not, when rights of an equitable nature are asserted, or relief on rules or principles of equity is sought, forget that the stockholders are the real and substantial beneficiaries of a recovery; and if such stockholders have no standing in equity, and are not equitably entitled to the remedy sought to be enforced by the corporation in their behalf and for their advantage, no recovery will be permitted to the corporation. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Barber (Neb.) 927

Liability of stockholders.

15. A holder of stock in a national bank who, without knowledge or suspicion that the bank is either then insolvent or is likely to prove so, sells the stock, and who does everything reasonably possible to procure a transfer of the shares on the books of the bank, cannot be held liable as a stockholder, although the bank is declared insolvent before the transfer is effected, and both the bank and the purchaser are insolvent when the sale is made. Earle v. Carson (C. C. App. 3d C.) 266

Stockholders' meetings.

16. Stockholders in a corporation are under no disability to vote on the question of entering into a contract with directors of the corporation because they are also directors, as they do not vote in their fiduciary capacity, but, like other stockholders, in the right of the shares of stock held by them. Hodge v. United States Steel Corp. (N. J. Err. & App.) 742

17. Corporate stockholders may, at a duly convened meeting of the stockholders, lawfully enter into or authorize a contract between the company and a third party, in which directors are personally interested, if it is done by them with notice of such interest. Id.

18. All the stockholders of a corporation are bound by all acts and proceedings within the scope and authority conferred by the charter, which are approved or sanctioned 60 L. R. A.

by the vote of a majority of the stockholders duly taken and ascertained according to law, where the by-laws of the corporation, adopted by the stockholders in pursuance of authority given by the act of incorporation, provide that a majority vote at a stockholder's meeting shall be binding on the corporation. Id.

Dissolution.

19. A corporation, organized under the laws of Nebraska, which is engaged in a business forbidden by statute, or unlawful as against public policy, may be deprived of its charter and dissolved by proceedings in quo warranto. State ex rel. Prout v. Nebraska Home Co. (Neb.) 448

Relation to legislative department.

1. The question as to the propriety and necessity of legislation authorizing the taking of private property for public use belongs exclusively to the legislature, in the exercise of whose judgment in regard thereto the courts have no power to interfere. State ex rel. Utick v. Polk County Comrs. (Minn.) 181

2. Whether a particular improvement under a statute providing a general system for draining wet and overflowed land will inure to the public health, convenience, or welfare is a judicial question which the legislature cannot determine to the exclusion of the courts. Id.

3. The determination of a public improvement commission to construct a new curb, sustained by some evidence of its necessity, is not reviewable by the courts where the commission has statutory authority to construct curbing whenever they deem the same necessary, and whenever, in their judgment, the public convenience requires it. People ex rel. North v. Featherstonhaugh (N. Y.) 768

4. Whether or not a statute requiring the attendance of children at school is "wholesome and reasonable" is a legislative, and not a judicial, question, where the legislature has constitutional power to pass all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws as they may judge for the benefit and welfare of the state. State v. Jackson (N. H.) 739

CREDITORS' BILL.

Error in Judgment on, see APPEAL AND ERROR, 15.

1. In applying assets which have been wrongfully assigned in fraud of creditors to the payment of debts of the assignor, real estate should be first exhausted, to the exoneration of personality. Oppenheimer v. Collins (Wis.) 406

2. The mere fact that a debtor's interest in his father's estate consists in part of real estate, upon which an execution might be levied, will not prevent the maintenance of a creditor's bill to reach such interest if an execution has been returned "no property found," and it is not shown that the value of such real estate was sufficient to satisfy the costs of sale. Id.

3. Personal judgment should not be entered against defendants for the full amount of the claim, in the absence of anything to show that they had become personally liable therefor, in a creditor's suit to subject assets in the hands of third persons to the payment of a judgment debt. Id.

CRIMINAL LAW.

Right of Accused to Meet Witnesses,
see TRIAL, 3.

1. A statute making the penalty of an attempt one half that prescribed for the commission of the offense is void for uncertainty in cases where the penalty for the offense is imprisonment for life. People v. Burns (Cal.) 270

2. Conviction of attempt to commit robbery after conviction of prior crimes punishable by imprisonment in the state prison does not require imposition of punishment under a statute providing for life imprisonment after such conviction of one guilty of a crime which upon a first conviction would be punishable, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for life, although one convicted of robbery under such circumstances would be within the terms of such statute, where there was no discretion to punish one guilty of an attempt to commit robbery by imprisonment for life. Id.

3. Under statutes fixing the punishment for robbery at imprisonment for not less than one year, and permitting the court, in its discretion, to sentence the offender to imprisonment during his natural life, and making the punishment for an attempt, imprisonment for a term not exceeding one half the longest term of imprisonment prescribed upon conviction of the offense so attempted,—an attempt to commit robbery may be punished by imprisonment for a definite term of years. Id.

6. The financial returns which a water plant can be made to bear must be considered in determining the value of the franchises of its owner when taken by right of eminent domain. Kennebec Water Dist. v. Waterville (Me.) 856

7. In determining how much income a water plant can be made to produce, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the franchises of its owner which are sought to be taken by right of eminent domain, it must be allowed a fair amount, based upon the fair value of its property, taking into account the cost of maintenance or depreciation and current operating expenses, allowing something for the risk of the original enterprise, if any, over and above income which it has received at rates which would have been excessive but for such risk, so far as such fair amount can be allowed, and no more should be exacted from the public than the service is worth. Id.

8. Whether or not the franchises of a water company are exclusive, and how far it is without competition, as well as the period for which they are to endure, are to be taken into consideration in determining their value, when sought to be taken by the right of eminent domain. Id.

9. The quality of water furnished and of the services rendered, and the fitness of the plant, and the source of the water supply to meet reasonable requirements in the present and future, are to be considered in determining the value of a water plant taken by eminent domain. Id.

10. The faithfulness, or unfaithfulness, even to the extent of rendering the franchises liable to forfeiture, of a water company in performing its duties, should not be considered in determining the value of its plant when taken by eminent domain. Id.

11. That a water company has received more than reasonable rates for services rendered should not be considered in determining the amount which must be paid for its plant when taken by eminent domain. Id.

12. Upon taking, by eminent domain, the system supplying one municipal corporation from a water company operating several plants in different places, no increased burden upon, or impairment of value of, the remaining plants because of the severance of the property can be considered as an element of damage, where the various plants are separate and distinct, although some additional cost of management may be thereby imposed upon the remaining ones. Id.

13. The cost of replacing a water plant with one substantially like it must be considered in determining its value when appropriated by eminent domain; but such consideration must be made in the light of the fact that the plant is a completed structure and a going concern. Id.

14. Property of a water company not directly connected with the water system or plant which is taken from it by right of eminent domain should be appraised at its fair market value, not at a forced sale, but at what it is fairly worth to the seller under conditions permitting a prudent and beneficial sale. Id.

15. In determining the structure value of a plant for a municipal water supply to be taken by eminent domain, the appraisers should consider the present efficiency of the system, the length of time necessary to construct the same de novo, the time and cost needed after construction to develop the new system to the level of the present one in respect to business and income, and the added net incomes and profits, if any, which, by its acquirement as a going concern, would accrue to a purchaser during the time required for the new construction and development of business and income. Id.

16. The element of good will should not be considered in estimating the value of a water plant to be taken by eminent domain so far as the system is practically exclusive. Id.

17. The possibility of future development of the use of the franchises of a water company should be considered in determining the amount to be allowed for them when taken by eminent domain, in the light of the facts that further investigation may be necessary therefor, and that at any stage of the development the owner of the franchises will be entitled to charge only reasonable rates under the conditions then existing. Id.

18. That a statute provides for the taking of the property and franchises of a water company by eminent domain in no way impairs the value for which compensation must be made. Id.

19. The capitalization of the income of a water company, even at reasonable rates, cannot be adopted as a test of the present value of the plant, upon which to calculate the amount to be paid to it when the plant is taken by eminent domain,—especially where the franchises are not exclusive or perpetual. Id.

1. Provision for appeal from an order 60 L. R. A.

directing the construction of a ditch is not essential to the validity of a drainage statute, since other modes of renewing the proceedings are open to parties injured thereby. State ex rel. Utick v. Polk County Comrs. (Minn.) 161

2. The failure of Minn. Gen. Stat. 1901, chap. 258, providing a general system for draining wet and overflowed lands of the state, to expressly require the board of county commissioners to determine whether a proposed improvement thereunder will result beneficially to the public, does not render it unconstitutional, as the power to make such determination must be implied from the provisions contained therein for filing a petition for the location of a proposed ditch with the county auditor and the giving of notice by him to all interested parties of a time and place of "hearing to be had thereon," at which hearing the board must determine whether to entertain the petition or not, and for a subsequent hearing after the viewers appointed shall have made their report as to the damages and benefits to accrue from its construction. Id.

3. Failure to expressly declare that the public welfare is intended to be promoted by a statute for the drainage of wet and overflowed lands, and to provide for the determination of that question by the county commissioners, in whom is vested the power to construct any ditch or drain upon a petition setting forth the necessity thereof, does not render the act unconstitutional as a taking of private property for private use, where, from a consideration of the whole statute, it is apparent that the legislature intended to provide exclusively for the public welfare, and ample opportunity is given to all parties interested to appear and be heard, while the levying of assessments is expressly limited to public ditches. Id.

4. The description of a proposed drain in the petition therefor need not be set out with precise accuracy, but is sufficient if the starting point, course, and terminus are stated with approximate accuracy. Id.

Appealability of Judgment in, see APPEAL AND ERROR, 2.

Conclusiveness of Legislative Determination as to, see COURTS, 1.

Measure of Damages, see DAMAGES, 5-19.

For What Purpose, see also DRAINS AND SEWERS, 3.

Who may exercise right.

1. Power to condemn property injured by a sewer system for a temporary period necessary to perfect some other method of disposing of the sewage is not conferred by general authority to construct sewers and acquire by eminent domain the property necessary for that purpose. Waterbury v. Platt Bros. & Co. (Conn.) 211

2. A private corporation may exercise the right, given by the Constitution, to take private property for purposes of a reservoir, upon property of a railroad company which is not held for public use. Denver Power & Irrig. Co. v. Colorado & S. R. Co. (Colo.) 383

For what purpose.

3. The legislature has no power to authorize the taking of private property for a private use, nor to compel the payment of assessments for the construction of any public improvement which furthers private interests only. State ex rel. Utick v. Polk County Comrs. (Minn.) 161

4. A constitutional prohibition of the taking of private property for private purposes is not applicable to a statute providing for the drainage of large tracts of land. Mound City Land & Stock Co. v. Miller (Mo.) 190

5. A statute requiring every railroad company to drain off the water accumulating along its right of way from the construction of the road, without regard to whether such water is detrimental to the public health and welfare or injurious to contiguous lands, and providing that if any company, after due notice, fail to comply with the statute, a proper ditch may be constructed by public authorities, upon petition of any owner or tenant of land contiguous to the road feeling himself aggrieved, and the cost assessed upon the railroad company, is unconstitutional as a taking of private property for private use. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Keith (Ohio) 525

6. Absence of power to condemn, for a reservoir, land situated within a government forest reserve cannot be urged by a private individual to defeat the condemnation proceedings. Denver Power & Irrig. Co. v. Colorado & S. R. Co. (Colo.) 383

7. Authority to condemn land for a reservoir for agricultural and milling purposes is sufficient to cover its condemnation for power, manufacturing, and "other beneficial uses and purposes," where no suggestion is made of an intended use which is not directly or indirectly associated or connected with uses expressly authorized. Id.

What may be taken.

9. A company seeking to acquire for a reservoir site, by right of eminent domain, land claimed by a railroad company cannot, for the purpose of defeating the latter's right in the property, attack its corporate existence, or assert that it has not sufficiently complied with the law to give it a right to the property. Denver Power & Irrig. Co. v. Colorado & S. R. Co. (Colo.) 383

10. A reservoir company cannot take, by right of eminent domain, land devoted to the purposes of a railroad, unless such taking is required by public necessity; and the facts that the site is the only available one on the stream, and that the railroad company might procure an equally available location for its purposes elsewhere, are immaterial. Id.

11. The mere laying of rails upon a right of way is not sufficient to protect the property from appropriation for other public uses, if the property has been held by various railroad companies for many years without any attempt by them to utilize it, and the rails are laid only a short time before the proceedings are instituted to acquire adverse title to the property, and three years after the one seeking title has commenced to expend money on the property; and the fact that the corporation laying them comes into existence only a short time before it begins to lay the rails is immaterial if its rights are acquired from other corporations which never made any attempt to construct a road. Id.

12. The condemnation of the right to construct a telegraph line along a railroad right of way is not prevented by the fact that a right of way for the line might be obtained over other property or in other ways. Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. v. Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. (Tex.) 145 in any less estate, or by any corporation, whether acquired by purchase or by virtue of any provision in the charter of such corporation. Id.

13. Authority to condemn the right to construct a telegraph line along a railroad right of way is conferred by a statute permitting the condemnation of any lands, whether owned by private persons in fee or 60 L. R. A.

14. The condemnation of the right of a private riparian proprietor to the use and enjoyment of a natural stream flowing past his land, or its impairment by an appropriation of such water for irrigation purposes, is authorized by Neb. Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 93a, art. 2, § 41, and by Neb. Const. art. 1, § 21, and such proprietors may recover damages in the same way and subject to the same rules as a person whose property is affected injuriously by the construction and operation of a railroad. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889

15. The consents of owners of lots abutting on a street to the construction and operation of a street railroad on such street are not property rights that can be appropriated under the power of eminent domain. Hamilton, G. & C. Traction Co. v. Parrish (Ohio) 531

Right to compensation.

16. A riparian owner whose property rights are appropriated or impaired in making appropriations of water for irrigation or other purposes for a public use, as authorized and regulated by the Nebraska irrigation act of 1895, is entitled to compensation for the injuries actually sustained, to be recovered in a suitable action or proceeding instituted for such purpose. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889

Additional burdens.

17. Poles and wires which permanently and exclusively occupy portions of a public street or highway constitute an additional burden for which the abutting owner is entitled to compensation in case he is damaged thereby. Bronson v. Albion Teleph. Co. (Neb.) 426

EQUITY.

1. A suit in equity to determine the rights to use or divert the waters of a stream by virtue of riparian rights, appropriation, prescription or otherwise, when claimed by a large number of persons, and to enjoin infringement, under color thereof, of rights acquired under the Nebraska irrigation act of 1895, may be maintained in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889

2. The avoidance of a multiplicity of suits will give equity jurisdiction of a suit by a municipal corporation to enjoin a company which has laid gas mains in its streets from violating its contract as to maximum rates, where it is entitled to nominal damages at law, and each inhabitant has a right of action to vindicate his rights. Muncie Natural Gas Co. v. Muncie (Ind.) 822

3. The plaintiff in a suit in equity to determine conflicting claims to the right to use or divert the waters of a stream by virtue of riparian rights, appropriation, prescription or otherwise, and enjoin infringement, under color thereof, of rights acquired under the Nebraska irrigation act of 1895, may offer to do equity by compensating riparian owners whose rights are affected by the construction and operation of an irrigation canal; and in such case the amounts due the several parties by way of damages may become a proper subject of inquiry and adjudication therein. *Crawford Co. v. EVIDENCE.Judicial notice.

1. The Minnesota supreme court takes judicial notice of the topography of all sections of the state, and that certain portions thereof are, for want of natural drainage, wet and swampy during the greater portion of the year and wholly unfit for agricultural or other purposes, but that they would, when properly drained, be extremely valuable and productive. State ex rel. Utick v. Polk County Comrs. (Minn.) 161

2. The supreme court of Nebraska will take judicial notice of the fact that since the early settlements of the western portions of the state, where irrigation has been found essential to successful agriculture, a custom or practice has existed of appropriating and diverting waters from the natural channels thereof into irrigation canals, and 60 L. 3. The presumption of death from natural causes may be considered by the jury in determining the cause of death of a member of a mutual benefit society, who was found dead in the water, where the evidence is not such as to explain or indicate how the body came to be there. Cox v. Royal Tribe of Joseph (Or.) 620

4. The presumption that a publication of the reason of the discharge of an employee was made in good faith must prevail, where it was made after investigation, and embodied the result of the inquiry in accordance with the weight of evidence, if clothed in temperate and decorous language and there is no extrinsic fact or circumstance having a tendency to show malice. Brown v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (Va.) 472

5. Service under a contract of employment for a fixed period, continued after the expiration of such period, will be presumed to be under the same contract; but such presumption must yield to evidence showing a change of terms. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Barber (Neb.) 927

6. Direct proof of the existence of a deed may be aided by the presumption to be derived from possession and repeated acts of ownership in establishing the title to real estate. Cahill v. Cahill (Conn.) 706

7. A crime will not be presumed to have been committed on a day when accused was in the state, for the purpose of upholding extradition proceedings against him as a fugitive from justice, if the indictment charges its commission on an earlier date, and no claim or suggestion is made of error in the charge. People ex rel. Odewalt (Ky.) 723

9. The burden of proving the fact is upon one alleging that another availed himself of the opportunity to publish a communication of a privileged class, not to protect his interests, but to gratify ill-will against plaintiff. Brown v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (Va.) 472

10. To defeat recovery upon a mutual benefit certificate because of suicide of the member, the burden of establishing suicide is upon the society. Cox v. Royal Tribe of Joseph (Or.) 620

11. On the trial of an indictment for violation of a Sunday law, the burden of proof is on the state to satisfy the jury that the labor was not in household work, or other work of necessity or charity, within the exception of the statute. State v. McBee (W. Va.) 638

Documentary evidence.

12. The mere fact that the verdict of a coroner's jury must be returned to and filed with the clerk of a court of record in a state where the coroner has no judicial functions does not make it judicial in character, so as to entitle it to admission, in an action at law, as evidence of the facts found by him. Cox v. Royal Tribe of Joseph (Or.) 620

13. The inclusion of an authenticated copy of a coroner's inquest in the proofs of death of a member of a mutual benefit society does not render it admissible in evidence against the beneficiary in an action on the certificate, where the proofs were furnished by the subordinate lodge of which deceased was a member. Id.

14. Parol evidence is admissible to designate the particular property described and identified by a written contract for its conveyance, and which was in the contemplation of the parties in making the contract. Moayon v. Moayon (Ky.) 415

15. Parol evidence is admissible that an insurance company knew of the facts and circumstances entitling it to enforce the provisions of a policy as to forfeiture or not at its option, and that the company continued to treat the policy as in force and declined to exercise such option, notwithstanding a provision in the policy that the agents of the company should have no power to waive any conditions in the policy. German Ins. Co. v. Shader (Neb.) 918

17. That a man refrained from all manner of acts appropriate to ownership is admissible in evidence in a suit to recover, in the right of his wife, real estate occupied by them jointly, as tending to show who was in possession. Cahill v. Cahill (Conn.) 706

18. The selling price of the stock of a water company is not competent evidence of the value of a portion of its system which is to be taken from it by right of eminent domain. Kennebec Water Dist. v. Waterville (Me.) 856

19. The actual rates which have been charged by a water company, and its actual earnings, are admissible in evidence in determining the value of its franchises which are to be taken by right of eminent domain. Id.

20. Evidence of the actual cost of the plant and property of a water company, together with a proper allowance for depreciation, is admissible, but not controlling, upon the question of the amount which must be allowed for it when the plant is taken by right of eminent domain. Id.

21. Evidence that, in repairing a belt which parted where the ends were laced together, causing injury to an employee, a double row of holes was substituted for a single one, is inadmissible upon the question of the employer's negligence. McGarr v. National & P. Worsted Mills (R. I.) 122

22. In an action on a promissory note, an averment by the holder that he caused due notice of dishonor to be served on the last indorser but one is sufficient, in the absence of a motion to make more specific, to admit evidence that the notice was given to the last indorser, and by him transmitted to the one next prior. Oakley v. Carr (Neb.) 431

1. The power which independent nations have to surrender criminals to other nations as a matter of favor or comity is not possessed by the states of the Union, and no person can be surrendered by one state to another unless the case falls within the provisions of the United States Constitution. People ex rel. Corkran v. Hyatt (N. Y.) 774

2. A person who was not corporeally present in the demanding state at the time of the commission of a crime with which he is charged is not a fugitive from justice in another state within the meaning of the United States Constitution requiring the delivery up of fugitives from justice for punishment. Id. 60 L. R. A.

3. The presence of an alleged criminal in a state for a single day after the alleged commission of the crime, and nearly a year before the institution of any proceedings against him, is not sufficient to require his surrender by another state, in which he is found, as a fugitive from justice. Id.

1. There can be no recovery for fright which results in physical injuries, in the absence of contemporaneous injury to the plaintiff, unless the fright is the proximate result of a legal wrong against the plaintiff by the defendant. Sanderson v. Northern P. R. Co. (Minn.) 403

2. An action will lie for physical injury or disease resulting from fright or nervous shock caused by negligent acts, when defendant should have known that such acts would, with reasonable certainty, cause such result, or the negligence was gross, showing utter indifference to the consequences which should have been contemplated by him. *Watkins v. GARNISHMENT.

county is not authorized by a statute providing that every person who shall have brought a suit in any court of the state against any person, natural or corporate, shall have a right to a writ of garnishment, to subject any indebtedness due to the defendant by a third person, and any goods, moneys, chattels, or effects of the defendant in the possession or control of a third person, and that the officers, agents, and employees of companies or corporations shall be, as regards such companies or corporations, third persons, and as such subject to garnishment after judgment against the companies or corporations. Duval County v. Charleston Lumber & Mfg. Co. (Fla.) 549

2. Violation of a state statute in sending a claim out of the state for the purpose of garnishment will not deprive the garnishee of the protection of the foreign judgment, under which he pays the claim, from liability to pay the debt a second time to his creditor within the state, if he has disclosed all defenses within his knowledge to the foreign court, and notified the debtor of the proceedings, notwithstanding which the foreign court, which has jurisdiction over the parties and the res, compelled him to pay the claim. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Adams (Ind.) 396

3. The effect of a foreign judgment against a garnishee to protect him from paying the claim a second time to the principal debtor will not be defeated by the fact that, after the foreign proceedings were instituted, the principal debtor brought suit upon the claim against the garnishee within the state, which he pressed to judgment before the foreign judgment was entered. Id.

4. Affidavits controverting a denial by the garnishee of possession of goods of the debtor under a statute permitting such affidavits stating reason to believe the answer to be incorrect and the particulars wherein it is so, are sufficient to raise an issue, where they state that plaintiff believes with good reason that the answer is incorrect, because garnishee took into his possession the debtor's stock of goods and attempted to acquire title thereto without complying with the terms of the statute requiring the purchaser of a stock of goods to ascertain the creditors of the seller, and have the purchase price applied to their claims. McDaniels v. J. J. Connelly Shoe Co. (Wash.) 947

1. The sale of the good will of a business and the personal property used in conducting it, upon which appears the name of the seller, will not prevent him from resuming business under his own name. Ranft v. Reimers (Ill.) 291

2. One who has sold the good will of a business to persons who change the name under which it is conducted has a right, upon resuming business under the old name, to have mail directed to such name delivered to him. Id.

3. One who sells a trade, good will, and business, covenanting to warrant and defend the same, cannot, after resuming business, solicit trade from his former customers to the injury of the buyer. Id.

4. One who sells and warrants the good will of a business, a large part of the orders of which come by telephone, cannot, upon resuming business, appropriate the old telephone number to the injury of the buyer. Id.

Western R. Co. of Ala.* (Ala.) 269

2. A purchaser of a lot at sheriff's sale, who has not obtained any possession or control of the premises, except such as arises constructively from the delivery or recording of the sheriff's deed, is not responsible to the city, which has paid a judgment for injuries received by falling into a negli-

Husband's Vested Right to Convey, see CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 3.

1. A vested right of a man to convey his homestead without the co-operation of his wife is impaired by a statute making him incapable of conveying it unless his wife joins in the conveyance. Gladney v. Sydnor (Mo.) 880

2. A deprivation of right, and not merely a change in remedy or procedure, is effected by a statute which forbids a man to sell his homestead without the co-operation of his wife where, theretofore, he might do so unless the wife filed a claim as prescribed by statute. Id.

Marriage.

By Mother of Bastard; Effect on Right to Maintain Action in Bastardy, see BASTARDY, 2.

1. In this state the only essential of a valid marriage is the free consent of competent parties to live together in the marriage relation. Eaton v. Eaton (Neb.) 605

2. If a marriage contracted in good faith is void by reason of some removable impediment, the parties may, after the impediment has been removed, become lawfully united by continuing to live together with the intention of sustaining toward each other the relation of husband and wife, and even where the existence of the impediment and its removal were unknown, continued cohabitation evidences consent to live in wedlock. Id.

3. A marriage contracted by a divorced person during the time allowed by law for commencing proceedings for the reversal of the divorce decree is absolutely void, even if the decree is not reversed, under Neb. Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 25, § 45, making it unlawful for one obtaining a divorce to remarry during the pendency of an appeal or the time allowed for an appeal. Id.

Property.

Enjoining Husband from Interference with Wife's Separate Estate, see INJUNCTION, 1.

4. A lease of land which is the separate estate of a married woman, for a period of more than one year, is a conveyance within the meaning of statutes requiring husband and wife to join in the conveyance of real estate the separate property of the wife, and forbidding the conveyance of an estate for a term of more than one year unless the conveyance be in writing; and the wife must, therefore, join in its execution notwithstanding a statute giving the husband the sole management of the wife's property during marriage. Dority v. Dority (Tex.) 941

Actions.

5. A married woman may maintain a suit in equity against her husband to enforce his contract to convey property in trust for their children and herself in consideration of her resumption of marital relations which she had abandoned because of conduct on his part entitling her to a divorce, where the statute permits her to sue alone in actions between her and her husband. *Moayon v. INJUNCTION.

1. A husband may be enjoined, in a suit which does not seek the dissolution of the marriage, from further interference with his wife's separate estate, notwithstanding the statute gives him the sole management of it during marriage, where he refuses to support her, and so diverts the income of her property as to deprive her of the benefit which the law entitles her to receive therefrom through his management. Dority v. Dority (Tex.) 941

2. Facts with reference to contemplated buildings or improvements, which have been ascertained promptly by effort and expense, and compiled and put in form for the use of contractors, having a commercial value so long as they are not generally known, are property, and entitled to protection as such. F. W. Dodge Co. v. Construction Information Co. (Mass.) 810

3. The news of market quotations and sporting items gathered and furnished by a telegraph company to patrons by means of tickers is property, which will be protected by equity against appropriation by rival companies who intend to furnish it to their patrons in competition with complainant, to the injury or destruction of the service. National Teleg. News Co. v. Western Union Teleg. Co. (C. C. App. 7th C.) 805

4. The furnishing to subscribers of secret information, gathered by effort and expense, regarding intended buildings or improvements, which is advantageous to their respective lines of business, under contract not to disclose it, is not a publication which will deprive its owner of the right to protection against the unlawful use of it by a rival. F. W. Dodge Co. v. Construction Information Co. (Mass.) 810

Contract rights.

As to Maximum Rates for Gas, see ACTION OR SUIT, 8; EQUITY, 2.

5. Injunction will lie to prevent a gas company which has laid its mains in a city street from violating its contract as to maximum rates which it will charge. Muncie Natural Gas Co. v. Muncie (Ind.) 822

Water rights.

See also EQUITY, 1.

6. A landowner will be enjoined from draining, collecting, and diverting percolating waters on his premises for the sole purpose of wasting them, where such acts will destroy or materially injure the spring of a water company which makes use of the water thereof for supplying the people of a municipality with water for domestic use.

Stillwater Water Co. v. Farmer (Minn.) 875

7. A riparian owner having a superior title to the use of the water of a stream as against an appropriator is not entitled to maintain an injunction to prevent the diversion of the storm or flood waters of the stream, and thereby prevent its application to a beneficial use for agricultural purposes, as contemplated by the Nebraska irrigation act of 1895. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889

Highways.

8. An injunction will not be granted to restrain the cutting of trees along a highway by a telephone company in erecting poles and wires under its franchise, in the absence of insolvency or some special circumstance, but the owner will be left to his remedy at law. Bronson v. Albion Teleph. Co. (Neb.) 426

9. The invalidity of the franchise of a telephone company does not entitle an abutting owner to an injunction to restrain it from cutting trees along a street, in erecting its poles and wires, since whether its franchise was acquired or is held rightfully can be determined only in a direct proceeding to oust the company, or in a proceeding to which someone who claims a better title is a party. Id.

Taxes.

10. The prevention of a multiplicity of suits is sufficient ground for an injunction against the certifying, by a board of tax appraisers, of assessments against corporations to the officers of a large number of counties, if the assessments are illegal. Sandford v. Poe (C. C. App. 6th C.) 641

11. Taking the relative value of the tangible property of a corporation within a state, as compared with the total value of all its tangible property in different states, where it is done under a statute which does not require this to be done, but requires the true value of the property within the state to be taken as the basis of assessment, considered with reference to the value of all the property of the corporation, including a consideration of the value of its capital stock as a factor, does not, even if it is inequitable and unjust as a matter of fact, constitute such an illegal assessment that the courts can grant an injunction against it. Id.

Premiums.

See also infra, 4-6.

1. An insurance company which desires to repudiate the act of an agent having general power to receive and collect premiums, in accepting a premium after loss occurs, must return or tender the money to the insured; and a mere return to the agent with unexecuted instructions to deliver it to the insured is not sufficient. German Ins. Co. v. Shader (Neb.) 918

Waiver; estoppel.

2. A condition in an insurance policy that it shall be void in certain cases means only that it is voidable at the option of the insurer, and a forfeiture for breach of such condition is waived where the company, with knowledge of the circumstances giving it power to avoid the policy, treats it as in force. Id.

3. An insurance company cannot set up that a policy issued by its agent with knowledge of the facts was void when issued because of such facts. Id.

4. Receiving the premium after the destruction of all the insured property, so that nothing remains to which the insurance may attach, waives a provision that the insurer shall not be liable for loss occurring before payment of the premium. Id.

5. Provisions in a policy of insurance that the risk shall not attach unless the premium has been actually paid are waived where the policy is delivered on an agreement to extend credit, and the insurer does not take advantage of such provisions, but treats the policy as in force. Id.

6. A condition in an insurance policy that it shall not be in force until the premium is paid is waived by the company neglecting to insist on such condition after the agent reports that a policy has been issued, and that the premium thereon is unpaid. Id.

Provision for arbitration.

7. A provision making a submission of the question of the amount of loss to arbitrators and an award thereon a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action on a policy of insurance which limits the liability of the insured to the actual cash value of the property at the time of loss cannot be enforced, and if the insurer and insured cannot agree as to the extent of the loss a valid cause of action, subject to adjudication by a court of law, at once arises. *Hartford F. 8. The breaking of a plate-glass window by the explosion of gas generated by the use of gasoline to clean clothes is not caused by the blowing up of the building, within the meaning of an insurance policy thereon which exempts the insurer from loss caused by the blowing up of buildings. Vorse v. New Jersey Plate-Glass Ins. Co. (Iowa) 838

9. Fire is not the cause of the breaking of a window, within the meaning of an insurance policy exempting the insurer from liability for losses which happened by or in consequence of any fire, where the loss was caused by the explosion of gas ignited by a match or light. Id.

10. Carrying a loaded gun from one room of a house, in which it had been left by another person, to an adjoining room, is "handling firearms" within the meaning of a clause in an accident insurance policy limiting to $500 the recovery for any injury received while hunting, or while using or handling loaded firearms. Doddy v. National Masonic Acci. Asso. (Neb.) 424

Apportionment.

11. In distributing the loss upon a building, machinery, and stock between insurance policies covering all the items for a gross sum and those specifically liable on each item, all of which provided that the liability shall not be greater "than the amount hereby insured shall bear to the whole insurance," the blanket policies should be regarded as insuring each item to the entire amount unappropriated when it is reached, making the adjustment item by item in the order of greatest loss, if that will work substantial equity and justice to all concerned, and deducting the sums appropriated to the respective items as they are adjusted and passed. *Schmaelzle v. Effect and conclusiveness.

1. A decision that a statute constitutes a contract, and that an act repealing it is void, is not an estoppel to a subsequent decision holding that the former statute itself is unconstitutional. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. (Miss.) 33

2. A decision as to an exemption from taxation, in a case between the sheriff of a county and a railroad company, is not res judicata in a case between a state revenue agent and a different railroad company, although it may be persuasive under the doctrine of stare decisis. Id.

3. A decision as to the taxes of one year is not res judicata as to the taxes for another year. Id.

4. A judgment against a city for personal injuries caused by a defective sidewalk in an action, of which the lot owner has notice, is conclusive upon the latter as to the fact, cause, and extent of the injury, but not as to the lot owner's responsibility for such cause. Lincoln v. First Nat. Bank (Neb.) 923

5. A judgment in a suit between the owner of property abutting on a highway and the municipality to establish the boundary of the highway is not conclusive on the owner of the property located on the opposite side of the street, who is not made a party to the suit, and whose access to and from his property will be interfered with if the boundaries so established prevail. Long v. Wilson (Iowa) 720

Collateral impeachment.

6. The record of a judgment based on an account for goods sold cannot be impeached, and evidence offered that the debt was in fact created by fraud, in order to prevent the release of the debtor from liability on it, by a discharge in bankruptcy under a statute providing that such discharge shall release all debts except the judgments in actions for fraud. Goodman v. Herman (Mo.) 885

Landlord's Liability.

See also PROXIMATE CAUSE, 3.

1. Mere failure of a landlord to comply with his agreement to make repairs on the leased premises will not render him liable for personal injuries suffered by a member of the tenant's family because of want of repair. Thompson v. Clemens (Md.) 580

2. Failure of a landlord who has agreed to make repairs, to send a carpenter to repair a porch, for a week after receiving notice that some boards in it were bulging, is not such negligence as to charge him with liability for injury to a member of the tenant's family by the giving way of boards in another place, which were not known to be defective, merely because the latter defect might have been discovered while the repairs were in progress, where the known defect was not of such a nature as to call for such speedy action. Id.

3. A landlord is not relieved from liability for injury to tenants of a lower floor by the freezing and bursting of an automatic fire extinguisher in the portion of the building retained by him, by the fact that he has employed an independent contractor to keep the building heated. Pittsfield Cottonwear Mfg. Co. v. Pittsfield Shoe Co. (N. H.) 116

4. No implied contract obligation rests upon the owner of a building leased in separate sections to keep the portion remaining in his possession in repair, so that damages resulting to property through breach of it can be set up as a counterclaim in an action for rent. Kuhn v. Sol Heavenrich Co. (Wis.) 585

5. A tenant of the lower floor of a building, the remainder of which is retained by the landlord, cannot, in an action on the contract, recover for breach by a third person of his contract with the landlord to keep such remainder heated, by reason of which water pipes freeze and burst, to his injury. Pittsfield Cottonwear Mfg. Co. v. Pittsfield Shoe Co. (N. H.) 116

Holding over; renewal.

6. Merely holding over after the expiration of the term, under a lease which provides for a renewal on the same terms, is not sufficient to show an affirmative election to renew the lease for an additional term. Andrews v. Marshall Creamery Co. (Iowa) 399

7. An option to renew a lease in accordance with the terms of the instrument giving the lessee the privilege of renewal is exercised, so as to be binding on the lessee, by the statement of his authorized agent, shortly before the expiration of the term, that the lease will be renewed, on the faith of which the landlord makes improvements which he is under no obligations to make, followed by the assurance by the agent of intention to remain, and that no written renewal is necessary, when pressed for such writing after the expiration of the term, and while the lessee is still in possession. Id.

LARCENY.

1. To acquire a property right in animal feræ naturæ, so that they may be the subject of larceny, the pursuer must bring them into his power and control, so that he may subject them to his own use at his pleasure, and must so maintain his possession and control as to indicate that he does not intend to abandon them again to the world at large; but, in cases where larceny is charged, the law does not require absolute security against the possibility of escape. State v. Shaw (Ohio) 481

2. When fish are inclosed in a net, or in any other inclosed place which is private property, from which they may be taken at any time at the pleasure of the owner of the net or inclosure, the taking of them therefrom with felonious intent will be larceny. Id.

1. Words spoken by a witness in a judicial proceeding concerning a stranger to the suit, which are pertinent to the issues involved, and fairly responsive to questions propounded to him, are absolutely privileged notwithstanding actual malice. Cooley v. Galyon (Tenn.) 139

2. Charges that one who had offered to complete a building at the contract price did not pay for materials purchased, and did not use the character of materials called for by his contracts, are responsive to inquiries as to his being a reliable contractor, and pertinent to an inquiry as to damages suffered by interference with the construction of the building, which was alleged to have increased its cost, so as to be privileged. Id.

3. The publication, after due investigation by a railroad company, that the reason for discharging an employee was that he had made statements which had been proved to be untrue, to the effect that one officer of the company had cast reflections upon the female ancestry of another officer, is privileged, and will not sustain an action for libel, unless it was inspired by malice. Brown v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (Va.) 472

Power of legislature to give creditors' liens on debtors' property. 947

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Mere delay in asserting the right of re-entry for condition broken does not waive the failure to perform the condition, where the question of performance itself is one of reasonable time. Bouvier v. Baltimore & N. Y. R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 750

2. The statute of limitations does not begin to run against an action on a lot owner's liability over to a city for a judgment for injuries growing out of a defective sidewalk until the city's liability is fixed by law, or by admission and payment on its part. Lincoln v. First Nat. Bank. (Neb.) 923

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Limitation of actions; against suit on lot owner's liability over to city for judgment for personal injuries. 924

LOTTERY.

1. A scheme whereby a common fund is to be produced by the contributions of various parties, and afterwards distributed among the parties contributing thereto, and a valuable preference or privilege in the distribution thereof is made to depend upon chance, is a lottery. State ex rel. Prout v. Nebraska Home Co. (Neb.) 448

2. To constitute a lottery, it is necessary that a prize be offered, and something of value be given for a chance to obtain the prize, but the prize may be anything of value, and a preference or privilege in the distribution of a common fund among those entitled thereto may constitute a prize. Id.

2. A return to a writ of mandamus to compel the restoration of a member of a mutual benefit society to his rights therein, which alleges that, upon evidence produced after notice to accused and an opportunity given him to be heard, the society made a judicial determination that he had been guilty of conduct which, under the rules of the association, subjected him to expulsion from the society, is sufficient although it does not aver that the charges were true, where he presented no evidence, and the society therefore had only part of the evidence before it in reaching its conclusion. Pepin v. Société St. Jean Baptiste (R. I.) 626

Duty and liability of master.

Instruction as to, see TRIAL, 12.

1. An employer is not liable in damages for the consequences of mere error in judgment in furnishing structures, machinery, and appliances for the use of his servants in the prosecution of his business, unless it is shown that such error is itself the result of negligent or wilful ignorance or inattention. O'Neill v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (Neb.) 443

2. Omission to block a guard rail will not render a railroad company liable for injury to a servant whose foot is caught between the rails while he is attempting to uncouple cars, where the evidence shows that there are wide differences of opinion between railroad companies with respect to the relative safety to their servants and the public of the blocked and unblocked guard rails. Id.

3. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that an employer sending a servant to clean out a drain filled with decaying animal matter cannot know of the presence of noxious and deadly gases therein which might cause serious injury to the servant, so as to be charged with the duty of informing the servant of the danger, or taking measures to protect him therefrom. Cox v. American Agri. Chemical Co. (R. I.) 629

Assumption of risks.

4. One engaged in unloading logs from cars onto a landing assumes the risk of injury from a hole in the landing 3 or 4 feet across the top and 3 or 4 deep, into which he steps and is killed by a rolling log. McMillan v. Spider Lake Sawmill & Lumber Co. (Wis.) 589

5. A servant undertaking to clean a drain filled with decaying animal matter does not assume the risk of injuries from dangerous gases of which he has no knowledge, the effect of which it requires special scientific knowledge to measure and determine, although he knows of the character of the contents of the drain, and that it emits offensive odors. Cox v. American Agri. Chemical Co. (R. I.) 629

Fellow servants and their negligence.

6. A master is liable for injury to a servant to which his negligence contributes, although negligence of a fellow servant of the injured person is also a contributory cause. Howe v. Northern Pacific R. Co. (Wash.) 949

7. A statute making a railroad company liable for injuries to servants through the negligence of fellow servants does not violate the equality clause of the Federal Constitution, although it does not confine such liability to acts performed in the operation of trains, but extends it to risks similar to those incurred by the employees of persons or corporations engaged in other lines of work. Callahan v. St. Louis Merchants' Bridge T. R. Co. (Mo.) 249

8. A foreman of a bridge gang, whose duty is to see that the bridge is clear of obstructions upon the approach of trains, may be found negligent from the fact that a passing train struck a maul, where the surface of the bridge was plain, with nothing to cover or hide the maul. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Carlin (C. C. App. 5th C.) 462

9. Under statutes requiring employees to be in the same grade of employment to be fellow servants, a foreman in control of a bridge gang is not a fellow servant of a member of the gang. Id.

10. A fireman on a train is not the fellow 60 L. R. A.

servant of the conductor of his train, or of that of a preceding one, with reference to the placing and observance of signals to prevent a collision in case the leading train is delayed so as to be a menace to the following one. Howe v. Northern Pacific R. Co. (Wash.) 949

11. A member of a section gang engaged in repairing the track to enable trains to run safely over it, who is stationed beneath a track running over a public street into which discarded ties are being thrown, to warn travelers on the street and remove the ties, is, while attempting to remove beyond danger a child which has appeared in the street, within the protection of a statute making railroad companies liable for injuries sustained by any servant or agent thereof while engaged in the work of operating such railroad, by reason of the negligence of any other servant or agent thereof. Callahan v. St. Louis Merchants' Bridge T. R. Co. (Mo.) 249

12. An employee operating a dump car, who is charged by the master with the duty of seeing that the links in the dumping mechanism of the cars are sound, is, in procuring and placing a link on a car, a fellow servant of one subsequently employed to operate it, so that the master is not liable for an injury to the latter because of the insufficiency of the link. Buck v. New Jersey Zinc Co. (Pa.) 453

13. One whose duty is to do the blacksmith work necessary upon the implements used in the construction of a manufacturing plant is, in making a link for the chain used to hold in position the box of a dump car, a fellow servant of one engaged in operating the car, so that the common employer is not liable for injury to the latter through insufficiency of the link made by the former. Id.

PROXIMATE CAUSE, 3.

14. A master may be liable, in damages caused by negligence committed by his servant while in the course of his employment, although the latter may be at the time acting without the knowledge, or contrary to the known wishes, of the former. Weber v. Lockman (Neb.) 313

15. A railroad company is liable for the act of its engineer, in whose custody it has placed signal torpedoes, in placing one on the track, in dangerous proximity to bystanders, and moving the engine over it for his own amusement, in consequence of which one of the bystanders is injured. Euting v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (Wis.) 158

16. Moving an engine forward to pull a car onto the track, with knowledge that a torpedo lies on the track in front of the engine, the explosion of which will be dangerous to bystanders, is negligence on the part of the engineer, and the railroad company is liable for injuries resulting therefrom. Id.

17. One who contracts with the owner of a building to keep the portions of it remaining in his possession heated, failure to do which may result in the bursting of water pipes designed for the protection of tenants in possession of lower floors, against fire, and in the flooding of their goods, owes the latter the duty of exercising care in the management of the heating apparatus so long as he retains control of it; and he will be liable to a tenant in tort for negligently permitting the fire to go out so that the pipes freeze and burst, to the tenant's injury. Pittsfield Cottonwear Mfg. Co. v. Pittsfield Shoe Co. (N. H.) 116

1. A stipulation in a chattel mortgage authorizing the mortgagee to take possession of the mortgaged property upon failure of the mortgagor to make payments secured thereby is not contrary to public policy, and will authorize the mortgagee to take peaceable possession of the property, even against the will of the mortgagor. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Rios (Tex.) 143

2. A chattel mortgage on real estate creates no lien thereon, as Idaho Rev. Stat. § 3385, as amended, limits chattel mortgages to property other than real estate. Beeler v. C. C. Mercantile Co. (Idaho) 283

3. A mortgage of chattels to be acquired is not valid against one who takes actual possession of them under another mortgage executed by the mortgagor after they are acquired by him. New England Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Nat. Bank (Mo.) 256

4. A mortgage executed in the name of a third person, on chattels not yet acquired by the mortgagor, which does not purport to cover after-acquired property, does not bind such property as against a mortgage to another person, executed by the mortgagor in his own name, after the property has come into his possession. Id.

1. Municipalities have authority to provide fuel for paupers; but they cannot be given power by the legislature to buy and sell fuel in competition with private enterprise, although it is scarce and high in price and the cost to consumers may be thereby reduced, unless there is such a scarcity as to create a general and wide-spread distress in the community, which cannot be met by private enterprise. Re Municipal Fuel Plants (Mass.) 592

2. Power to require a railroad company to elevate its tracks through the city for the purpose of abolishing grade crossings is not conferred on a municipality by a charter empowering it to define nuisances and require their abatement; to secure the safety of citizens in the running of trains, and to provide protection against injury from their operation; to require railroad companies to change the location, grade, and 60 L. R. A.

crossings of their roads; to compel them to raise or lower their tracks to conform to any grade that may be established, and to construct bridges, viaducts, or tunnels across their rights of way at street crossings,—where the conditions at some of the crossings do not require such remedy. State ex rel. Indianapolis v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. (Ind.) 831

Ordinances.

Limiting Speed of Railroad Train, see APPEAL AND ERROR, 7; COMMERCE.

3. That an ordinance limiting the speed of railroad trains within the corporate limits will prevent the railroad company from giving its passengers the service they demand, and also its successful competition with rival roads, does not make the ordinance void for unreasonableness. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Carlinville (Ill.) 391

4. An ordinance limiting the speed of trains to 10 miles per hour within the corporate limits is not unreasonable, where the road lies for a mile and a quarter within such limits, and crosses four streets, two of which are main thoroughfares, and buildings located near the road obstruct, to a considerable extent, a view of the tracks and approaching trains, although the principal part of the buildings of the municipality are located to one side of the road. Id.

5. An ordinance requiring the closing of stores at 7:30 P. M., excepting Saturday night, is not authorized by general charter authority to make by-laws, rules, and regulations for preserving the health of the citizens, and such as are deemed necessary for the better government of the town. State v. Ray (N. C.) 634

Liability for damages.

6. A city exercises its police power in clearing an alley of weeds, so that it is not responsible for negligence in the performance of the work by one whom it has employed for that purpose, which results in the injury of a child attracted there by his operations. McFadden v. Jewell (Iowa) 401

7. A municipal corporation is not liable for injuries caused by failure to prevent coasting in its streets, since the duty of preventing such conduct rests on the officers as servants of the state. Dudley v. Flemingsburg (Ky.) 575

Of person causing injury.

1. The fact that the particular injury resulting from negligence was not to be anticipated will not defeat liability therefor if the negligence was such as to be likely to produce injury. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Carlin (C. C. App. 5th C.) 462

2. The proprietors of a saloon are liable for an injury to a guest therein caused by a third person pouring alcohol procured from the bartender, over his feet while he was asleep, and setting fire to the same. Curran v. Olson (Minn.) 733

3. The negligence of a bartender in permitting a third person to pour alcohol over the feet of a guest while asleep in the saloon, and set fire thereto, will be imputed to the proprietors of the saloon. Id.

4. An occupier of land who undertakes to burn rubbish thereon is under no obligation to guard children of tender years who are in the habit of resorting there to play, from injury by approaching the fire. Pao-lino v. McKendall (R. I.) 133

5. The storing of dynamite in a partially buried box on a vacant lot to which children are accustomed to resort to play is negligence which will render the one guilty thereof liable for injuries to a child by the explosion of one of the sticks, which was taken from the box by children who had resorted to the lot to play, and ignited by one of them in ignorance of its explosive character. Nelson v. McLellan (Wash.) 793

Contributory negligence.

6. A guest in a saloon who laughs and jokes with other guests while a third person pours alcohol over the feet of a sleeping guest and sets fire thereto, without saying anything to the bartender about it, and subsequently falls asleep, is not guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery from the proprietors of the saloon for a similar injury to himself, where the bartender not only knew of the acts of such third person, but also furnished the alcohol used by him. *Curran v. 1. Refusal of a continuance of a prosecution for statutory rape upon a person under fifteen years of age, to enable defendant to procure the attendance of a witness who would testify that he knew that prosecutrix was born more than fifteen years before the commission of the alleged offense, is ground for new trial in case of conviction. Brock v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 465

2. The mere separation of jurors, impaneled to try a capital case, from their fellows, without the attendance of an officer, although an irregularity, is not a sufficient cause for setting aside the verdict, if the court is satisfied that the prisoner has not sustained any injury from such separation. Gamble v. State (Fla.) 547

3. Testimony discovered after a conviction of statutory rape upon a female under fifteen years of age, that the mother of prosecutrix bore a female child a little more than fifteen years before the commission of the alleged offense, which may have been the prosecutrix, will warrant a new trial. Brock v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 465

4. A statement of evidence on petition for new trial may be filed on the day "to" which the time for filing has been extended, since the extension includes the day to which it is granted. Crafts v. Carr (R. I.) 128

5. If intoxicants be shown to have been used by the jury impaneled in a capital case, the presumption arises in favor of the convicted defendant that it resulted injuriously to him; and the burden is on the state to show affirmatively, to the entire satisfaction of the court, that their use was to such a limited extent as completely to negate any harm to the defendant from their use by the jury, or any member of it. Gamble v. State (Fla.) 547

2. A mortgage by the holder of a bill of sale of chattels which the seller did not at the time possess is not notice to one who takes a mortgage from the seller upon chattels which he has purchased to fill the requirements of the bill of sale, since it is outside of the chain of the latter's title. *New England Nat. 3. Notice to an insurance agent of facts authorizing a forfeiture of a policy will be attributed to the company, where the policy does not contain any provision that notice to the agent shall not be notice to the company, but only that conditions of the policy may not be waived otherwise than in a prescribed manner. German Ins. Co. v. Shader (Neb.) 918

NUISANCES.

1. General charter authority to define nuisances does not empower a municipal corporation to declare anything a nuisance per se which in fact was not recognized as such by the common law. State ex rel. Indianapolis v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. (Ind.) 831

2. The storage of gunpowder by a fuse manufacturer in quantities necessary for his business, which is located in a proper place and is conducted with the utmost care, is not a nuisance per se, so as to render him liable for injuries caused to neighboring property by the malicious explosion of the magazine by an employee. Kleebauer v. Western Fuse & E. Co. (Cal.) 377

3. That which the general assembly has not declared to be a public nuisance, and the summary abatement of which it has not authorized, cannot be construed by the courts to be such nuisance and liable to be summarily abated without process of law. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Keith (Ohio) 525

Inconsistency.

1. Allegations of waiver by the plaintiff to meet a defense based on conditions precedent are not inconsistent with the statutory allegation that all conditions on his part have been duly performed. German Ins. Co. v. Shader (Neb.) 918

Relief under.

2. A recovery on an implied warranty cannot be had by one who, in his complaint, relies on an express warranty. Pemberton v. Dean (Minn.) 311

Amendments.

3. A plaintiff does not change his cause of action by substituting allegations of waiver for a general denial with respect to a defense of breach of conditions precedent. German Ins. Co. v. Shader (Neb.) 918

4. On a motion for judgment, where plaintiff's claim is admitted, and no facts are stated to defeat it, the court is not required to permit an amendment of the answer. Kuhn v. Sol Heavenrich Co. (Wis.) 585

Plaintiff's pleadings.

Raising on Appeal, Sufficiency of, see APPEAL AND ERROR, 13.

5. In pleading performance of conditions precedent, under Neb. Code Civ. Proc. § 128, the plaintiff may properly assume that 60 L. R. A conditions which have been waived have not been relied on. German Ins. Co. v. Shader (Neb.) 918

6. An allegation that plaintiff "became so nervous and frightened" by defendant's conduct "that she could not sleep at night, and was greatly disturbed in body and mind," sufficiently charges a physical injury to admit evidence that she became helpless, could not go about her duties, and suffered from uterine trouble, and to warrant the submission to the jury of an issue as to what compensation she was entitled to for her "personal injuries," in the absence of anything to show that defendant was misled, or of any steps on his part to have the pleading made more definite. Watkins v. Kaolin Mfg. Co. (N. C.) 617

Defendant's pleadings.

Defendant's Right under Charge to Open and Close, see TRIAL, 4.

7. Answers which deny the commission of an assault and battery of the kind and character alleged in the petition cannot, under Ga. Civ. Code, § 3891, declaring that in every case of tort, if defendant was authorized by law to do the act complained of, he may plead the same as a justification, properly be treated as pleas of justification, although they admit a battery of a minor character, and aver, as a justification of the battery as admitted, certain opprobrious words and abusive language spoken by the plaintiff. Berkner v. Dannenberg (Ga.) 559

8. A demurrer to the answers filed in an action for assault and battery is properly overruled where, although insufficient as pleas of justification, they contain matter which may properly be pleaded in extenuation or mitigation of damages. 1d.

Question for Jury as to, see TRIAL, 5.

1. The proximate cause of the death of an employee mortally burned in the employer's burning building, which he had entered to telephone an alarm of fire after he had failed to give the alarm elsewhere as he had left the building to do, is not the employer's negligence in constructing and maintaining the building so as to be likely to burn, but the employee's act in re-entering the building after he had reached a place of safety. Chattanooga Light & P. Co. v. Hodges (Tenn.) 459

2. The negligence of a bridge foreman, whose duty it is to see that the bridge is free from obstructions on the approach of trains, in failing to see a maul left by a workman in such a way as to interfere with the passage of the train, and not that of the workman in so leaving it, is the proximate cause of an injury to a member of the bridge gang who is struck by the maul as it is hurled from the track by the train. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Carlin (C. C. App. 5th C.) 462

3. One who has undertaken to furnish heat to protect from freezing fire-extinguisher pipes in the portion of a building retained by the landlord, where the freezing might result in injury to tenants of a lower floor, is not liable to the tenants for negligently permitting the fire to go out and the pipes to freeze to their injury, if the exercise by the landlord of the ordinary care which he owed the tenants to keep the water from injuring them would have detected the escape of water and prevented the injury, so that failure to exercise it was the proximate cause of the injury. *Pittsfield Cottonwear Mfg. 1. That a notice of hearing as to a street improvement specified a brick pavement will not invalidate a determination to pave with asphalt and set a new curb, if the hearing covered those matters, and the statute empowered the commissioners to change or modify their original determination in reference to the improvement. People ex rel. North v. Featherstonhaugh (N. Y.) 768

2. A provision in a contract for street improvement that laborers must be paid in cash, and not in store orders, will not be held to be unreasonable or illegal if it is authorized by statute. Id.

3. No illegal burden is placed on abutting property owners, who are required to bear the original cost of street paving, by a provision in the paving contract requiring the contractor to maintain the work for a period during which such a pavement, if properly laid, ought to wear, although the duty to repair pavements is by statute placed on the city at large. Id.

4. Abutting owners subject to assessment for a street improvement cannot complain that the specifications required compliance with the labor law as to hours and wages, if, before the bids were received, the law had been declared unconstitutional, and the improvement commissioners announced that the requirements with reference to it would not be enforced, while the successful bidder testifies that the bid was not increased by reason of such law. 1. Specific performance of a contract by a man to convey one third of his property in trust for the benefit of his children will not be denied because the interest might be reconveyed so as to let into joint management and ownership with him of his business undesirable persons whose interference might jeopardize, if not destroy, its value. Moayon v. Moayon (Ky.) 415

2. Lack of mutuality of obligation and remedy will not, after the wife has resumed marital relations, defeat specific performance at her instance of a contract by a man to convey property to his children in consideration that the wife, who is living separate from him, and about to begin a suit for divorce, for which she has good grounds, resume her marital relations and live with the other contracting party as his wife after the full execution of the agreement; and the fact that she cannot be compelled to maintain such relations during life is immaterial. STATUTES.

1. The existence of facts which would authorize the signatures of the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature to a statute cannot be inquired into where it is authenticated by their signatures. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart (Ind.) 671

Construction.

Meaning of Word "Citizens," see TAXES, 3.

2. The strict letter of the law will not be followed in construing a statute when such an interpretation will lead to an unreasonable or absurd conclusion. Parker v. Nothomb (Neb.) 699

3. The court will, rather than pronounce imperfectly drawn statutes unconstitutional, draw inferences from the evident intent of the legislature, as gathered from the entire statute, supplying by implication technical inaccuracies of expression and obviously unintentional omissions, from the necessity of making them operative and effectual as to specific things included in the broad and comprehensive terms and purposes thereof; and such inferences and implications are as much a part of the statute as what is dis- 60 L. R. A.

tinctly expressed therein. State ex rel. Utick v. Polk County Comrs. (Minn.) 161

4. A statute will not be construed in Nebraska so as to make a negotiable instrument void in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, unless the act specifically so declares. Citizens' State Bank v. Nore (Neb.) 737

5. A constitutional provision adopted from another state must be construed according to the established meaning of the provision that had been acquired in the state from which it was taken. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. (Miss.) 33

6. An act the title to which relates to the issuance of checks by merchants in payment of wages assigned to them cannot be expanded to include persons and corporations generally by the use of the words "or any other person" after the word "merchants" in the body of the act, where the Constitution makes void so much of the act as is not expressed in the title. Dixon v. Poe (Ind.) 308

Amendment.

7. A statute so framed as to be wholly or in part unconstitutional, but having a title expressing a constitutional object, may, by amendatory legislation, be rendered constitutional, without having recourse to an enactment independent throughout its provisions. State, Allison, Prosecutor, v. Croker (N. J. L.) 564

8. Changes or modifications of existing statutes as an incidental result of adopting a new law, covering the entire subject to which it relates, are not forbidden by Neb. Const. § 11, art. 3, providing that no law shall be amended unless the new act contains the section or sections so amended and the amended section or sections shall be repealed. *Eaton v. Power to tax.

1. Street lighting and road districts created by statute as bodies corporate, with power to sue and be sued, elect street, light, and road commissioners, and do all acts necessary to carry out the powers conferred, are political divisions of the state, to which the power of raising money by taxation may be committed. State, Allison, Prosecutor, v. Corker (N. J. L.) 564

Uniformity; equality.

2. The constitutional requirement of uniformity and equality in taxation is not violated by taxing shares of stock in foreign corporations and exempting those in domestic corporations, whose property is taxed within the state; and it is immaterial that the property, including the capital stock of the foreign corporations, is taxed at their domicile. Bacon v. State Tax Comrs (Mich.) 321

3. The use of the word "citizens" in Comp. Laws 1897, § 3831, subdiv. 9, providing that all shares in foreign corporations owned by citizens of the state shall be taxed, is not limited to its political sense so as to exempt stock owned by inhabitants who are not citizens, and thus make the statute void for lack of uniformity. Id.

What taxable; exemptions.

See also supra, 3.

4. The legislature is not prevented from exempting from taxation a waterworks plant owned and operated by a city, by the provision of Kan. Const. art. 11, § 1, that the legislature shall provide for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, but that "all property used exclusively for . . . municipal . . . purposes . . . shall be exempted from taxation." Sumner County Comrs. v. Wellington (Kan.) 850

5. A waterworks plant owned and operated by a city is exempt from taxation, although the water is furnished by the city to the citizens and other consumers at prescribed rentals, under Kan. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7504, providing that all property belonging exclusively to any city shall be exempt from taxation. Id.

6. The provision of the Federal Constitution that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts of every other state does not prevent the taxation of stock in a foreign corporation owned by residents of the state because the property of the corporation is taxed at its domicile. Bacon v. State Tax Comrs (Mich.) 321

7. The legislature not only could, but was required to, impose taxes on the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit, just as and when it would tax the property of individuals, under Const. 1869, art. 12, § 13, providing that the property of such corporations "shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals," and § 20, providing for equal and uniform taxation of all property according to value. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. (Miss.) 33

8. The right of corporations to consolidate is a grant of a corporate franchise subject to Const. § 180, so that any exemption of one of the old companies from taxation is cut off, although § 181 provides for the continuation of exemptions to which corporations "are legally entitled" at the adoption of the Constitution, and § 279 of the schedule provides for the continuation of the rights and charters of corporations. Id.

9. The use of property in the business of interstate commerce does not exempt it from liability to taxation like other property within the jurisdiction in which it is situated. Sandford v. Poe (C. C. App. 6th C.) 641

10. The fact that a telegraph line is engaged in interstate commerce does not prevent a state tax on the value of that portion of the property which is within the state, although the value of the whole line as a unit is taken into account in fixing such value. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart (Ind.) 671

Assessment; valuation.

11. Regarding the capital stock of a corporation as a factor in arriving at the value of its whole property considered as a unit plant, although it is situated in different states, may be authorized by state statute, where it is done for the purpose of determining the true value of that portion of the property which is within the state. Sandford v. Poe (C. C. App. 6th C.) 641

12. Valuing the property of an interstate express company as a unit profit-producing plant for the purpose of determining the taxable value of that portion of the property which is within a state does not amount to a taxation of property outside the state. Id.

13. A state tax on that portion of the property of an interstate telegraph company which is within the state may lawfully be made by considering the value of the whole line as a unit, and assessing the tax on a mileage basis after deducting the value of property subject to local taxation, such as real estate, structures, machinery, and appliances. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart (Ind.) 671

14. The fact that the portions of a telegraph line outside the state are of proportionally greater value than portions within the state does not prevent applying the mileage basis of valuation under the act of 1893, after deducting the value of property subject to local taxation, since allowance for any such variance of value may be made, and the cardinal rule of the statute is to assess only what property is within the state, and that at its true cash value. Id.

15. The fact that the valuation of the property of an interstate telegraph company is made upon its capital stock is not objectionable, where the tax is in effect levied only upon the actual value of the property of the company within the state. Id.

Succession tax.

16. Shares in a joint-stock association are to be dealt with as personality in applying the laws providing a transfer or succession tax, although the property of the association is real estate. Re Jones (N. Y.) 476

17. In determining, for the purposes of taxation, the value of shares in a joint-stock association which are not listed on the stock exchange or sold in the open market, the value of the property they represent, including the real estate, should be ascertained. Id.

TRIAL.

New Trial for Separation of Jurors, see NEW TRIAL, 2.

Right to jury trial.

1. The right of trial by jury does not extend to proceedings for the organization of drainage districts. Mound City Land & Stock Co. v. Miller (Mo.) 190

Demurrer to evidence.

2. Calling for the remainder of the record of a suit, part of which has been introduced in evidence by plaintiff, is not an introduction of original evidence, so as to destroy the right to demur to plaintiff's evidence. Cooley v. Galyon (Tenn.) 139

Right to meet witnesses.

3. Reading on a second trial of a criminal case testimony of a witness who died after the first trial, at which accused was present and represented by counsel, who was accorded the right of cross-examination, does not infringe the right of the accused to be confronted with the witnesses against him in the presence of the court. People v. Elliott (N. Y.) 318

Right to open and close.

4. In order to entitle the defendant to the opening and conclusion before the jury under a plea of justification filed in an action to recover damages for the commission of a tort, the plea must admit the commission of the acts charged in the petition as they are therein alleged; and a plea which only partially admits the commission of the acts charged is not a plea of justification, and does not entitle the defendant to the opening and conclusion of the argument. Berkner v. Dannenberg (Ga.) 559

Questions of law and fact.

5. The question of proximate or intervening cause is for the court, where the facts are fairly incontrovertible. Chattanooga Light & P. Co. v. Hodges (Tenn.) 459

6. Whether the pumping of an oil well on Sunday is a work of necessity within the meaning of a Sunday law is a question for the jury, where the evidence is conflicting as to the injury which will be caused by not pumping it. State v. McBee (W. Va.) 638

7. Whether or not a member of a benefit society had notice of a hearing, in consequence of which he was expelled from a society for violating its rules, is a question of fact, and not of law. Pepin v. Société St. Jean Baptiste (R. I.) 626

8. Whether or not the franchises of a water company are exclusive is a question for the court, where the instruments granting them were before it under the pleadings in a proceeding for instructions to appraisers who are to value the property of the company which is to be taken by right of eminent domain; and the question should not be referred to the appraisers to be answered after the charters are put in evidence before them. Kennebec Water Dist. v. Waterville (Me.) 856

9. An action for negligent injuries should not be withdrawn from the jury, unless the conclusion follows, as matter of law, that no recovery can be had upon any view that can be properly taken of the facts the evidence tends to establish. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Carlin (C. C. App. 5th C.) 462

10. The question whether one who goes between cars moving at the rate of 4 or 5 miles an hour to uncouple them is guilty of negligence is one of fact for the determination of the jury. O'Neill v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (Neb.) 443

Instructions.

11. A requested instruction that the petition sets out no cause of action against an infant under age is properly refused, where defendant was described as an infant, her guardian served with process, and the cause of action alleged to be for necessities furnished. Crafts v. Carr (R. I.) 128

12. In an action to recover for injuries to an employee by being struck by a parted belt, a requested instruction that, if she was not hit by the belt, negligence in its maintenance was immaterial, should be given. McGarr v. National & P. Worsted Mills (R. I.) 122

13. Instructions directing the jury to discriminate against expert testimony are erroneous. Nelson v. McLellan (Wash.) 793

Direction of verdict.

14. Requested instructions to find for defendant on counts of a declaration charging him with assault by the discharge of a pistol should be given where there is no evidence tending in the slightest degree to show that he intended to do any harm, or that the wound inflicted on plaintiff was in any way intentional or wilful. Gilmore v. Fuller (Ill.) 286

15. To warrant the direction of a verdict for defendant in an action on a mutual benefit certificate because the death was not the result of natural causes, the testimony adduced tending to establish that fact must be such that there cannot reasonably be two opinions touching the result. Cox v. Royal Tribe of Joseph (Or.) 620

 1. The common-law rule as to the rights of private riparian proprietors has been a part of the laws of Nebraska from the time of its organization as a state. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889
 2. The common-law rules as to the rights and duties of riparian owners are in force in every part of Nebraska, except as altered or modified by statute. Meng v. Coffey (Neb.) 910
 3. The common-law rule defining the rights of riparian proprietors cannot be held inapplicable to the conditions prevailing in Nebraska because irrigation is found essential to successful agriculture in certain portions of the state. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889
 4. The purpose of the law as to the use of water by riparian owners is to secure to each equality therein, as near as may be, by requiring each to exercise his rights reasonably, and with due regard to the right of other riparian owners to apply the water to the same or other purposes. Meng v. Coffey (Neb.) 910
 5. The law in regulating the use of water by riparian owners distinguishes between those modes of use which ordinarily involve the taking of small quantities, and but little interference with the stream, and those which necessarily involve the taking or diversion of large quantities and a considerable interference with its ordinary course and flow. Id.
 6. The term "domestic purposes," as used in Neb. Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 93a, art. 2, § 43, has reference to the use of water for domestic purposes, permitted to a riparian proprietor at common law, which ordinarily involves but little interference with the water of a stream or its flow, and does not contemplate the diversion of large quantities of water in canals or pipe lines. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889

7. The common law does not give to a riparian owner an absolute and exclusive right to the flow of all the water of a stream in its natural state, but only a right to the benefit and advantage of the water flowing past his land, so far as consistent with a similar right in all other riparian owners. Id. Meng v. Coffey (Neb.) 910

8. A riparian proprietor's right to the use of water of a stream is ordinarily limited to its use for domestic purposes, and, if applied to the irrigation of riparian lands, to a reasonable use for such purpose in view of an equal right to the use belonging to all other riparian proprietors. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889

9. The extent of riparian land cannot, in any event, exceed the area acquired by a single entry or purchase from the government, even if it can in any case exceed the smallest legal subdivision of a section of which sales are made by the government. Id.

10. Land to be riparian must have the stream flowing over it or along its borders. Id.

11. A riparian owner's right to the use of the flow of the stream passing through or by his land is a right inseparably annexed to the soil, not as an easement or appurtenance, but as a part and parcel of the land, and is a property right and entitled to protection as such the same as private property rights generally. Id.

12. The legislature has not abolished, and has no power to abolish, the rights of riparian proprietors which have become vested, except as such rights are taken or impaired for a public use in an exercise of the powers of eminent domain, for which compensation must be made for the injury sustained. Id.

13. The two doctrines of water rights, that of a riparian proprietor, and that of the right of appropriation and application to a beneficial use by a nonriparian owner, may exist in the state at the same time, and both do exist concurrently in Nebraska, the common-law rule of riparian rights being underlying and fundamental and taking precedence of appropriations of water if prior in time. Id.

14. The right to the use of water, when acquired by appropriation, is, in its nature, a property right, and becomes a superior and better title to the use and enjoyment of such water than that of a riparian proprietor whose right attaches subsequently. Id.

15. A riparian owner acquires title to his usufructuary interest in the water when he secures the land to which it is an incident, and a non-riparian appropriator acquires title by appropriation and the application of the waters to some beneficial use; the time when either right attaches determining the superiority of title as between conflicting claimants. Id.

16. The Nebraska irrigation acts of 1889 and 1895 abrogated the law of private riparian rights as previously existing, and substituted in its stead a law providing for the appropriation of the public waters of the state and their application to the beneficial uses therein contemplated, but did not have the effect of abolishing vested rights of riparian proprietors, the rights affected being such only as might have been acquired in the future under the law as previously existing. Id.

17. Although a riparian owner may take water from a stream for purposes of irrigation, his use of the water for such purposes must be reasonable with reference to the size, situation, and character of the stream, the uses to which its waters may be put by other riparian owners, the season of the year, and the nature of the region; and he must not, in so doing, unreasonably diminish or wholly consume such water, to the injury of other owners, nor so as to prevent reasonable use of it by them. Meng v. Coffey (Neb.) 910

18. The right of a riparian proprietor as such to use water for purposes of irrigation is limited to riparian lands; and cannot be extended to lands contiguous to the riparian land; nor can water be diverted to nonriparian lands which might be used on riparian lands, but is not. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889

19. What is a reasonable use of water for irrigation is largely a question of fact, depending on the circumstances of each case, and one which may be viewed with considerable liberality in semiarid regions, where use for such purposes necessarily involves much loss; but waste, needless diminution, or total consumption of a stream, to the injury of others, is clearly unreasonable. Meng v. Coffey (Neb.) 910

Prior appropriation.

See also supra, 13-16; infra, 25.

20. The doctrine of the civil law as to the right to acquire an interest in the use of water by prior appropriation and the application thereof to a beneficial use has never become a part of the laws of Nebraska, whether or not the doctrine was ever in existence as a part of the laws in force in the territory known as the "Louisiana purchase" acquired by the United States. Crawford Co. v. Hall (Neb.) 889

21. The act of Congress of July 26, 1886, granted to those appropriating water on the public domain for agricultural purposes a right in and to the use of such waters when made according to local customs, or when such right is recognized by the laws of the state or the decisions of the courts. Id.

22. Whether vested rights have been acquired in waters appropriated and diverted from the natural channels thereof into irrigation canals, and applied to agricultural purposes in accordance with the custom existing in the western part of Nebraska, must depend on the facts and circumstances as disclosed in each particular case. Id.

23. The right to appropriate the waters on the public domain according to the custom prevailing in the arid states immediately west of Nebraska was impliedly recognized by Neb. Sess. Laws 1877, p. 168, and the rights of those which had appropriated the public waters and applied them to agricultural uses were expressly recognized and preserved by the irrigation acts of 1889 and 1895. Id.

Prescriptive rights.

24. There is no such thing as a prescriptive right of a lower riparian proprietor to receive water as against upper owners; and the receiving of the full flow of a stream for more than ten years does not give any prescriptive right that will prevent a reasonable use of the waters of such stream by an upper owner. Id.

25. The appropriation for any period of time of considerable quantities of water in seasons when it may be done without sensible injury to lower owners does not give a prescriptive right to divert the whole stream in dry seasons. Meng v. Coffey (Neb.) 910

26. An appropriation of water by "squatter's right," not recognized by the law of Nebraska, the decision of its courts, nor any general, well-recognized, or widely respected custom therein, does not, by virtue of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2339, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1437, give to the settler who has appropriated water in that way for less than ten years an exclusive right thereto as against other settlers on the same stream, but a squatter who so appropriates water, and afterwards duly enters and receives a patent to the land from the government, may, as against other patentees from the government on the same stream, count the time during which he appropriated the water as a mere squatter in making out the statutory period of prescription. Id.

WILLS.

1. The intention of the testator as ascertained in the light of the whole will and the attendant circumstances are to be followed in construing the will, unless it is clearly in conflict with the law existing at his death. Sumpter v. Carter (Ga.) 274

2. All divesting clauses in a will, especially as to remainders, are to be strictly construed so as to vest the estate absolutely at the earliest period of time. Id.

3. Under a will devising all the testator's property to his wife during her life, and providing that in case of her not intermarrying his whole estate shall "at her death" be equally divided between his "children," and that in case any of such "children" should die without leaving issue their part of the estate should be equally divided between his other "children," the children take, on the death of the testator, a vested remainder interest, subject to be divested as to any child in favor of the testator's other children as substituted devisees and remaindermen upon such children dying during the existence of the life tenancy without leaving a child who survives the life tenant. Id.

4. A vested remainder interest of a son of a testator under a will leaving all the testator's property to his wife for life with a provision that at her death his whole estate shall be "then" equally divided between his children, and that in case any of such children die without leaving issue the share of such child shall be equally divided between the testator's other children, becomes absolute and indefeasible upon his dying before the life tenant, leaving issue in esse at the life tenant's death, and the grantee in a deed by such son during his lifetime of all his interest in specified realty which belonged to the testator at the time of his death becomes indefeasibly entitled to the son's remainder share therein upon the death of the life tenant. Id.

5. Under a will by which a testator devises all his property to his widow during her life, with a provision that at her death his whole estate shall be equally divided between his children, and that the effects going into the hands of his daughters shall not be subject to the control of any husband, but shall belong to his "said daughters and their children," and that in case any of the children die without leaving issue their part of the estate shall be equally divided between his other children to be co-daughter of the testator who, with such trolled in the same way, the children of a daughter, survive the life tenant, are entitled to share in common with their mother in the remainder interest which, on the death of the testator, vested in their mother, subject to open and let in any children subsequently born and living at the death of the life tenant, and their rights are not affected by a deed of all her interest in certain realty belonging to the testator at his death, executed by their mother during the existence of the life tenancy. Id.
